gion, must have been revealed by God himself. And if it is a certain truth, as it will appear to be, that as far back as we can trace any notices of the belief of a future state, we shall find the belief of a resurrection united with it, it may reasonably be supposed, that this mode of future existence was first revealed to Adam, and preserved as a tradition received from their first parent by the patriarchs and the chosen people of God. Nor did it rest upon tradition only, assurances of it having been renewed at distant times to several eminent and holy men, before the institution of the Jewish commonwealth, and during the continuance of it. Let us then proceed to inquire what light the scriptures of the Old Testament (for to these we must have recourse) have thrown upon this subject.

And in this inquiry we must be allowed in some cases to follow our Saviour's manner of reasoning, by arguing from inference rather than from express and positive declarations. And this concession must be particularly claimed in the discovery of the notices supposed to be given to our first parent of a resurrection. The support of this supposition will rest upon what is recorded in the third chapter of Genesis, where we have the sentence passed upon Adam, and the alleviation of it, immediately after his fall.

When God made known to Adam the punishment of his disobedience, he tells him, that he was taken out of the ground - that dust he was, and that he should return to dust. Here then the dissolution and destruction of the body are denounced in the very words of the sentence. But there is likewise an alleviation of the sentence, and a consolation to be derived from it, which must therefore necessarily have a respect to the sentence itself. The serpent, the great seducer, had beguiled man; but he is told, that he would have no reason to triumph in the success of his guile; for he would find an enemy in the seed of the woman, whose heel he would bruise, but who should bruise his head; which phrases denote the former to be a curable, however envenomed, the latter to be an incurable and fatal wound. Whether Adam understood the full import of these remarkable words,—by whom, and by what wonderful means the wound of man would be healed, and the serpent's treachery avenged—we have no authority from Scripture to determine. But if they were intended to afford any consolation to him in his forlorn and wretched condition, (and less than this cannot be supposed,) what is it that he could collect from them? (He was sentenced to gain his bread by labour, and to eat it with sorrow, and to lie down in the dust at the end of a miserable life.) What cure was there for death? or what comfort could he find in any other reflection, than in having the hopes of life being restored to him? And what notion could he have of the restoration of life, but of its being the restoration of the living man, by the reunion of the soul and body, in the same manner as his nature was at first constituted? And it must not escape our observation, that when God made known to Adam, that death was the punishment of his disobedience, he puts him in mind of his origin, and tells him, that he was taken out of the ground—that dust he was, and that he should return to dust. This explanation of his existence might afterwards lead him naturally to reflect, that it evidently carried in it the strongest assurance, that the same divine power which at first animated the lifeless dust, could most certainly re-animate it in the same manner. From these considerations it may, I think, be reasonably supposed, that if Adam had any assurances given him of a restoration to life, which was the only consolation he could receive under the sentence of death, they were imparted to him under the notion and expectation of the resurrection of the body, and the re-union of the body and soul.

If our first parent was possessed of the knowledge of this important truth, upon which his own hopes and those of all his posterity must depend, we cannot suppose that he would suffer it to die with him, but that he would carefully make it known to his children, and transmit it to his descendants as the most precious and valuable discovery, which alone could make them amends for the misery and destruction he had entailed upon them. But whatever care might have been taken to communicate this doctrine, we soon find that it was not duly attended to, nor long remembered. For we read, that when men began to multiply upon the earth, impiety and irreligion kept pace with the increase of mankind, so as to corrupt the sons of God—even those who had received this original principle of a religious faith. There were some however of the race of Seth who preserved their faith and integrity. And among these there is one in particular, who seems to have been a sign given to this sensual and unbelieving generation, for the very purpose of recalling to their minds the sense of a future state, under the form in which it had been revealed to our first parent. Enoch was translated without passing through the gates of death, in testimony of the efficacy of that faith by which he walked with God. And this translation was an unexceptionable evidence to the unbelievers of those days, that there is a reward in another state for the righteous. And not only so, but it was at the same time a direct proof and a memorial, that the bodies as well as the souls of men are capable of being admitted into the mansions of the blessed; and that it was the purpose of the Almighty, that the entire man, both in body and soul, should be received into those everlasting habitations. Why Enoch was translated alive, and not raised from the dead, which may seem to be a proof more directly in point of the thing supposed to be intended, there is an obvious reason: as the great Redeemer was to be the author, so he must of necessity have been the first-fruits of the resurrection to a life immortal.

But convincing and alarming as this wonderful event was, such is the unhappy state of things, that when iniquity and vice give strength to each other, divine revelations of every kind are disregarded. Even the judgments of God, how dreadful soever they may be, will not make any lasting impression upon the hearts of men. For in a few ages after the deluge, there were but a small number that were found faithful among the descendants of Noah. The most illustrious of these was Abraham. And God was pleased to confirm his faith, by giving him a more distinct view of the resurrection to life, than had been given perhaps to any of his progenitors.

God had revealed to Abraham explicit his seed, all the nations and families of the earth should be blessed; and that the person through whom this blessing would be conveyed from him was his son Isaac. Yet he is commanded to sacrifice this very son of his affections and hopes, while he was a youth, and before he had any offspring; and he readily obeys the command. And a very rational act of obedience it was in one who had frequent intercourse by visions, appearances, and revelations with the Almighty God; and who had received this very son by an extraordinary instance of the divine favour, contrary to his own expectations and belief, and to the usual course of nature. He had therefore grounds sufficient to assure him that the command was from God, and to induce him to believe, that, if God intended to convey the blessing to mankind through the loins of Isaac, he would most undoubtedly, for this purpose, raise him up from the dead. This was the faith of Abraham, which removed all difficulties and doubts in obeying the command of the Lord of life and death. But there was something more in this matter. In the trial of Abraham's faith, there was, moreover, a strong confirmation of it. The Epistle to the Hebrews (xi. 19.) informs us, that he received his son raised from the dead to life again, ἐκ νεκρῶν—a word which Hesychius defines to be παραμύτην ὁμοιωσις, a similitude of facts. And there is in this case such an exact and minute correspondence, in many very remarkable particulars, betwixt the facts, betwixt the transaction relating to Isaac, and what happened to our Saviour, that the former has generally been understood by the Christian church, in all ages, to have been a typical representation of the sacrifice and resurrection of Christ. The only question is, whether Abraham apprehended it to be such? The words spoken by God upon another occasion may not improperly be applied to this: Shall I hide from Abraham that thing which I do—seeing that all the nations of the earth shall be blessed in him? (Gen. xviii. 17, 18.) And that it was not hid from him, we have the plain declaration of our Saviour himself, when Abraham rejoiced to see my day, and was glad. (John,

viii. 56.) The day of Christ, or the day of the Lord, in other places of the New Testament, always signifies the day of the general resurrection; but here it denotes that important day, whereon he gained himself the victory over sin and death, and triumphed openly over him that had the power of death, even the old serpent, by his own resurrection. For what other circumstance can we suppose Abraham to have seen in Christ's appearance upon earth, beside his resurrection, that could have filled him, as the original words import, with an exultation and tumult of joy from the expectation of seeing it, and with a more temperate joy, corrected, as we may well suppose, by the preceding prospect of Christ's humiliation, when he saw it? “Ὁ γὰρ λόγος τοῦ θεοῦ ἔγενετο καὶ ἰδὲ, καὶ ἔχρη.” Here then we learn, from the obvious sense of our Saviour's words, that when Abraham received his son raised from the dead to life again, in the same typical sense in which he offered him up, the whole transaction was exhibited to him as an explanation of the blessing which was to give life to the whole world.

The same faith in the resurrection of the dead was preserved by pious and good men, and declared by them in the strongest terms at proper intervals of time, when it seems to have wanted a revival. The book of Job is supposed, upon good grounds, to have been written before the law was given by Moses. In this book there is a passage, wherein, if we should suppose Job to have been called upon to have declared his belief in a resurrection, (which seems to have been the case,) he could not possibly have made use of clearer or stronger terms. They are indeed so very clear and strong, that this, I apprehend, has been a principal reason why some learned men have forced them into another sense; from an imagination, that the very best men of those times could not have had so perfect and adequate a conception, as we there find, of that life and immortality which was to be brought to light by the gospel. This matter will be considered in its proper place. In the mean time, let it be observed, that if Job meant only to declare his persuasion of the recovery of his health and happiness in this life, why does he so often renounce this hope in the most pathetic strains of despair? Why does he cry out, Wherefore is light given to him that is in misery, and life to the bitter in soul? which long for death, but it cometh not, and dig for it more than for hid treasures? Why does he say, Mine eyes shall no more see good; the eye of him that hath seen me, shall see me no more; thine eyes are upon me, and I am not. These, and many more of the same kind, are evidently the lamentations of a man who had no prospect of finding any relief from his miseries on this side the grave. And for this despondency and repining, he is charged by Eliphaz, (chap. xv.) with want of religious faith; with having cast off the fear of God; for he believeth not, saith he, that he shall return out of darkness. On the same account he is charged by Bildad (chap. xviii.) with knowing not God. These accusations brought from him, in his reply, (chap. xix.) a confession of his faith, which he introduces with a solemn prayer, that it might be engraved in the rock, and continue for an everlasting memorial to all generations. The sense of this remarkable confession I shall give in a short and strict paraphrase of the text, from the authority of very able and judicious critics. "I know for certainty that my Redeemer liveth, and that he shall at last, or in the last day, arise with power over the dust, that dust out of which man was made. Then shall this dilacerated body put on a new clothing. Vechar yori nikkepah zôth. Alia erit cutis mea huc laceratio." So the words are read and translated by Michaelis. "And from my own body shall I see God; whom I shall see for myself; with mine own eyes shall I behold him; nor shall I then be a man different from myself." This was the root of the matter found in him—the foundation and support of Job's integrity. And here we have the resurrection of the one identical body, so as to constitute the same individual person, asserted in as clear and strong a manner as language is capable of doing it.

We must not expect to find any thing relating to this subject in those historical books of the Old Testament, which give an account of the civil affairs of the Jews, and the institution and settlement of their commonwealth. Only we must observe, that their whole economy, and the great events which happened to them, especially their deliverance from Egyptian bondage, and their settlement in the land of Canaan, were types and figures of better things to come; their ultimate views being thereby directed to that great deliverance, and that heavenly Canaan, which had been the object of the faith of all holy men from the beginning of the world.

Under what notion this faith was still retained in the days of David, we may learn from the 16th Psalm, where he makes mention of the resurrection of the body in very express terms. Thou shalt not leave my soul in hell, i. e. my life in the grave, neither shalt thou suffer thy Holy One to see corruption. The latter part of the words confines this text to the person of Christ, who saw no corruption, which David himself did. But he who had a prophetic view of Christ's resurrection, cannot be supposed not to have known the design and effects of it, but must have looked upon it as the pledge and assurance of his own. The belief of it is likewise very clearly expressed in the 49th Psalm, which is ushered in by a solemn call for the attention of all mankind, as being the concern of all. The Psalmist first observes, that irreligious men, however great and powerful, had no power to redeem a brother from the grave, "that he should live for ever and not see corruption." They could not pay the price of this redemption. He then tells them, that notwithstanding their pride and presumption, they would be laid in the grave like sheep; death should feed upon them, and the righteous, in their turn, should have dominion over them in the morning of their resurrection; for God, saith he, will redeem my soul, or life, from the power of the grave, for he shall receive me.

In a few descents after David, the Jews in general had well nigh abandoned the faith and hopes of their forefathers. Therefore God was pleased to give them the same sign in Elijah for the same purpose, as had been given to the Antediluvians in Enoch. They received, likewise, about this time, the most explicit declarations of the resurrection from a prophet, who, from the clear view he had of the Messial's kingdom, and of the great events which were to establish and justify it, has been usually styled the Evangelical Prophet. I shall only produce two passages from Isaiah, with this previous observation; that the prophecies, which have an apparent reference to some particular circumstances of the Jewish state, are so expressed, as to carry our views to some other more important object, for the sake of which that state was at first erected, and was all along conducted and preserved by a particular providence. And it is most evident, that in many parts of his prophecies, descriptions are given of a future glorious state, which cannot correspond with the state of things in this world, under any of the dispensations of Providence, which have yet appeared, and which hitherto are manifestly incomplete, and preparatory only to that great event which is to be the consummation of all things.

In the 26th chapter of Isaiah, verse 19, are these words: Thy dead men shall live, together with my dead body shall they arise. Awake and sing, for that dwell in the dust, for thy dew is as the dew of heaven, and the earth shall cast out the dead. And again, in the 21st verse, The earth also shall disclose her blood, and shall no more cover her slain. Suppose these texts to have a relation to the general resurrection, as the Jewish interpreters apply them, and every word is plain and significant: but suppose them to mean no more than the deliverance of Jerusalem from the Assyrians, or any other deliverance of the Jews, and the expression must appear much to overcharge the sense.

But there is another very remarkable passage in Isaiah, which well deserves our attention. You will find it in the last chapter of his prophecies. He had given, in the 53d chapter, a prophetic description of the sufferings and death of Christ; and had he been to have written an historical account of them after the events, he could not have done it with a greater exactness and precision. He there mentions likewise his coming to life again; he shall see his seed, and shall prolong his days. In several of the following chapters, he mentions the creation of new heavens and a new earth, and describes the felicity of them in such expressions as can only suit the future pacific state of the Messial's kingdom. After this, in the close of his prophecies, he introduces, with a solemnity suitable to their importance, the following words, as an acclamation from the city, as a voice from the temple, as a voice of the Lord. Before she travailed, she brought forth; before her pains came, she was delivered of a man child. Who hath heard such a thing? who hath seen such things? Shall the earth be made to bring forth in one day; or shall a nation be born at once? for as soon as Zion travailed, she brought forth her children. Shall I bring to the birth, and not cause to bring forth, saith the Lord? Shall I cause to bring forth, and shut the womb, saith thy God? Apply this passage to any subsequent deliverances of the Jews—to their return from the Babylonish captivity—or to their recovery from the desolations of Antiochus; or apply it to the great and sudden increase of the Christian church, on the first preaching of the gospel; and what agreement can you find in either case betwixt the prophecy and the events? In the former application, who was the man child that the earth was to bring forth before her general delivery? How was a nation born at once, and in one day, when those deliverances were the work of time, attended with difficulties, interruptions, and delays, partial and incomplete? How is it, that such a thing was never seen or heard of before, when the deliverance of this very people from their bondage in Egypt was much more miraculous and astonishing? In the latter application, though we read of three thousand being made proselytes to the gospel in one day, yet how small a proportion did the Jewish converts in general bear to the unconverted part of their nation? In the Gentile world, the conversion was slower, and the disproportion greater. In either case, great force must be used to give an improper sense to the words which is not in any proportionate degree reconcilable to facts. But apply them to the resurrection of Christ, and the sudden uninterrupted resurrection of the universal church of God, to which this prophecy is limited, in consequence of it, and every word is pertinent, expressive, and emphatical. This scene, we are told, will be disclosed, when the glory of the Gentiles shall have flown in, and all the Jews shall be brought as an offering to the Lord from all nations; and then it is that our Saviour likewise has told us, the end shall come (Matt. xxiv. 14.) when, according to this prophecy, this new-raised seed, and the new heavens, and the new earth, shall appear and remain together. And farther still, what leaves us no room to doubt of the sense of this passage, is our Lord's repeated application of the very words, which Isaiah makes use of to express the vengeance of God upon the ungodly in the end of this prophecy, to the final punishment of them in the day of judgment—Their worm shall not die, neither shall their fire be quenched. The other part of the prophecy therefore must, by parity of application, relate to the joyful resurrection of the church of God.

Your own reading and observation will suggest to you, that I have omitted many passages in the inspired writings of the Old Testament, which would have thrown light upon the subject before us; having only selected some of the principal testimonies, at different periods, sufficient to confirm the fact which I have endeavoured to establish, that the church of God has, in all ages, embraced the doctrine of a future state, under the notion of the resurrection of the body.

That the same sentiments continued after these times, we have the evidence of the apocryphal writers. I shall only extract two passages from them, which come up fully to the point. In the second book of Esdras, God is introduced, as giving directions to the Jews, in several points of their religious conduct; one of which enjoins the pious care of their dead: Wheresoever thou findest the dead, take them, and bury them, and I will give thee the first place in my resurrection. (Verse 23.) And agreeably to this, Judas is said, in the second book of Maccabæus, xii. 43. to have taken up the bodies of the slain and buried them, in that he was mindful of the resurrection.

When our blessed Saviour came into the world, he found the Jews in possession of the same opinion. None but the Sadducees, who were distinguished more by their rank than by their numbers, had renounced it. And this they did in consequence of their disbelief of any future state at all. For they conceived, as the rest of the Jews did, that the doctrine of a future state implied the doctrine of a resurrection. That this doctrine was received by all other Jews, we have the testimony of St. Paul, in his apology before king Agrippa. I stand, says he, and am judged for the hope of the promise made of God unto our fathers; unto which promise our Twelve Tribes, the whole body of the Jews, instantly serving God day and night, hope to come. (Acts, xxvi. 6, 7.) What this promise was, is clearly intimated in the words immediately following: Why should it be thought a thing incredible, that God should raise the dead? I may farther observe, that this passage, which mentions the resurrection as a promise made by God unto the fathers, is likewise a support of the general argument of this discourse. And I shall now close the whole evidence produced in this case, with St. Paul's express confirmation of it in another place, viz. the 11th chapter of his Epistle to the Hebrews. He there declares, that the faith of all the pious and good men, who had lived from the beginning of the world, and which had supported many of them in their integrity against all the cruelties and tortures that malicious wickedness could invent, rested upon this principle, "that they might obtain a better resurrection."

But it may be asked, how is this doctrine consistent with the assertion, that life and immortality were brought to light by the gospel, through the resurrection of Christ, and the preaching of his Apostles? I answer, that the expression of being brought to light, according to the true import of the original word φανω, does not mean the first discovery of a thing, but the throwing a clearer and stronger light upon it. The Patriarchs saw, by faith, what was shewn to them at a distance, through prophecies and types, which were to them as lights, directing their eyes to heaven, though shining in a dark place, till the Day-star arose, and diffused a brighter and more general light. The true state of the case is this : in all the ancient notices given of a resurrection, there is likewise an intimation given, that it should be brought to pass by a person who should appear in the world with power, to abolish death and regain his conquests. The whole, indeed, of this wonderful dispensation had not been revealed. That a redemption from the grave, and a great salvation, was to be wrought by the Messiah, for the people of God, was foretold, believed, and expected. But that it had been determined in the fore-knowledge and counsels of God, even before the world began, that an atonement should be made for the sins of the whole world, by the sacrifice of his only-begotten Son, and immortality restored, by the power of his resurrection, to all mankind, this was a mystery kept secret from men and angels, before it was revealed in the accomplishment. The superior knowledge, therefore, gained in this point, by the Christian revelation, lies in this : that we have actually seen the confirmation of the promises given to the fathers by the coming of the great Redeemer himself : that, by having raised himself from the grave, we now that he has the power of the resurrection, and is, as he emphatically styles himself, the resurrection and the life ; and that, by his resurrection, he has indeed gained and proclaimed the victory over the great enemy of mankind, which was foretold from the beginning of the world, and expected by the church of God through all the ages of it. They looked for immortality through a Redeemer, by promise : we have seen the Redeemer himself, and through him have the covenant of immortality actually conveyed to us.

The result of all that has been said, is this : When the Apostles preached Jesus and the resurrection, they preached no novel doctrine. These had been the desire and the expectation of ages. All the pious and good men that ever lived, who retained the religion of their first parent, and looked for the redemption, of which he had received the promise, expected their part in it by means of a Redeemer, who, through the mighty power of God, would raise their bodies again from the dust, to a life incorruptible and immortal. So that, when we profess to believe in the resurrection of the body, we profess the primitive faith of the church of God ; and we embrace the doctrine of a future state, under the same notion, that all, who were willing to receive eternal life as the gift of God, ever did embrace it, namely, that of the re-union of the soul and body after death. And, as our Lord's resurrection fulfilled the promises given to the preceding generations, so these promises, recorded in the sacred writings, are a standing confirmation of the evidence of those eye-witnesses upon which the faith and hopes of the succeeding generations were established. They cannot have a stronger support than one which was nearly coeval with the world, has subsisted through all the ages of it, and has all the strength that the concurrence of human and divine testimony can give to any article of faith.

There is yet one more important observation to be made. The gospel informs us, that the resurrection will be general : that all men shall rise again with their bodies, and shall give account for their own works. Not only the righteous, of which the true church of God has in all ages consisted, shall be raised to life eternal, but the wicked also shall go into everlasting punishment. How greatly, therefore, does it concern us all, so to prepare ourselves against this tremendous day, that we may be able to give our accounts with joy ! that when the trumpet shall sound, and the dead shall be raised incorruptible, and we shall all be changed, in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, we may be found to have qualified ourselves both in body and soul, by virtue and holiness, and every Christian grace that can purify and refine our nature, for that glorious transfiguration which will make us like unto the angels of God in heaven, and fit us for an admission into the presence of God, where there is the fulness of joy, and pleasure inconceivable for evermore.

MATT. vi. 28.

Consider the lilies of the field, how they grow.

THERE is nothing which can fill the mind of man with a more noble and exalted pleasure than the contemplation of the wonderful works of the creation; as there is nothing which can give greater proof of a contracted and abject spirit, than to be daily conversant with, and yet stupidly insensible of, the amazing miracles of nature. The world was not made by a wise and beneficent Creator; that the wonders of it should open themselves to eyes that see not, or display themselves unregarded to its incurious inhabitants. It is indeed principally for the pleasure of him by whom all things exist, that they are, and were created; who rejoiceth in his works—in surveying that structure which Omnipotence alone could raise. But they are likewise designed to communicate happiness, not only in the sensual gratification, but in the intellectual and moral improvement of mankind. To the mind that can relish enjoyments superior to those of sense, they will afford the most rational entertainment; and to him that is not barely satisfied with a fruitless admiration of things, they will suggest such reflections as will make him both wiser and better. At the same time that they feast his imagination, they will enlarge his understanding and meliorate his heart.

Whatever part of the creation we cast our eyes upon, we shall find written therein ample lessons of instruction. Would we contemplate and adore the inexpressible greatness and majesty of the Most High, let us look up unto the heavens, which are spread over us like a curtain: they loudly declare the glory of God, and the firmament sheweth his handy work. It openly sheweth it even to the rude and illiterate; and the mind, which is improved by science, may for ever expand itself in the immensity of the prospect.—If we descend to this lower world, what a scene discloses itself for rational and religious contemplation? The earth hangeth, in Job's expression, upon nothing; and by an invisible hand is directed to perform its revolutions, so as to diversify the seasons in their order, and give a regular succession of light and heat to cherish every part of the globe. How beautifully is the surface of it clothed in a green vesture, grateful to the eye, and pouring forth sustenance to man and to the creatures subservient to his use! There is not a single part of it, or a living thing that moveth upon the face of it, from which we may not gather instruction, if we will follow the method of reasoning frequently made use of in holy writ. Various parts of the irrational and inanimate creation are held forth by the wisdom of God, to direct the beings of reason in the way that they should go. The prophet reproves the ingratitude of the rebellious Israelites, by upbraiding them with the dutiful behaviour and fidelity of domestic animals. The ox, says he, knoweth his owner, and the ass his master's crib; but Israel doth not know, my people will not consider. And the wise man sends the indolent and slothful to learn industry from the example of an inconsiderable insect; Go, says he, to the ant, thou sluggard, consider her ways and be wise. Our blessed Saviour descends to a yet lower class in the scale of nature, and frequently sets before us even things inanimate, to convey us to the most important and useful lessons of divine instruction. In his parables he makes use of the lifeless emblems, of seed sown, of a fig-tree, of a grain of mustard-seed, to disclose the mysteries of the kingdom of heaven. And in my text, and the verses before it, not merely by way of illustration, but as a precept to instruct, and as a motive to persuade, he directs his disciples to look up to the fowls of the air, and observe how they are fed, and to consider the lilies of the field, how they grow.

The particular instruction they were to learn from the fowls of the air, to depend upon God for sustenance; and from the lilies of the field, to have a like dependance upon him for raiment, seems to have been peculiar to the singular circumstances of his disciples. As they were to be engaged in an office which would sequester them altogether from the busy affairs of the world, they were to throw themselves entirely upon the care of Providence, and not to concern themselves about making provision for their support in the usual way, necessary for the rest of mankind. They were not to provide gold, or silver, or brass, in their purses; nor scrip for their journey; neither two coats; neither shoes nor yet staves. They were to trust for the supply of all their wants to God's more immediate care, who knew that the workman was worthy of his meat, and would not fail to feed and clothe them as providentially as he fed the ravens and clothed the lilies. Our situation and circumstances being very different from theirs, and the application of the command in the text belonging to us no further than as a caution against anxious and immoderate concern for the things of this life, in distrust of God's good providence, I shall consider it in a more enlarged view. And because, at this particular season (being the days of rogation) we are directed to admonish the people to behold the natural produce of the earth in that variety of plants, and grains, and fruits, with which the surface of it is overspread, and to give thanks to God, in beholding them, for their increase and abundance, from whence arises such an ample provision for the sustenance, accommodation, and gratification of man, I shall extend the precept of considering the lilies of the field, how they grow, to the consideration of the growth of all those other products of the earth, which are raised from it in the same wonderful manner, by the all-bountiful hand of God.

This subject will furnish us with a variety of religious reflections. And, in the first place, it will lead us to admire and adore the infinite power, and wisdom, and goodness of God.

I. There is not a single creature in the universe that is not wonderfully made. All its constituent parts are put together with the most exact symmetry, and the most perfect contrivance. The more minutely and accurately they are examined, the more finished they appear, and disgrace every admired work of the most ingenious human artificer. Every object that is most familiar to us, every common appearance in nature, is the effect of a miraculous power. The formation and growth of a plant is to us an inexplicable mystery. A blade of corn or a spire of grass is not only beyond the power of man to produce or imitate, but it will defy the researches of the most subtle philosopher to account for or explain the manner of its existence. Who can take upon him to shew how the several particles of matter, collected from all the various elements, and suited to this particular purpose, arrange themselves, and gradually and imperceptibly unite in that wonderful order, which is necessary for the structure of every plant, according to the laws which the great Author of nature has prescribed them? Who can survey in this structure of them without amazement, the infinite number of fibres and fine vessels that are discoverable in every plant; the curious disposition of all these; the ways and channels contrived for the reception and distribution of nourishment; the effect this nourishment has, in extending its parts and bringing it to its full growth and expansion; in repairing its annual decays and preserving life? How wonderful is their propagation? With what contrivance and care are their seeds brought up to maturity? And how amazing is their increase for the preservation of every species, that none of the works of God, how perishable soever in their nature, might be blotted out of the creation? And where is the store-house of this infinite variety and number of seeds? Are they laid up for use in the great magazine of water, which Thales thought to be the principle and seminary of all things? If so; of what shape, dimensions, and contrivance are those invisible strainers, peculiar to every distinct species of plants, which admit no other than their own proper seeds for the invariable continuance of all the tribes of them, without the least confusion, as they came originally out of the hands of their Maker; insomuch, that the seed of the smallest herb that creepeth upon the wall, cannot find an entrance into the spacious branches of the cedar of Lebanon? Or does every seed inclose in its little seedplant another seed, and so on continually, insomuch, that as many trees or plants are contained in it as might be produced to the end of the world? Impossible as it is for us to represent to our imagination such an inconceivable number and minuteness, yet there is no impossibility in the thing itself; as may evidently appear from this very just observation of an ingenious naturalist; viz. "That those who are accustomed to exercise themselves in natural and mathematical sciences, know that they can seldom go far without meeting something infinite; as if the Author of nature had been pleased to fix the seal of his chief property upon all his works." But to proceed:

As the frame and texture of plants is so admirably well contrived for the reception of proper nourishment, and the conveyance of it to every part, so the manner of their being supplied therewith is no less miraculous. Their roots would neither fix themselves in the earth, nor their fibres branch out, nor their vessels swell, nor their leaves unfold themselves, did not the vapours ascend and form themselves above in clouds, and fall again by condensation, in order to feed the plants below with wholesome dews and showers, which descend in drops as from a watering pot upon a garden. The consideration of this kindly source of the earth's fertility, called forth these melodious strains from the sweet singer of Israel;—Thou visitest the earth and blessest it; thou makest it very plentiful. Thou waterest her furrows, thou sendest rain into the little valleys thereof; thou makest it soft with the drops of rain; and blessest the increase of it. Thou crownest the year with thy goodness, and thy clouds drop fatness.—All these things are wonderful, and they only cease to be so by being obvious and familiar. It is the regular course of what we call nature, that excludes the author and conductor of it from our thoughts; and we are seldom disposed to think upon God, till we are awakened and alarmed by something unusual and astonishing.

But wisdom will listen to the still voice of nature; and in surveying the works of God, will find out their Maker in all of them. We cannot indeed by searching find out the Almighty to perfection, nor can we in any wise comprehend the amazing mechanism of his works; but by a due contemplation of them, we shall arrive at a knowledge more proper and useful for us: we shall be taught to discern, magnify, and adore the great Creator, who is mighty beyond imagination in power and in wisdom, whose ways are unsearchable, and whose contrivance is in the formation of the minutest herb past finding out.

And if the wonderful contrivance in the structure of every single plant, will lead us to a pious and holy adoration of the power and wisdom of him that is thus mighty in operation, how shall we worthily magnify and bless the goodness of God, who, with a bountiful hand, has scattered that beautiful and useful variety of them over the face of the whole

Whatever can contribute to the service or pleasure of man; whatever is necessary for the comfort as well as the support of life; the earth brings forth in abundance, and pays as a tribute to man, to whom dominion is given over all that is therein. How is the surface of it spread over, "as a table well furnished with a variety of delicate herbs, fruits, and grains, to nourish our bodies, to please our tastes, to enliven our spirits, and to cure our diseases!" God himself at the creation of them was graciously pleased to declare, that for the use of man, and for his nourishment and support, they were all originally designed. Behold, says he to Adam, I have given you every herb, bearing seed, which is upon the face of all the earth, and every tree in which is the fruit of a tree bearing seed, to you it shall be for meat. How gracious is the Lord and merciful to be thus mindful of man, whilst he is too often regardless of his benefactor; and who bountifully fills the mouths of those who forget to think of him, and to praise him for his goodness to the children of men. Though he opens the doors of heaven, and rains down plenty upon the earth, though the clouds drop fatness, and the valleys stand so thick with corn, that they shall laugh and sing, yet how frequently does the ingratitude of man receive this profusion of goodness, without once reflecting upon the hand that scatters it, or blessing the Author of the increase!

But we have still greater reason to adore the bountiful Creator of all things, in that he has not only commanded the earth largely to supply us with the necessities of life for our comfortable subsistence, but even with a superfluity of delicacies for our delight. How are our senses, those inlets of pleasure, regaled with the enjoyment of the kind entertainments nature sets before us! How comfortable and refreshing is the fragrancy of herbs and flowers and spices to the smell! How pleasing is the delicacy of plants and fruits to the organs of taste! And what spectacles of delight do every where present themselves to our eyes, in the cheerful verdure and gay embroidery of the fields! If we consider the lilies, how they grow, and reflect that they put on their beautiful raiment and perfume the air to gratify our senses, to entertain our fancy, and to multiply our innocent pleasures, surely some reasonable sentiments should arise, some returns of acknowledgement and gratitude should be paid to our indulgent Creator, who has diversified and embellished the scene for our better entertainment and refreshment in our passage, in our weary pilgrimage through life.

II. But there is another reflection to succeed, which will darken the scene, and cast a shade over the objects we behold. Thankful as we ought to be to God's good providence, for having placed us in a fruitful land, and pleasant habitation, yet we must remember, that the earth is not that paradise which once it was. It has undergone a melancholy change; and we ought never to be unmindful of the cause of it, nor can we sufficiently detest it. It was sin, alas! that introduced this deplorable alteration, and at once corrupted man, and deformed the world.—God created man, and placed him in Eden, the garden of delights; where the ground of its own accord satisfied every desire, and supplied him with all the luxuries of nature. Labour was unnecessary to cultivate,

(except so much of "the sweet garden toil, as made ease more easy,") and art was superfluous to adorn his possessions. The earth was obedient to the commands of God, which prevented his pains; and the same Providence which formed the garden, would have preserved it in its original perfection. It was all his own. The Lord God, to shew his unlimited bounty and goodness to man, had commanded him, saying, of every tree in the garden thou mayest freely eat; only as an acknowledgement of the dependence he had upon his Creator, and as a test of his obedience, from tasting of one particular fruit he was debarred; of the tree of knowledge of good and evil thou shalt not eat, for in the day that thou eatest thereof thou shalt surely die. But man did eat, and the terrible consequences immediately ensued. Cursed be the ground for thy sake; in sorrow shalt thou eat of it all the days of thy life; thorns also and thistles shall it bring forth unto thee, and thou shalt eat the herb of the field: in the sweat of thy brow shalt thou eat bread, till thou return unto the ground. This dreadful punishment of Adam's transgression is so deeply rooted in the earth, that it is felt in no small degree, by his wretched posterity, to this day. For however ingenious or plausible the opinion may be, which is founded in Lamech's giving the name of Noah to his son, (Gen. v. 29.) importing comfort concerning the work and toil of his hands, because of the ground which the Lord had cursed, and which supposes, that the curse was actually taken off from the ground in his days, yet it is far from being reconcileable to present appearances. The life of the husbandman contradicts this notion, which is not a life of pleasing exercise and amusement, but of toil and travail. Those whose employment it is to till the ground will tell you, that they rise up early and go late to rest, and daily undergo great pains and weariness to force a subsistence from the earth. It is by the sweat of their brows that we gain our bread; and, after all, how often is their labour vain, and their expectations blasted, by unfruitful seasons, and the ungrateful barrenness of the soil! Hence are the cries of thousands for their daily bread, and the land becomes solitary through famine. I cannot upon this occasion omit the observation of a curious foreign writer upon the subject of the products of the earth, viz. "That the earth seems to have preserved its whole strength, nor does its fruitfulness appear by any means to be diminished with respect to its production of thorns and thistles, and an infinite number of other ill weeds; but that it grows weak and lean, and wants reparation and recruit in the produce of corn and those herbs that are necessary for our food and sustenance." How this come to pass, he owns he cannot conceive; nor indeed is it to be accounted for upon any natural principles. Nothing but the original curse of the ground announced a second time unto Cain, in these words, it shall not henceforth yield unto thee her strength, could have given us the true solution of this remarkable phenomenon. The use to be made of these reflections is apparent and obvious. They shew the malignant nature of sin, and how odious it is in the sight of God. They ought therefore to fill us with the utmost abhorrence and detestation of it, since it has, by the righteous judgment of God, deformed the face of nature, and introduced all the labour, and toil, and trouble, that is in the world. Nay, the consequences of it have been still more pernicious; sin is the parent of diseases and death.

III. This will suggest a third reflection arising from the subject before us. When the life of man is frequently in scripture compared to a short-lived plant; when all flesh is said to be grass, and the goodliness thereof as the flower of the field, we readily agree to the comparison, and allow the emblem to be just. The beginning, and progress, and end of human life, resemble the origin, and growth and decay of a plant. We both of us, at first, arose from one common parent—the earth; into which we shall be again resolved, for dust we are, and to dust shall we return. If we are not blasted in the bud of life; or if, through the weakness of the frame and constitution, we are not bowed down again to the ground, still as we grow up, we are continually exposed to the storms and tempests that beat upon us and break us down. Or should we be permitted to arrive at our full proportion of strength and height, and escape those diseases which impair our bloom, and those accidents which lie in wait to destroy us, yet in the course of nature how soon do our organs decay, are the fountains of life dried up, do our honours fall from our heads, and we languish, fade, and die! These reflections, we must be convinced, belong equally to the whole human race. No station, or condition, or age, is out of the reach of the comparison. The great and the mighty fall like other men; nor are they more safe from violence than from natural death; as the tallest tree in the forest is oftentimes torn up by winds, or shivered by lightning. The decays of age are visible to every eye; nor is the vigour of youth secure against the sudden stroke of noxious and pestilential blasts. A reasonable admonition this to check all vain and self-flattering thoughts in the young, the gay, and the florid! Let them take in the whole of the comparison, and they will know, that if they resemble the lily in its beautiful raiment and appearance, they resemble it likewise too nearly in duration. In the morning they grow up and flourish, in the evening they wither—how sorrowful are the remembrances, that even long before the evening of life, they are often scorched and die!

IV. The last observation I shall make is this: That as the consideration of the plants and flowers of the field will furnish us with a striking picture of man's mortality, so, on the other hand, it will suggest to him the comfortable assurance of his restoration to another life. When we see the annual returns of cold shut up the passages of life in plants, and deprive them of that supply of juices which caused them to grow up and flourish on the earth; when the grass faileth, and there is no green thing, but every herb shall sicken and die, and every tree become a lifeless trunk; and yet when we behold them all revive at the return of the genial spring; when we see the face of the earth renewed in the same beautiful manner it was, and a new creation, as it were, open upon us; why should there be any physical difficulties in the doctrine of a resurrection? why should it be thought a thing incredible that God should raise the dead? Is it at all more difficult for him, by an extraordinary act of his almighty power, to collect the scattered particles of dust, and re-unite them in that order, symmetry, and proportion, which is requisite to form the human frame; than it is by a general law (which is only the constant but no less wonderful, operation of the same power) to recall the distant and undivided particles of inactive matter into such a disposition and arrangement, as shall give to a flower the same variegated complexion, and cause it to breathe the same essences it did before? The illustration which St. Paul uses in support of the doctrine of a resurrection, and likewise as an argument to put a stop to all vain and trifling disquisitions concerning the manner how it shall be brought to pass, is taken from a grain of corn, that is buried, dead, and corrupted in the earth, and yet shoots forth into new life, and has life more abundantly. But some man will say, how are the dead raised up, and with what body do they come? Thou fool! that which thou sowest is not quickened except it die. As if he had said, "Explain to me, if thou art able, the most common appearance in nature. Tell me, how the seed which thou sowest in the ground, and there moulders and rots, should, from an unknown and imperceptible principle, rise, as it were, again from the grave into new life, multiplied an hundred fold, without the least deviation from its own form and body? If thou canst not tell me this, why dost thou foolishly inquire concerning the incomprehensible ways of God in giving life to the dead; and why dost thou perplex thyself with impious doubts, in a matter which thy own experience and daily observation will teach thee is not to be conceived or explained?" This illustration of the case had been before made use of by our blessed Saviour himself, in John, xii. 24. Verily, verily, I say unto you, except a corn of wheat fall into the ground and die, it remaineth alone; but if it die, it bringeth forth much fruit. Which words, in their application to the resurrection of the dead, have, according to the observation of the religious philosopher, a very curious and remarkable propriety: "Whereas," says he, other seeds rise again out of the ground, and become seed-leaves of the plant; that of wheat is almost the only one in nature which dies in the earth; and therefore was the most proper emblem to represent the dissolution of man, and his revival."

The proofs of a resurrection stand upon the most solid and immoveable foundations; but arguments addressed to the ignorance of gainsayers, are very proper and sufficient to silence the petulance of bold and presumptuous inquirers, who dare to call in question the almighty power of God in the restoration of life, and yet cannot but see something analogous to it, and equally incomprehensible, in the most common productions of nature.—Let the false pretender to philosophy distract himself with needless questions, which are far above the reach of the human capacity to resolve. The good and humble Christian can easily satisfy himself, by leaving every inexplicable difficulty to God himself, whose infinite power over the works of his own hands is not to be measured or limited by the narrow conceptions of vain and aspiring man.

But where natural knowledge fails, that which is religious will still abound. We have enough of the former to answer all the purposes of life, and that is sufficient for us. Nevertheless, we ought to improve ourselves in it by contemplation and study; for though it will be still defective, and leave many things utterly unknown to us, yet the further we advance in it, the greater wonders we shall discover in all the works of God, and shall be led thereby to a more enlarged knowledge and devout adoration of his being and attributes, of his inconceivable power, and wisdom, and goodness.

And as the wisdom of God has thought fit in his holy word to draw variety of religious instructions from the consideration of his works, and frequently sends us to learn our duty from the irrational and inanimate parts of the creation, we ought not to be ashamed to go to the school of nature, and to get understanding from the fowls of the air and the lilies of the field; since they are able to read us wise lectures of morality, and to improve us even in the virtues of a Christian. They will teach us dependence upon Providence, and gratitude to it for our daily support, for the regular supplies of food and raiment. They will teach us a lesson which many of the philosophers could not teach us, that we are not only the constant, but the peculiar care of Providence; and that if a sparrow doth not fall to the ground without his notice, how much more will he have a watchful eye over his favourite creature man, and not suffer him to wander unnoticed, unguided, unprotected! They will teach us what all should remember, and are all apt to forget, how frail we are, how precarious our existence is in this world, how momentary our duration. But they will also teach us, that life will rise out of corruption; that we shall spring up with fresh recruits from the grave, like seed buried in the ground; and shall be invested with light in more glorious raiment than the lilies. Such knowledge as this lies open to the wayfaring man; it grows in every field, and meets us in all our paths. And it is the most important knowledge that the wisest of men can pursue or gain; it is that which will make us wise unto salvation."

Thoughts and meditations of this kind, though they are proper for all men who have the lively scenes of nature displayed before their eyes, are yet more peculiarly adapted to the situation of those, who not only enjoy the shades and serenity of an academical life, but whose studies are designed and well calculated to enlarge their views of nature, to discover the hand of God in his largest and minutest works, and to teach them to magnify and adore him in all the wonders of his creation. This is the employment and delight of the angels themselves, who sang hymns of praises when they were first brought forth, and must for ever rejoice in the contemplation of them, though doubtless they are, in many respects, too wonderful even for their comprehension. Surely then it must be a most rational, and pleasing, and honourable employment for those who have leisure and opportunity, to acquaint themselves with God in his works; and especially such as were made for the use, and convenience, and gratification of man.

It would be stupidity not to know the value of his gifts; and ingratitude, not to apply them with thankfulness to the purposes for which they were bestowed. And we should much undervalue them, were we to think, that they were given merely to satisfy the animal part of man, and not likewise for the much greater advantages of his improvement in his intellectual and moral endowments. They were designed to exercise, and open, and enlarge his mental faculties; and they will find ample employment for his most curious researches. But, after all, the pursuit of science, that bears no fruit, and tends to no wise end, is a vain and useless toil, and terminates in pride and folly. It is the religious application of knowledge that makes it valuable, and giveth true wisdom and understanding. Could we measure the heavens, and tell the number of the stars, and call them all by their names, without looking up to their Creator, and magnifying and adoring the immensity of his power, and wisdom, and goodness; our knowledge would be worse, and much more criminal, than ignorance. Or could we speak like Solomon of every herb, from the cedar which is in Lebanon, unto the hyssop that springeth out of the wall; could we recount the names of all their tribes, and distinguish all their properties; and should we yet overlook the hand and design of Providence in their formation, and not direct our contemplation of them to the praise and glory of God, we should only foolishly indulge a fruitless curiosity, and return empty and unfurnished from the spacious fields of science.

God is visible in all his works, and therefore let us glorify him in all. The heavens and the earth, the day and the night, summer and winter, the mountains and the valleys, fruitful trees and all cedars, and all green things upon the earth, proclaim his being and providence, do him homage, and praise him, and magnify him for ever. Such is the language of Scripture; but they can only supply materials of adoration to intelligent beings, and it is through the mouth of man that their songs of praise must be conveyed. Let us therefore magnify him with thanksgiving, tell of all his wondrous work, and sing praises unto him with understanding. Let us give utterance to all the works of nature, and we shall all speak the same language, and join with one voice in this triumphant acclamation, Great and marvellous are thy works, O Lord God Almighty; in wisdom hast thou made them all; the earth is full of thy riches! And worthy art thou, O Lord, to receive honour, and glory, and power; for thou hast created all things for thy glory; and for thy pleasure they are, and were created.

Now to God the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, the Creator, Redeemer, and Sanctifier, be rendered all honour, and glory, and praise, now and for evermore. Amen.

SERMON LXXVII.

By the Rt. Rev. JOSEPH BUTLER,
LL. D. Lord Bishop of Bristol.

JAMES, 1. 26.

If a man among you seem to be religious, and bridleth not his tongue, but deceiveth his own heart, this man's religion is vain.

THE translation of this text would be more determined by being more literal, thus: If any man among you seemeth to be religious, not bridling his tongue, but deceiving his own heart, this man's religion is vain. This determines that the words, but deceiveth his own heart, are not put in opposition to seemeth to be religious, but to bridleth not his tongue. The certain determinate meaning of the text then being, that he who seemeth to be religious, and bridleth not his tongue, but in that particular deceiveth his own heart, this man's religion is vain; we may observe somewhat very forcible and expressive in these words of St. James. As if the apostle had said, no man surely can make any pretences to religion, who doth not at least believe that he bridleth his tongue: if he puts on any appearance and face of religion, and yet does not govern his tongue, he must surely deceive himself in that particular, and think he does: and whoever is so unhappy as to deceive himself in this, to imagine he keeps that unruly faculty in due subjection, when indeed he does not, whatever the other part of his life be, his religion is vain; the government of the tongue being a most material restraint which virtue lays us under: without it no man can be truly religious. In treating upon this subject I will consider,

I. What is the general vice or fault here referred to: or what disposition in men is supposed in moral reflections and precepts concerning bridling the tongue.

II. When it may be said of any one, that he has a due government over himself in this respect.

I. Now the fault referred to, and the disposition supposed, in precepts and reflections concerning the government of the tongue, is not evil-speaking from malice, nor lying or bearing false witness from indirect selfish designs. The disposition to these, and the actual vices themselves, all come under other subjects. The tongue may be employed about, and made to serve, all the purposes of vice, in tempting and deceiving, in perjury and injustice. But the thing here supposed and referred to is talkativeness: a disposition to be talking, abstracted from the consideration of what is to be said, with very little or no regard to, or thought of doing, either good or harm. And let not any imagine this to be a slight matter, and that it deserves not to have so great weight laid upon it, till he has considered what evil is implied in it, and the bad effects which follow from it. It is perhaps true, that they who are addicted to this folly, would choose to confine themselves to trifles and indifferent subjects, and so intend only to be guilty of being impertinent: but as they cannot go on for ever talking of nothing, as common matters will not afford sufficient fund for perpetual continued discourse; when subjects of this kind are exhausted, they will go on to defamation, scandal, divulging of secrets, their own secrets as well as those of others, any thing rather than be silent. They are plainly hurried on in the heat of their talk to say quite different things from what they first intended, and which they afterwards wish unsaid; or improper things, which they had no other end in saying but only to afford employment to their tongue. And if these people expect to be heard and regarded, for there are some content merely with talking, they will invent, to engage your attention: and, when they have heard the least imperfect hint of an affair, they will out of their own head add circumstances of time and place, and other matters, to make out their story, and give the appearance of probability to it: not that they have any concern about being believed, otherwise than as a means of being heard. The thing is, to engage your attention; to take you up wholly for the present time; what reflections will be made afterwards, is in truth the least of their thoughts. And further, when persons, who indulge themselves in these liberties of the tongue, are in any degree offended with another, as little disgusts and misunderstandings will be, they allow themselves to define and revile such an one without any moderation or bounds; though the offence is so very slight, that they themselves would not do, nor perhaps wish him an injury in any other way. And in this case the scandal and revilings are chiefly owing to talkativeness, and not bridling their tongue; and so come under our present subject. The least occasion in the world will make the humour break out in this particular way, or in another. It is like a torrent, which must and will flow; but the least thing imaginable will first of all give it either this or another direction, turn it into this or that channel: or like a fire, the nature of which, when in a heap of combustible matter, is to spread and lay waste all around; but any one of a thousand little accidents will occasion it to break out first either in this or another particular part.

The subject then before us, though it does run up into, and can scarce be treated as entirely distinct from all others; yet it needs not be so much mixed or blended with them as it often is. Every faculty and power may be used as the instrument of premeditated vice and wickedness, merely as the most proper and effectual means of executing such designs. But if a man, from deep malice and desire of revenge, should meditate a falsehood with a settled design to ruin his neighbour's reputation, and should with great coolness and deliberation spread it, nobody would choose to say of such an one, that he had no government of his tongue. A man may use the faculty of speech as an instrument of false witness, who yet has so entire a command over that faculty, as never to speak but from forethought and cool design. Here the crime is injustice and perjury; and, strictly speaking, no more belongs to the present subject, than perjury and injustice in any other way. But there is such a thing as a disposition to be talking for its own sake; from which persons often say any thing, good or bad, of others, merely as a subject of discourse, according to the particular temper they themselves happen to be in, and to pass away the present time. There is likewise to be observed in persons such a strong and eager desire of engaging attention to what they say, that they will speak good or evil, truth or otherwise, merely as one or the other seems to be most hearkened to: and this, though it is sometimes joined, is not the same with the desire of being thought important and men of consequence. There is in some such a disposition to be talking, that an offence of the slightest kind, and such as would not raise any other resentment, yet raises, if I may so speak, the resentment of the tongue, puts it into a flame, into the most ungovernable motions. This outrage, when the person it respects is present, we distinguish in the lower rank of people by a peculiar term: and let it be observed, that though the decencies of behaviour are a little kept, the same outrage and virulence, indulged when he is absent, is an offence of the same kind. But not to distinguish any further in this manner: men run into faults and follies, which cannot so properly be referred to any one general head as this, that they have not a due government over their tongue.

And this unrestrained volubility and wantonness of speech is the occasion of numberless evils and vexations of life.

begets resentment in him who is the subject of it; sows the seed of strife and dissension amongst others; and inflames little disgusts and offences, which if let alone would wear away of themselves: it is often of as bad effect upon the good name of others, as deep envy or malice: and; to say the least of it in this respect, it destroys and perverts a certain equity of the utmost importance to society to be observed; namely, that praise and dispraise, a good or bad character, should always be bestowed according to desert. The tongue used in such a licentious manner is like a sword in the hand of a madman; it is employed at random, it can scarce possibly do any good, and for the most part does a world of mischief; and implies not only great folly and a trifling spirit, but great viciousness of mind, great indifference to truth and falsity, and to the reputation, welfare, and good of others. So much reason is there for what St. James says of the tongue, chap. iii. 5, 6. It is a fire, a world of iniquity; it depleth the whole body, setteth on fire the course of nature, and is itself set on fire of hell. This is the faculty or disposition which we are required to keep a guard upon: these are the vices and follies it runs into, when not kept under due restraint.

II. Wherein the due government of the tongue consists, or when it may be said of any one in a moral and religious sense that he bridleth his tongue, I come now to consider;

The due and proper use of any natural faculty or power, is to be judged of by the end and design for which it was given us. The chief purpose for which the faculty of speech was given to man, is plainly that we might communicate our thoughts to each other. in order to carry on the affairs of the world; for business, and for our improvement in knowledge and learning. But the good Author of our nature designed us not only necessaries, but likewise enjoyment and satisfaction, in that being he hath graciously given, and in that condition of life he hath placed us in. There are secondary uses of our faculties; they administer to delight, as well as to necessity, and as they are equally adapted to both, there is no doubt but he intended them for our gratification, as well as for the support and continuance of our being. The secondary use of speech is to please and be entertaining to each other in conversation. This is in every respect allowable and right: it unites men closer in alliances and friendships; gives us a fellow-feeling of the prosperity and happiness of each other, and is in several respects serviceable to virtue, and to promote good behaviour in the world. And provided there be not too much time spent in it, if it were considered only in the way of gratification and delight, men must have strange notions of God and of religion, to think that he can be offended with it, or that it is any way inconsistent with the strictest virtue. But the truth is, such sort of conversation, though it has no particular good tendency, yet it has a general good one: it is social and friendly, and tends to promote humanity, good nature, and civility.

As the end and use, so likewise the abuse, of speech, relates to the one or other of these; either to business or to conversation. As to the former, deceit in the management of business and affairs does not properly belong to the subject now before us: though one may just mention that multitude, that endless number, of words with which business is perplexed; when a much fewer would, as it should seem, better serve the purpose: but this must be left to those who understand the matter. The government of the tongue, considered as a subject of itself, relates chiefly to conversation: to that kind of discourse which usually fills up the time spent in friendly meetings, and visits of civility. And the danger is, lest persons entertain themselves and others at the expense of their wisdom and their virtue, and to the injury or offence of their neighbour. If they will observe and keep clear of these, they may be as free, and easy, and unreserved, as they can desire.

The cautions to be given for avoiding these dangers, and to render conversation innocent and agreeable, fall under the following particulars: silence; talking of indifferent things; and, which makes up too great a part of conversation, giving of characters ; speaking well or evil of others.

The wise man observes, that there is a time to speak, and a time to keep silence. One meets with people in this world, who seem never to have made the last of these observations. And yet these great talkers do not at all speak from their having any thing to say, as every sentence shews, but only from their inclination to be talking. Their conversation is merely an exercise of the tongue : no other human faculty has any share in it. It is strange these persons can help reflecting, that unless they have in truth a superior capacity, and are in an extraordinary manner furnished for conversation ; if they are entertaining, it is at their own expence. Is it possible, that it should never come into people's thoughts to suspect, whether or not it be to their advantage to shew so very much of themselves ? O that you would altogether hold your peace, and it should be your wisdom. Job, xlii. 5. Remember likewise there are persons who love fewer words, an inoffensive sort of people, and who deserve some regard, though of too still and composed tempers for you. Of this number was the son of Sirach : for he plainly speaks from experience when he says, As hills of sand are to the steps of the aged, so is one of many words to a quiet man. But one would think it should be obvious to every one, that when they are in company with their superiors of any kind, in years, knowledge, and experience ; when proper and useful subjects are discoursed of, which they cannot bear a part in ; that these are times for silence ; when they should learn to hear, and be attentive, at least in their turn. It is indeed a very unhappy way these people are in : they in a manner cut themselves out from all advantage of conversation, except that of being entertained with their own talk : their business in coming into company not being at all to be informed, to hear, to learn ; but to display themselves, or rather to exert their faculty, and talk without any design at all. And if we consider conversation as an entertainment, as somewhat to unbend the mind ; as a diversion from the cares, business, and the sorrows of life ; it is of the very nature of it, that the discourse be mutual. This, I say, is implied in the very notion of what we distinguish by conversation, or being in company. Attention to the continued discourse of one alone grows more painful often, than the cares and business we come to be diverted from. He therefore who imposes this upon us, is guilty of a double offence, arbitrarily enjoining silence upon all the rest, and likewise obliging them to this painful attention.

I am sensible these things are apt to be passed over, as too little to come into a serious discourse : but in reality men are obliged, even in point of morality and virtue, to observe all the decencies of behaviour. The greatest evils in life have had their rise from somewhat, which was thought of too little importance to be attended to. And as to the matter we are now upon, it is absolutely necessary to be considered. For if people will not maintain a due government over themselves, in regarding proper times and seasons for silence, but will be talking ; they certainly, whether they design it or not at first, will go on to scandal and evil-speaking, and divulging secrets.

If it were needful to say any thing further, to persuade men to learn this lesson of silence, one might put them in mind, how insignificant they render themselves by this excessive talkativeness : insomuch that, if they do chance to say any thing which deserves to be attended to and regarded, it is lost in the variety and abundance which they utter of another sort.

The occasions of silence then are obvious, and one would think should be easily distinguished by every body ; namely, when a man has nothing to say, or nothing, but what is better unsaid : better, either in regard to the particular persons he is present with ; or from its being an interruption to conversation itself ; or to conversation of a more agreeable kind ; or better, lastly, with regard to himself. I will end this paper with two reflections of the wise Pro- one of which, in the strongest manner exposes the ridiculous part of this licentiousness of the tongue; and the other the great danger and viciousness of it: When he that is a fool walketh by the way side, his wisdom faileth him, and he saith to every one that he is a fool. Ecc. x. 3. The other is, In the multitude of words there wanteth not sin. Prov. x. 19.

As to the government of the tongue, in respect to talking upon indifferent subjects: after what has been said concerning the due government of it in respect to the occasions and times for silence, there is little more necessary, than only to caution men to be fully satisfied, that the subjects are indeed of an indifferent nature; and not to spend too much time in conversation of this kind. But persons must be sure to take heed, that the subject of their discourse be at least of an indifferent nature; that it be no way offensive to virtue, religion, or good manners; that it be not of a licentious dissolute sort, this leaving always ill impressions upon the mind; that it be no way injurious or vexatious to others; and that too much time be not spent this way, to the neglect of those duties and offices of life which belong to their station and condition in the world. However, though there is not any necessity, that men should aim at being important and weighty in every sentence they speak; yet since useful subjects, at least of some kinds, are as entertaining as others, a wise man, even when he desires to unbend his mind from business, would choose that the conversation might turn upon somewhat instructive.

The last thing is, the government of the tongue, as relating to discourse of the affairs of others, and giving of characters. These are in a manner the same; and one can scarce call it an indifferent subject, because discourse upon it almost perpetually runs into somewhat criminal.

And first of all, it were very much to be wished that this did not take up so great a part of conversation; because it is indeed a subject of a very dangerous nature. Let any one consider the various interests, competitions, and little mutual understandings which arise amongst men; and he will soon see that he is not unprejudiced and impartial; that he is not, as I may speak, neutral enough, to trust himself with talking of the character and concerns of his neighbour, in a free, careless, and unreserved manner. There is perpetually, and often it is not attended to, a rivalry amongst people of one kind and another, in respect, to wit, beauty, learning, fortune, and that one thing will insensibly influence them to speak to the disadvantage of others, even where there is no formed malice or ill design. Since therefore it is so hard to enter into this subject without offending, the first thing to be observed is, that people should learn to decline it; to get over that strong inclination most have to be talking of the concerns and behaviour of their neighbour.

But since it is impossible that this subject should be wholly excluded conversation; and since it is necessary that the characters of men should be known; the next thing is, that it is a matter of importance what is said; and therefore, that we should be religiously scrupulous and exact to say nothing, either good or bad, but what is true. I put it thus, because it is in reality of as great importance to the good of society, that the characters of bad men should be known, as that the characters of good men should. People who are given to scandal and detraction, may indeed make an ill use of this observation; but truths which are of service towards regulating our conduct, are not to be disowned, or even concealed, because a bad use may be made of them. This however would be effectually prevented, if these two things were attended to. First, That though it is equally of bad consequence to society, that men should have either good or ill characters which they do not deserve, yet when you say somewhat good of a man which he does not deserve, there is no wrong done him in particular; whereas, when you say evil of a man which he does not deserve, here is a direct formal injury, a real piece of injustice done him. This therefore makes a wide difference; and gives us, in point of virtue, much greater latitude in speaking well than ill of others. Secondly, A good man is friendly to his fellow-creatures, and a lover of mankind, and so will, upon every occasion, and often without any, say all the good he can of every body: but, so far as he is a good man, will never be disposed to speak evil of any, unless there be some other reason for it, besides barely that it is true. If he be charged with having given an ill character, he will scarce think it a sufficient justification of himself to say it was a true one, unless he can also give some further account, how he came to do so: a just indignation against particular instances of villainy, where they are great and scandalous; or to prevent an innocent man from being deceived and betrayed, when he has great trust and confidence in one who does not deserve it. Justice must be done to every part of a subject, when we are considering it. If there be a man, who bears a fair character in the world, whom yet we know to be without faith or honesty, to be really an ill man; it must be allowed, in general, that we shall do a piece of service to society, by letting such an one's true character be known. This is no more, than what we have an instance of in our Saviour himself, (Mark, xii. 38. 40.) though he was mild and gentle beyond example. However, no words can express too strongly the caution which should be used in such a case as this.

Upon the whole matter: if people would observe the obvious occasions of silence, if they would subdue the inclination to tale-bearing, and that eager desire to engage attention, which is an original disease in some minds; they would be in little danger of offending with their tongue; and would, in a moral and religious sense, have due government over it.

I will conclude with some precepts and reflections of the son of Sirach upon this subject. Be swift to hear: and, if thou hast understanding, answer thy neighbour: if not, lay thy hand upon thy mouth. Honour and shame is in talk. A man of an ill tongue is dangerous in his city, and he that is rash in his talk shall be hated. A wise man will hold his tongue, till he see opportunity; but a babbler and a fool will regard no time. He that useth many words shall be abhorred; and he that taketh to himself authority therein, shall be hated. A back-biting tongue hath disquieted many; strong cities hath it pulled down, and over-thrown the houses of great men. The tongue of a man is his fall; but if thou love to hear, thou shalt receive understanding.

SERMON LXXVIII.

Upon Self-Deceit.

2 SAMUEL, xii. 7.

And Nathan said to David, Thou art the man.

THESE words are the application of Nathan's parable to David, upon occasion of his adultery with Bathsheba, and the murder of Uriah her husband. The parable, which is related in the most beautiful simplicity, is this: ver. 1. There were two men in one city; the one rich, and the other poor. The rich man had exceeding many flocks and herds: but the poor man had nothing, save one little ewe lamb, which he had bought and nourished up: and it grew up together with him, and with his children; it did eat of his own meat, and drank of his own cup, and lay in his bosom, and was unto him as a daughter. And there came a traveller unto the rich man, and he spared to take of his own flock, and of his own herd, to dress for the way-faring man that was come unto him, but took the poor man's lamb, and dressed it for the man that was come to him. And David's anger was greatly kindled against the man, and he said to Nathan, as the Lord liveth, the man that hath done this thing shall surely die. And he shall restore the lamb four-fold, because he did this thing, and because he had no pity. David passes sentence, not only that there should be four-fold restitution made; but he proceeds to the rigour of justice, the man that hath done this thing shall die: and this judgment is pronounced with the utmost indignation against such an act of inhumanity; as the Lord liveth, he shall surely die: and his anger was greatly kindled against the man. And the Pro- phet answered, Thou art the man. He had been guilty of much greater inhumanity, with the utmost deliberation, thought, and contrivance. Near a year must have passed, between the time of the commission of his crimes, and the time of the Prophet's coming to him; and it does not appear from the story, that he had in all this while the least remorse or contrition.

There is not any thing, relating to men and characters, more surprising and unaccountable, than this partiality to themselves, which is observable in many; as there is nothing of more melancholy reflection, respecting morality, virtue, and religion. Hence it is that many men seem perfect strangers to their own characters. They think, and reason, and judge quite differently upon any matter relating to themselves, from what they do in cases of others where they are not interested. Hence it is one hears people exposing follies, which they themselves are eminent for; and talking with great severity against particular vices, which, if all the world be not mistaken, they themselves are notoriously guilty of. This self-ignorance and self-partiality may be in all in different degrees. It is a lower degree of it which David himself refers to in these words, Who can tell how oft he offendeth? O cleanse thou me from my secret faults. This is the ground of that advice of Elihu to Job: Surely it is meet to be said unto God—That which I see not, teach thou me; if I have done iniquity, I will do no more. And Solomon saw this thing in a very strong light, when he said, he that trusteth his own heart is a fool. This likewise was the reason why that precept, Know thyself, was so frequently inculcated by philosophers of old. For if it were not for that partial and fond regard to ourselves, it would certainly be no great difficulty to know our own character, what passes within the bent and bias of our mind; much less would there be any difficulty in judging rightly of our own actions. But from this partiality it frequently comes to pass, that the observation of many men's being themselves last of all acquainted with what falls out in their own families, may be applied to a nearer home, to what passes within their own breasts.

There is plainly, in the generality of mankind, an absence of doubt or distrust, in a very great measure, as to their moral character and behaviour; and likewise a disposition to take for granted, that all is right and well with them in these respects. The former is owing to their not reflecting, not exercising their judgment upon themselves; the latter to self-love. I am not speaking of that extravagance, which is sometimes met with; instances of persons declaring in words at length, that they never were in the wrong, nor had ever any diffidence to the justness of their conduct, in their whole lives. No, these people are too far gone to have any thing said to them. The thing before us is indeed of this kind, but in a lower degree, and confined to the moral character; somewhat of which we must all of us have, without reflecting upon it. Now consider how long, and how grossly, a person of the best understanding might be imposed upon by one of whom he had not any suspicion, and in whom he placed an entire confidence; especially if there were friendship and real kindness in the case: surely this holds even stronger with respect to that self we are all so fond of. Hence arises in men a disregard of reproof and instruction, rules of conduct and moral discipline, which occasionally come in their way: a disregard, I say, of these; not in every respect, but in this single one, namely, as what may be of service to them in particular towards mending their own hearts and tempers, and making them better men. It never in earnest comes into their thoughts, whether such admonitions may not relate, and be of service to themselves; and this quite distinct from a positive persuasion to the contrary, a persuasion from reflection that they are innocent and blameless in those respects. Thus we may invert the observation which is somewhere made upon Brutus, that he never read but in order to make himself a better man. It scarce comes into the thoughts of the generality of mankind, that this use is to be made of moral reflections which they meet with; that this use, I say, is to be made of them by themselves, for every body observes and wonders that it is not done by others.

Further, there are instances of persons having so fixed and steady an eye upon their own interest, whatever they place it in, and the interest of those whom they consider as themselves, as in a manner to regard nothing else; their views are almost confined to this alone. Now we cannot be acquainted with, or in any propriety of speech be said to know, any thing but what we attend to. If therefore they attend only to one side, they really will not, cannot see or know what is to be alleged on the other. Though a man hath the best eyes in the world, he cannot see any way but that which he turns them. Thus these persons, without passing over the least, the most minute thing which can possibly be urged in favour of themselves, shall overlook entirely the plainest and most obvious things on the other side. And whilst they are under the power of this temper, thought and consideration, upon the matter before them, has scarce any tendency to set them right: because they are engaged, and their deliberation concerning an action to be done, or reflection upon it afterwards, is not to see whether it be right, but to find out reasons to justify or palliate it; palliate it, not to others, but to themselves.

In some there is to be observed a general ignorance of themselves, and wrong way of thinking and judging in every thing relating to themselves; their fortune, reputation, every thing in which self can come in: and this perhaps attended with the rightest judgment in all other matters. In others this partiality is not so general, has not taken hold of the whole man, but is confined to some particular favourite passion, interest, or pursuit; suppose ambition, covetousness, or any other. And these persons may probably judge and determine what is perfectly just and proper, even in things in which they themselves are concerned, if these things have no relation to their particular favourite passion or pursuit. Hence arises that amazing incongruity, and seeming inconsistency of character, from whence slight observers take it for granted, that the whole is hypocritical and false; not being able otherwise to reconcile the several parts: whereas in truth there is real honesty, so far as it goes. There is such a thing as men's being honest to such a degree, and in such respects, but no further. And this, as it is true, so it is absolutely necessary to be taken notice of, and allowed them; such general and undistinguished censure of their whole characters, as designing and false, being one main thing which confirms them in their self-deceit. They know that the whole censure is not true; and so take for granted that no part of it is.

But to go on with the explanation of the thing itself: Vice in general consists in having an unreasonable and too great regard to ourselves, in comparison of others. Robbery and murder are never from the love of injustice and cruelty, but to gratify some other passion, to gain some supposed advantage: and it is false selfishness alone, whether cool or passionate, which makes a man resolutely pursue that end, be it ever so much to the injury of another. But whereas, in common and ordinary wickedness, this unreasonableness, this partiality and selfishness relates only, or chiefly, to the temper and passions, in the characters we are now considering, it reaches to the understanding, and influences the very judgment. And, besides that general want of distrust and diffidence concerning our own character, there are, you see, two things, which may thus prejudice and darken the understanding itself: that over-fondness for ourselves, which we are all so liable to; and also being under the power of any particular passion or appetite, or engaged in any particular pursuit. And these, especially the last of the two, may be in so great a degree, as to influence our judgment, even of other persons and their behaviour. Thus a man, whose temper is formed to ambition or covetousness, shall even approve of them sometimes in others.

This seems to be in a good measure the account of self-partiality and self-deceit, when traced up to its original. Whether it be, or be not, thought satisfactory, that there is such a thing, is manifest; and that it is the occasion of great part of the unreasonable behaviour of men towards each other: that by means of it they palliate their vices and follies to themselves: and that it prevents their applying to themselves those reproofs and instructions, which they meet with either in scripture, or in moral and religious discourses, though exactly suitable to the state of their own mind, and the course of their behaviour. There is one thing further to be added here, that the temper we distinguish by hardness of heart with respect to others, joined with this self-partiality, will carry a man almost any lengths of wickedness, in the way of oppression, hard usage of others, and even to plain injustice; without his having, from what appears, any real sense at all of it. This indeed was not the general character of David; for he plainly gave scope to the affections of compassion and goodwill, as well as to his passions of a rather kind.

But as some occasions and circumstances lie more open to this self-deceit, and give it greater scope and opportunities than others, these require to be particularly mentioned.

It is to be observed then, that as there are express determinate acts of wickedness, such as murder, adultery, theft: so, on the other hand, there are numberless cases in which the vice and wickedness cannot be exactly defined; but consists in a certain general temper and course of action, or in the neglect of some duty, suppose charity or any other, whose bounds and degrees are not fixed. This is the very province of self-deceit and self-partiality: here it governs without check or controul. "For what commandment is there broken? Is there a transgression where there is no law? a vice which cannot be defined?"

Whoever will consider the whole commerce of human life, will see that a great part, perhaps the greatest part, of the intercourse amongst mankind, cannot be reduced to fixed determinate rules. Yet in these cases there is a right and a wrong; a merciful, a liberal, a kind and compassionate behaviour, which surely is our duty; and an unmerciful contracted spirit, an hard and oppressive course of behaviour, which is most certainly immoral and vicious. But who can define precisely, wherein that contracted spirit and hard usage of others consist, as murder and theft may be defined? There is not a word in our language, which expresses more detestable wickedness than oppression: yet the nature of this vice cannot be so exactly stated, nor the bounds of it so determinately marked, as that we shall be able to say in all instances, where rigid right and justness end, and the oppression begins. In these cases there is great latitude left for every one to determine for, and consequently to deceive, himself. It is chiefly in these cases, that self-deceit comes in; as every one must see that there is much larger scope for it here, than in express, single, determinate acts of wickedness. Of this, the story of David, now before us, affords the most striking instance. It is really prodigious, to see a man, before so remarkable for virtue and piety, going on deliberately from adultery to murder, with the same cool contrivance, and, from what appears, with as little disturbance, as a man would endeavour to prevent the ill consequences of a mistake he had made in any common matter. That total insensibility of mind with respect to those horrid crimes, after the commission of them, manifestly shews that he did some way or other delude himself: and this could not be with respect to the crimes themselves, they were so manifestly of the grossest kind. What the particular circumstances were with which he extenuated them, and quieted and deceived himself, are not related.

Having thus explained the nature of internal hypocrisy and self-deceit, and remarked the occasions upon which it exerts itself; there are several things further to be observed concerning it: that all of the sources, to which it was traced up, are sometimes observable together in one and the same person: but that one of them is more remarkable, and to a higher degree, in some, and others of them are so in others: that in general it is a complicated thing; and may be in all different degrees and kinds; that the temper itself is essentially in its own nature vicious and immoral. It is unfairness ; it is dishonesty ; it is falseness of heart : and is therefore so far from extenuating guilt, that it is itself the greatest of all guilt in proportion to the degree it prevails ; for it is a corruption of the whole moral character in its principle. Our understanding and sense of good and evil, is the light and guide of life : If therefore that light that is in thee be darkness, how great is that darkness ? Matt. vi. 23. For this reason our Saviour puts an evil eye as the direct opposite to a single eye ; the absence of that simplicity, which these last words imply, being itself evil and vicious. And whilst men are under the power of this temper, in proportion still to the degree they are so, they are fortified on every side against conviction : and when they hear the vice and folly of what is in truth their own course of life, exposed in the justest and strongest manner, they will often assent to it, and even carry the matter further ; persuading themselves, one does not know how, but some way or other persuading themselves, that they are out of the case, and that it hath no relation to them. Yet, notwithstanding this, there frequently appears a suspicion, that all is not right, or as it should be ; and perhaps there is always at bottom somewhat of this sort. There are doubtless many instances of the ambitious, the revengeful, the covetous, and those whom with too great indulgence we only call the men of pleasure, who will not allow themselves to think how guilty they are, who explain and argue away their guilt to themselves ; and though they do really impose upon themselves in some measure, yet there are none of them but have, if not a proper knowledge, yet at least an implicit suspicion, where the weakness lies, and what part of their behaviour they have reason to wish unknown or forgotten for ever. Truth, and real good sense, and thorough integrity, carry along with them a peculiar consciousness of their own genuineness : there is a feeling belonging to them, which does not accompany their counterfeits, error, folly, half honesty, partial and slight regards to virtue and right, so far only as they are consistent with that course of gratification which men happen to be set upon. And, if this be the case, it is much the same as if we should suppose a man to have had a general view of some scene, enough to satisfy him that it was very disagreeable, and then to shut his eyes, that he might not have a particular or distinct view of its several deformities. It is as easy to close the eyes of the mind, as those of the body : and the former is more frequently done with wilfulness, and yet not attended to, than the latter ; the actions of the mind being more quick and transient than those of the senses. This may be further illustrated by another thing observable in ordinary life. It is not uncommon for persons who run out their fortunes, entirely to neglect looking into the state of their affairs, and this from a general knowledge, that the condition of them is bad. These extravagant people are perpetually ruined before they themselves expected it : and they tell you for an excuse, and tell you truly, that they did not think they were so much in debt, or that their expenses so far exceeded their income. And yet no one will take this for an excuse, who is sensible that their ignorance of their particular circumstances was owing to their general knowledge of them ; that is, their general knowledge, that matters were not well with them, prevented them looking into particulars. There is somewhat of the like kind with this in respect to morals, virtue, and religion. Men find that the survey of themselves, their own heart and temper, their own life and behaviour, doth not afford them satisfaction : things are not as they should be : therefore they turn away, will not go over particulars, or look deeper, lest they should find more amiss. For who would chuse to be put out of humour with himself ? No one surely, if it were not in order to mend, and to be more thoroughly and better pleased with himself for the future.

If this sincere self-enjoyment and home-satisfaction be thought desirable, and worth some pains and diligence, the following reflections will, I suppose, deserve your attention, as what may be of service and assistance to all who are in any measure honestly disposed, for avoiding that fatal self-deceit, and towards getting acquainted with themselves.

The first is. That those who have never had any suspicion of, who have never made allowances for this weakness in themselves, who have never, if I may be allowed such a manner of speaking, caught themselves in it, may almost take for granted that they have been very much misled by it. For consider: nothing is more manifest, than that affection and passion of all kinds influence the judgment. Now as we have naturally a greater regard to ourselves than to others, as the private affection is more prevalent than the public, the former will have proportionally a greater influence upon the judgment, upon our way of considering things. People are not backward in owning this partiality of judgment, in cases of friendship and natural relation. The reason is obvious, why it is not so readily acknowledged, when the interest which misleads us is more confined, confined to ourselves: but we all take notice of it in each other in these cases. There is not any observation more common, than that there is no judging of a matter from hearing only one side. This is not founded upon supposition, at least it is not always, of a formed design in the relater to deceive; for it holds in cases, where he expects that the whole will be told over again by the other side. But the supposition, which this observation is founded upon, is the very thing now before us; namely, that men are exceedingly prone to deceive themselves, and judge too favourably in every respect, where themselves and their own interest are concerned. Thus, though we have not the least reason to suspect that such an interested person hath any intention to deceive us, yet we of course make great allowances for his having deceived himself. If this be general, almost universal, it is prodigious that every man can think himself an exception, and that he is free from this self-partiality. The direct contrary is the truth. Every man may take for granted that he has a great deal of it, till, from the strictest observance upon himself, he finds particular reason to think otherwise.

Secondly. There is one easy and almost sure way to avoid being misled by this self-partiality, and to guard with our real character against regard to the suspicious part, and keep a steady eye over ourselves in that respect. Suppose then a man, dissatisfied with himself, and his behaviour, such an one, if you please, as the Pharisee in the gospel; or a better man. Well, but allowing this good opinion you have of yourself to be true, yet every one is liable to be misrepresented. Suppose, then, an enemy was to set about defaming you, what part of your character would he single out? What particular scandal, think you, would he be most likely to fix upon you? And what would the world be most ready to believe? There is scarce a man living but could, from the most transient superficial view of himself, answer this question: What is that ill thing, that faulty behaviour, which I am apprehensive an enemy, who was thoroughly acquainted with me, would be most likely to lay to my charge, and which the world would be most apt to believe? It is indeed possible that a man may not be guilty in that respect. All that I say is, let him in plainness and honesty fix upon that part of his character for a particular survey and reflection, and by this he will come to be acquainted, whether he be guilty or innocent in that respect, and how far he is one or the other.

Thirdly, It would very much prevent our being misled by this self-partiality, to reduce that practical rule of our Saviour, Whatsoever ye would that men should do unto you, even so do unto them, to our judgment and way of thinking. This rule, you see, consists of two parts. One is, to substitute another for yourself when you take a survey of any part of your behaviour, or consider what is proper and fit, and reasonable for you to do upon any occasion: the other part is, that you substitute yourself in the room of another; consider yourself as the person affected by such a behaviour, or towards whom such an action is done, and then you would not only see, but likewise feel, the reasonableness or unreasonableness of such an action or behaviour. But, alas! the rule itself may be dishonestly applied: there are persons who have not impartiality enough with respect to themselves, nor regard enough for others, to be able to make a just application. This just application, if not honestly made, is in effect all that have been recommending. It is the whole thing, the direct contrary to the inward dishonesty as respecting our intercourse with our fellow-creatures. And even the bearing this rule in their thoughts may be of some service, the attempt thus to apply it is an attempt towards being fair and impartial, and may chance unawares to shew them to themselves, to shew them the truth of the case they are considering.

Upon the whole it is manifest, that there is such a thing as self-partiality and self-deceit that in some persons it is to a degree which would be thought incredible, were not the instances before our eyes, of which the behaviour of David is perhaps the highest one possible, in a single particular case, for there is not the least appearance, that it reached his general character: that we are almost all of us influenced by it in some degree, and in some respects that therefore every one ought to have an eye to and beware of it. And all that I have further to add upon this subject is, that either there is a difference between right and wrong, or there is not: religion is true, or it is not. If it be not, there is no reason for any concern about it: but if it be true, it requires real fairness of mind and honesty of heart. And, if people will be wicked, they had better of the two be so from the common vicious passions without such restraints, than from this deep and calm source of action, which undermines the whole principle of good, darkens that light, that candle of the Lord within, which is to direct our steps, and corrupts conscience, which is the guide of life.

SERMON LXXIX.

NUMB. XXIII. 10.

Let me die the death of the righteous, and let my last end be like his.

THESE words, taken alone, and without respect to him who spoke them, lead our thoughts immediately to the different ends of good and bad men. For, though the comparison is not expressed, yet it is manifestly implied; as is also the preference of one of these characters to the other in that last circumstance, death. And, since dying the death of the righteous or of the wicked necessarily implies men's being righteous or wicked, i. e. having lived righteously or wickedly, a comparison of them in their lives also might come into consideration from such a single view of the words themselves. But my present design is, to consider them with a particular reference or respect to him who spoke them; which reference, if you please to attend, you will see. And if what shall be offered to your consideration at this time be thought a discourse upon the whole history of this man, rather than upon the particular words I have read, this is of no consequence: it is sufficient, if it afford reflection of use and service to ourselves.

But, in order to avoid cavils respecting this remarkable relation in Scripture, let me just observe that as this is not a place for answering them, so they no way affect the following discourse, since the character there given plainly a real one in life, and such as there are parallels to.

The occasion of Balaam's coming out of his own country into the land of Moab, where he pronounced this solemn prayer or wish, he himself relates in the first parable or prophetic speech, of which it is the conclusion. In which it is a custom required to, proper to be taken notice of: that of devoting enemies to destruction, before the entrance upon a war with them. This custom appears to have prevailed over a great part of the world; for we find it amongst the most distant nations. The Romans had public officers, to whom it belonged as a stated part of their office. But there was somewhat more particular in the case now before us, Balaam being looked upon as an extraordinary person, whose blessing or curse was thought to be always effectual.

In order to engage the reader's attention to this passage, the sacred historian has enumerated the preparatory circumstances, which are these. Balaam requires the king of Moab to build him seven altars, and to prepare him the same number of oxen and of rams. The sacrifice being over, he retires alone to a solitude sacred to these occasions, there to wait the divine inspiration or answer, for which the foregoing rites were the preparation: ver. 4, 5. And God met Balaam, and put a word in his mouth, upon receiving of which, he returns back to the altars; where was the king, who had all this while attended the sacrifice, as appointed; he and all the princes of Moab standing, big with expectation of the Prophet's reply: ver. 6. And he took up his parable and said, Balak the king of Moab hath brought me from Aram, out of the mountains of the east, saying, Come, curse me Jacob, and come, defy Israel. How shall I curse, whom God hath not cursed? Or how shall I defy, whom the Lord hath not defied? For from the top of the rocks I see him, and from the hills I behold him; lo, the people shall dwell alone, and shall not be reckoned among the nations. Who can count the dust of Jacob, and the number of the fourth part of Israel? Let me die the death of the righteous, and let my last end be like his.

It is necessary, as you will see in the progress of this discourse, particularly to observe what he understood by righteous. And he himself is introduced in the book of Micah explaining it: if by righteous is meant good, as to be sure it is. O my people, remember now what Balak king of Moab consulted, and what Balaam the son of Beor answered him from Shittim unto Gilgal. From the mention of Shittim it is manifest that it is this very story which is here referred to, though another part of it, the account of which is not now extant; as there are many quotations in Scripture out of books which are not come down to us. Remember what Balaam answered, that ye may know the righteousness of the Lord, i. e. the righteousness which God will accept. Balak demands, Wherewith shall I come before the Lord, and bow myself before the high God? Shall I come before him with burnt offerings, with calves of a year old? Will the Lord be pleased with thousands of rams, or with ten thousands of rivers of oil? Shall I give my first-born for my transgression, the fruit of my body for the sin of my soul? Balaam answers him, He hath said unto me, O man, what is good: and what doth the Lord require of thee, but to do justly, and to love mercy, and to walk humbly with thy God? Here is a good man expressly characterised, as distinct from a dishonest and superstitious man. No words can more strongly exclude dishonesty and falseness of heart, than doing justice, and loving mercy: and both these, as well as walking humbly with God, are put in opposition to those ceremonial methods of recommendation, which Balak hoped might have served the turn. From hence appears what he meant by the righteous, whose death he desires to die.

Whether it was his own character shall now be inquired: and in order to determine it, we must take a view of his whole behaviour upon this occasion. When the elders of Moab came to him, though he appears to have been much assured with the rewards offered, yet he had such regard to the authority of God, as to keep the messengers in suspense until he had consulted his will. And God said to him, Thou shalt not go with them, thou shalt not curse the people, for they are blessed. Upon this he dismisses the ambassadors, with an absolute refusal of accompanying them back to their king. Thus far his regard to his duty prevailed, neither does there any thing appear as yet amiss in his conduct. His answer being reported to the king of Moab, a more honourable embassy is immediately dispatched, and greater rewards proposed. Then the iniquity of his heart began to disclose itself. A thorough honest man would without hesitation have repeated his former answer, that he could not be guilty of so infamous a prostitution of the sacred character with which he was invested, as in the name of a prophet to curse those whom he knew to be blessed. But instead of this, which was the only honest part in these circumstances that lay before him, he desires the princes of Moab to tarry that night with him also; and for the sake of the reward deliberates whether, by some means or other, he might not be able to obtain leave to curse Israel; to do that, which had been before revealed to him to be contrary of the will of God, which yet he resolves not to do without that permission. Upon which, as when this nation, afterwards, refused God from reigning over them, he gave them a king in his anger; in the same way, as appears from other parts of the narration, he gives Balaam the permission he desired; for this is the most natural sense of the words. Arriving in the territories of Moab, and being received with particular distinction by the king, and he repeating in person the promise of the rewards he had before made to him by his ambassadors; he seeks, the text says by sacrifices and enchantments, (what these were is not to our purpose,) to obtain leave of God to curse the people; keeping still his resolution not to do it without that permission; which not being able to obtain, he had such regard to the command of God, as to keep this resolution to the last. The supposition of his being under a supernatural restraint is a mere fiction of Philo: he is plainly represented to be under no other force or restraint than the fear of God. However, he goes on persevering in that endeavour, after he had declared, that God had not beheld iniquity in Jacob, neither had he seen perverseness in Israel; i. e. they were a people of virtue and piety, so far as not to have drawn down, by their iniquity, that curse which he was soliciting leave to pronounce upon them. So that the state of Balaam's mind was this: he wanted to do what he knew to be very wicked, and contrary to the express command of God; he had inward checks and restraints, which he could not entirely get over; he therefore cases about for ways to reconcile this wickedness with his duty. How great a paradox soever this may appear, as it is indeed a contradiction in terms, it is the very account which the Scripture gives us of him.

But there is a more surprising piece of iniquity yet behind. Not daring in his religious character, as a prophet, to assist the king of Moab, he considers whether there might not be found some other means of assisting him against that very people, whom he himself, by the fear of God, was restrained from cursing in words. One would not think it possible, that the weakness, even of religious self-deceit in its utmost excess, could have so poor a distinction, so fond an evasion to serve itself of. But so it was; and he could think of no other method, than to betray the children of Israel to provoke his wrath who was their only strength and defence. The temptation which he pitched upon, was that concerning which Solomon afterwards observed, that it had cast down many wounded; yea, many strong men had been slain by it: and of which he himself was a sad example, when his wives turned away his heart after other Gods. This succeeded: the people sin against God; and thus the Prophet's counsel brought on that destruction, which he could by no means be prevailed upon to assist with the religious ceremony of exorcism, which the king of Moab thought would itself have effected it. Their crime and punishment are related in Deuteronomy and Numbers. And from the relation repeated in Numbers, it appears that Balaam was the contriver of the whole matter. It is also ascribed to him in the Revelations, where he is said to have taught Balak to cast a stumbling block before the children of Israel.

This was the man, this Balaam, I say, was the man who desired to die the death of the righteous, and that his last end might be like his; and this was the state of his mind when he pronounced these words.

So that the object we have now before us is the most astonishing in the world: a very wicked man, under a deep sense of God and religion, persisting still in his wickedness, and preferring the wages of unrighteousness, even when he had before him a lively view of death, and that approaching period of his days, which should deprive him of all those advantages for which he was prostituting himself; and likewise a prospect, whether certain or uncertain, of a future state of retribution; all this joined with an explicit ardent wish, that, when he was to leave this world, he might be in the condition of a righteous man. Good God, what inconsistency, what perplexity is here! With what different views of things, with what contradictory principles of action, must such a mind be torn and distracted! It was not unthinking carelessness, by which he run on headlong in vice and folly, without ever making a stand to ask himself what he was doing : no ; he acted upon the cool motives of interest and advantage. Neither was he totally hard and callous to impressions of religion, what we call abandoned ; for he absolutely denied to curse Israel. When reason assumes her place, when convinced of his duty, when he owns and feels, and is actually under the influence of the divine authority ; whilst he is carrying on his views to the grave, the end of all temporal greatness ; under this sense of things, with the better character and more desirable state present full before him, in his thoughts, in his wishes, voluntarily to choose the worse, what fatality is here ! Or how otherwise can such a character be explained ? And yet, strange as it may appear, it is not altogether an uncommon one : nay, with some small alterations, and put a little lower, it is applicable to a very considerable part of the world. For, if the reasonable choice be seen and acknowledged, and yet men make the unreasonable one, is not this the same contradiction ; that very inconsistency, which appeared so unaccountable ?

To give some little opening to such characters and behaviour, it is to be observed in general, that there is no account to be given in the way of reason of men's so strong attachments to the present world ; our hopes and fears and pursuits are in degrees beyond all proportion to the known value of the things they respect. This may be said without taking into consideration religion and a future state ; and when these are considered, the disproportion is infinitely heightened. Now when men go against their reason, and contradict a more important interest at a distance, for one nearer, though of less consideration, if this be the whole of the case, all that can be said is, that strong passions, some kind of brute force within, prevails over the principle of rationality. However, if this be with a clear, full and distinct view of the truth of things, then it is doing the utmost violence to themselves, acting in the most palpable contradiction to their very nature. But if there be any such thing in mankind, as putting half-deceits upon themselves ; which there plainly is, either by avoiding reflection, or, if they do reflect, by religious equivocation, subterfuges, and palliating matters to themselves ; by these means conscience may be laid asleep, and they may go on in a course of wickedness with less disturbance. All the various turns, doubles, and intricacies in a dishonest heart, cannot be unfolded or laid open ; but that there is somewhat of that kind is manifest, be it to be called self-deceit, or by any other name. Balaam had before his eyes the authority of God, absolutely forbidding him what he, for the sake of a reward, had the strongest inclination to : he was likewise in a state of mind sober enough to consider death and his last end : by these considerations he was restrained, first from going to the king of Moab, and after he did go, from cursing Israel. But notwithstanding this, there was great wickedness in his heart. He could not forego the rewards of unrighteousness ; he therefore first seeks for indulgences ; and when these could not be obtained, he sins against the whole meaning, end, and design of the prohibition, which no consideration in the world could prevail with him to go against the letter of. And surely that impious counsel he gave to Balak, against the children of Israel, was considered in itself a greater piece of wickedness, than if he had cursed them in words.

If it be inquired what his situation, his hopes and fears were, in respect to this his wish ? the answer must be, that consciousness of the wickedness of his heart must necessarily have destroyed all settled hopes of dying the death of the righteous ; he could have no calm satisfaction in this view of his last end ; yet, on the other hand, it is possible that those partial regards to his duty now mentioned, might keep him from perfect despair.

Upon the whole, it is manifest that Balaam had the most just and true notions of God and religion ; as appears, partly from the original story itself, and more plainly from the passage in Micah, where he explains religion to consist in real virtue and real piety, expressly distinguished from superstition, and in terms which most strongly exclude dishonesty, falseness of heart. Yet you see a behaviour: he seeks indulgences, plain wickedness; which not being able to obtain, he glosses over that same wickedness, dresses it up in a new form, in order to make it pass off more easily with himself. That is, he deliberately contrives to deceive and impose upon himself, in a matter which he knew to be of the utmost importance.

To bring these observations home to ourselves: It is too evident that many persons allow themselves in very unjustifiable courses, who yet make great pretences to religion; not to deceive the world, none can be so weak as to think this will pass in our age; but from principles, hopes, and fears, respecting God and a future state; and go on thus with a sort of tranquillity and quiet of mind. This cannot be upon a thorough consideration, and full resolution, the pleasures and advantages they propose are to be pursued at all hazards, against reason, against the law of God, and though everlasting destruction is to be the consequence. This would be doing too great violence upon themselves. No, they are for making a composition with the Almighty. These of his commands they will obey; but as to others, why they will make all the atonements in their power; the ambitious, the covetous, the dissolute man, each in a way which shall not contradict his respective pursuit. Indulgences before, which was Balaam's first attempt, though he was not so successful in it as to deceive himself, or atonements afterwards, are all the same. And here perhaps come in faint hopes that they may, and half-resolves that they will, one time or other, make a change.

Besides these, there are also persons, who, from a more just way of considering things, see the infinite absurdity of this, of substituting sacrifice instead of obedience; there are persons far enough from superstition, and not without some real sense of God and religion upon their minds; who yet are guilty of most unjustifiable practices, and go on with great coolness and command over themselves. The same dishonesty and unsoundness of heart discovers itself in these another way. In all common ordinary cases we see intuitively at first view what is our duty, what is the honest part. This is the ground of the observation, that the first thought is often the best. In these cases, doubt and deliberation is itself dishonesty; as it was in Balaam upon the second message. That which is called considering what is our duty in a particular case, is very often nothing but endeavouring to explain it away. Thus those courses, which, if men would fairly attend to the dictates of their own consciences, they would see to be corruption, excess, oppression, uncharitableness; these are refined upon; things were so and so circumstantiated; great difficulties are raised about fixing bounds and degrees: and thus every moral obligation whatever may be evaded. Here is scope, I say, for an unfair mind to explain away every moral obligation to itself. Whether men reflect again upon this internal management and artifice, and how explicit they are with themselves, is another question. There are many operations of the mind, many things pass within, which we never reflect upon again; which a by-stander, from having frequent opportunities of observing us and our conduct, may make shrewd guesses at.

That great numbers are in this way of deceiving themselves is certain. There is scarce a man in the world, who has entirely got over all regards, hopes, and fears, concerning God and a future state; and these apprehensions in the generality, bad as we are, prevail in considerable degrees; yet men will and can be wicked with calmness and thought; we see they are. There must therefore be some method of making it sit a little easy upon their minds; which, in the superstitious, are those indulgences and atonements before mentioned, and this self-deceit of another kind in persons of another character. And both these proceed from a certain unfairness of mind, a peculiar inward dishonesty; the direct contrary to that simplicity which our Saviour recommends, under the name of becoming little children, as a necessary qualification for our entrance into the kingdom of heaven.

But to conclude: How much soever men differ in the course of life they prefer, and in their ways of palliating and excusing their vices to themselves; yet all agree in the one thing, desiring to die the death of the righteous. This is surely remarkable. The observation may be extended further, and put thus: even without determining what that is which we call guilt or innocence, there is no man but would choose, after having had the pleasure or advantage of a vicious action, to be free of the guilt of it, to be in the state of an innocent man. This shews at least the disturbance and implicit dissatisfaction in vice. If we inquire into the grounds of it, we shall find it proceeds partly from an immediate sense of having done evil; and partly from an apprehension, that this inward sense shall one time or another be seconded by an higher judgment, upon which our whole being depends. Now to suspend and drown this sense, and these apprehensions, be it by the hurry of business or of pleasure; or by superstition, or moral equivocations, this is in a manner one and the same, and makes no alteration at all in the nature of our case. Things and actions are what they are, and the consequences of them will be what they will be: why then should we desire to be deceived? As we are reasonable creatures, and have any regard to ourselves, we ought to lay these things plainly and honestly before our mind, and upon this act as you please, as you think most fit; make that choice, and prefer that course of life, which you can justify to yourselves, and which sits most easy upon your own mind. It will immediately appear, that vice cannot be the happiness, but must upon the whole be the misery, of such a creature as man; a moral, an accountable agent. Superstitious observances, self-deceit though of a more refined sort, will not in reality at all mend matters with us. And the result of the whole can be nothing else, but that, with simplicity and fairness, we keep innocency, and take heed unto the thing that is right; for this to us shall bring a man peace at the any such.

SERMON LX.

By Bishop BUTLER.

Upon the Love of God.

MATTH. xxii. 37.

Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy mind.

EVERY body knows, you therefore need only just be put in mind, that there is such a thing, as having so great horror of one extreme, as to run insensibly and of course into the contrary; and that a doctrine's having been a shelter for enthusiasm, or made to serve the purposes of superstition, is no proof of the falsity of it: truth or right being somewhat real in itself, and so not to be judged of by its liableness to abuse, or by its supposed distance from or nearness to error. It may be sufficient to have mentioned this in general, without taking notice of the particular extravagancies, which have been vented under the pretence or endeavour of explaining the love of God; or how manifestly we are got into the contrary extreme, under the notion of a reasonable religion; so very reasonable, as to have nothing to do with the heart and affections, if these words signify any thing but the faculty by which we discern speculative truth.

By the love of God, I would understand all those regard, all those affections of mind which are due immediately to him from such a creature as man, and which rest in him as their end. As this does not include servile fear, so neither will any other regards, how reasonable soever, which respect any thing out of or besides the perfection of the Divine Nature. come into consideration here. But all fear is not excluded, because his displeasure is itself the natural proper object of fear. Reverence, ambition of his love and approbation, delight in the hope or consciousness of it, come likewise into this definition of the love of God; because he is the natural object of all those affections or moves.

ments of it, as really as he is the object of it: affection, which is in the strictest sense called love; and all of them really rest in him, as their end. And they may all be understood to be intended in these words, of our Saviour, without putting any force upon them: or he is speaking of the love of God and our neighbour, as containing the whole of piety and virtue.

It is plain that the nature of man is so constituted, as to feel certain affections upon the sight or contemplation of certain objects. Now the very notion of affection implies resting in its object as an end. And the particular affection to good characters, reverence and moral love of them, is natural to all those who have any degree of real goodness in themselves. This will be illustrated by the description of a perfect character in a creature; and by considering the manner in which a good man in his presence would be affected towards such a character. He would of course feel the affections of love, reverence, desire of his approbation, delight in the hope or consciousness of it. And surely all this is applicable, and may be brought up to that Being, who is infinitely more than an adequate object of all those affections; whom we are commanded to love with all our heart, with all our soul, and with all our mind. And of these regards towards Almighty God, some are more particularly suitable to and becoming so imperfect a creature as man, in this mortal state we are passing through; and some of them, and perhaps other excesses of the mind, will be the employment and happiness of good men in a state of perfection.

This is a general view of what the following discourse will contain. And it is manifest the subject is a real one: there is nothing in it enthusiastical or unreasonable. And if it be indeed at all a subject, it is one of the utmost importance.

As mankind have a faculty by which they discern speculative truth; so we have various affections towards external objects. Understanding and temper, reason and affection, are as distinct ideas as reason and hunger; and one would think could no more be confounded. It is by reason that we get the ideas of acts objects of our affections: but in we cases, reason and affection are no him, the same, than sight of a particular object, and the pleasure or uneasiness consequent thereupon, are the same. Just as reason tends to and rests in the discernment of truth, the object of the very nature of affection consists in tending towards, and resting in, its objects as an end. We do indeed often in common language say, that things are loved, desired, esteemed, not for themselves, but for somewhat further, some what out of and beyond them: yet, in these cases, whoever will attend, will see, that these things are not in reality the objects of the affections, i. e. are not loved, desired, esteemed, but the somewhat further and beyond them. If we have no affections which rest in what are called their objects, then what is called affection, love, desire, hope, in human nature, is only an uneasiness in being at rest; an unquiet disposition to action, progress, pursuit, without end or meaning. But if there be any such thing as delight in the company of one person, rather than of another; whether in the way of friendship, or mirth and entertainment, it is all one, if it be without respect to fortune, honour, or increasing our stores of knowledge, or any thing beyond the present time; here is an instance of an affection absolutely resting in its object as its end, and being gratified, in the same way as the appetite of hunger is satisfied with food. Yet nothing is more common than to hear it asked, What advantage a man hath in such a course, suppose of study, particular friendships, or in any other? Nothing, I say, is more common, than to hear such a question put in a way which supposes no gain, advantage, or interest, but as a means to somewhat further: and if so, then there is no such thing at all as real interest, gain, or advantage. This is the same absurdity with respect to life, as an infinite series of effects without a cause is in speculation. The gain, advantage, or interest, consists in the delight itself, arising from such a faculty's having its object: neither is there any such thing as happiness or enjoyment, but what arises from hence. The

ness of hope and of reflection are men's options: the former being only for happiness anticipated; the latter, the happiness enjoyed over again after it is past. And even the general expectation of future happiness can afford satisfaction only as it is a present object of the principle of self-love.

It was doubtless intended, that life should be very much in pursuit to the happiness of mankind. But this is carried much further than is reasonable, that what gives immediate satisfaction, i. e. our present interest, is scarce considered as our interest at all. It is inventions which have only a remote tendency towards enjoyment, perhaps but a remote tendency towards gaining the means only of enjoyment, which are chiefly spoken of as useful to the world. And though this way of thinking were just with respect to the imperfect state we are now in, where we know so little of satisfaction without satiety: yet it must be guarded against, when we are considering the happiness of a state of perfection; which happiness being enjoyment and not hope, must necessarily consist in this, that our affections have their objects, and rest in those objects as an end, i. e. be satisfied with them. This will further appear in the sequel of this discourse.

Of the several affections, or inward sensations, which particular objects excite in man, there are some, the having of which implies the love of them, when they are reflected upon. This cannot be said of all our affections, principles, and motives of action. It were ridiculous to assert, that a man upon reflection hath the same kind of approbation of the appetite of hunger, or the passion of fear, as he hath of good-will to his fellow-creatures. To be a just, a good, a righteous man, plainly carries with it a peculiar affection to, or love of justice, goodness, righteousness, when these principles are the objects of contemplation. Now if a man approves of, or hath an affection to, any principle in and for itself, incidental things allowed for, it will be the same whether he views it in his own mind or in another, in himself, or in his neighbour. This is the account of our approbation of our moral love and affection to good characters; which cannot but be in those who have any degrees of real goodness in themselves, and who discern and take notice of the same principle in others.

From observation of what passes in ourselves, our own actions, and behaviour of others, the mind may carry on its reflections as far as it pleases; much beyond what we experience in ourselves, or discern in our fellow-creatures. It may go on, and consider goodness as become an uniform continued principle of action, as conducted by reason, and forming a temper and character absolutely good and perfect, which is in a higher sense excellent, and proportionably the object of love and approbation.

Let us then suppose a creature perfect according to his created nature; let his form be humane, and his capacities no more than equal to those of the chief of men: goodness shall be his proper character, with wisdom to direct it, and power within some certain determined sphere of action to exert it: but goodness must be the simple actuating principle with him; this being the moral quality which is amiable, or the immediate object of love as distinct from other affections of approbation. Here then is a finite object for our mind to tend towards, to exercise itself upon: a creature, perfect according to his capacity, fixed, steady, equally unmoved by weak pity, or more weak fury and resentment; forming the justest scheme of conduct; going on undisturbed in the execution of it, through the several methods of severity and reward, towards his end, namely, the general happiness of all with whom he hath to do, as in itself right and valuable. This character, though uniform in itself, in its principle, yet exerting itself in different ways, or considered in different views, may by its appearing variety move different affections. Thus, the severity of justice would not affect us in the same way, as an act of mercy: the adventitious qualities of wisdom and power may be considered in themselves: and even the strength of mind, which this immovable goodness supposes, may likewise be viewed as an object of contemplation, distinct from the goodness itself. Suprior excellence of any kind, as well as superior wisdom and power, is the object of awe and reverence to all creatures, whatever their moral character be: but so far as creatures of the lowest rank were good, so far the view of this character, as simply good, must appear amiable to them, be the object of, or beget love. Further, we suppose we were conscious, that this superior person approved of us, that we had nothing servilely to fear from him; that he was really our friend, and kind and good to us in particular, as he had occasionally intercourse with us: we must be other creatures than we are, or we could not but feel the same kind of satisfaction and enjoyment (whatever would be the degree of it) from this higher acquaintance and friendship, as we feel from common ones; the intercourse being real, and the persons equally present, in both cases. We should have a more ardent desire to be approved by his better judgment, and a satisfaction in that approbation of the same sort with what would be felt in respect to common persons, or be wrought in us by their presence.

Let us now raise the character, and suppose this creature, for we are still going on with the supposition of a creature, our proper guardian and governor; that we were in a progress of being towards somewhat further; and that his scheme of government was too vast for our capacities to comprehend; remembering still that he is perfectly good, and our friend as well as our governor. Wisdom, power, goodness, accidentally viewed any where, would inspire reverence, awe, love: and as these affections would be raised in higher or lower degrees, in proportion as we had occasionally more or less intercourse with the creature endued with those qualities; so this further consideration and knowledge, that he was our proper guardian and governor, would much more bring these objects and qualities home to ourselves; teach us that they had a greater respect to us in particular; that we had an higher interest in that wisdom, and power, and goodness. We should, with joy, gratitude, reverence, love, trust, and dependence, appropriate the character, as what he had a right in; and make our boast in such our relation to it. And the conclusion of the whole would be, that we should refer ourselves implicitly to him, and cast ourselves entirely upon him. As the whole attention of life should be to obey his commands; so the highest enjoyment of it must arise from the contemplation of this character, and our relation to it, from a consciousness of his favour and approbation; and from the exercise of those affections towards him which could not but be raised from his presence. A being who hath these attributes, who stands in this relation, and is thus sensibly present to the mind, must necessarily be the object of these affections: there is as real a correspondence between them, as between the lowest appetite of sense and its object.

That this Being is not a creature, but the Almighty God; that he is of infinite power, and wisdom, and goodness, does not render him less the object of reverence and love, than he would be if he had those attributes only in a limited degree. The Being who made us, and upon whom we entirely depend, is the object of some regards. He hath given us certain affections of mind, which correspond to wisdom, power, goodness; i. e. which are raised upon view of those qualities. If then he be really wise, powerful, good; he is the natural object of those affections, which he hath endued us with, and which correspond to those attributes. That he is infinite in power, perfect in wisdom and goodness, makes no alteration, but only that he is the object of those affections, which he hath endued us with, and which correspond to those attributes. That he is infinite in power, perfect in wisdom and goodness, makes no alteration, but only that he is the object of those affections raised to the highest pitch. He is not indeed to be discerned by any of our senses. I go forward, but he is not there; and backward, but I cannot perceive him: on the left hand where he doth work, but I cannot behold him: he hideth himself on the right hand, that I cannot see him. O that I knew where I might find him! that I might come even to his seat! (Job, xxii.) But is he then afar off? does he not fill heaven and earth with his presence? The presence of our fellowcreatures affects our senses, and our senses give us the knowledge of their presence; which hath different kinds of influence upon us; love, joy, sorrow, restraint, encouragement, reverence. However, this influence is not immediately from our senses, but from that knowledge. Thus suppose a person neither to see nor hear another, nor to know by any of his senses, but yet certainly to know, that another was with him; this knowledge might, and in many cases would, have one or more of the effects before-mentioned. It is therefore not only reasonable, but also natural, to be affected with a presence, though it be not the object of our senses: whether it be, or be not, is merely an accidental circumstance, which needs not come into consideration: it is the certainty that he is with us, and we with him, which hath the influence. We consider persons then as present, not only when they are within the reach of our senses, but also when we are assured by any other means that they are within such a nearness; nay, if they are not, we can recall them to our mind, and be moved towards them at present: and must he, who is so much more intimately with us, that in him we live and move and have our being, be thought too distant to be the object of our affections? We own and feel the force of amiable and worthy qualities in our fellow-creatures: and can we be insensible to the contemplation of perfect goodness? Do we reverence the shadows of greatness here below, are we solicitous about honour and esteem, and the opinion of the world; And shall we not feel the same with respect to him, whose are wisdom and power in their original, who is the God of judgment, by whom actions are weighed? Thus love, reverence, desire of esteem, every faculty, every affection, tends towards, and is employed about its respective object in common cases: and must the exercise of them be suspended with regard to him alone, who is an object, an infinitely more than adequate object, to our most exalted faculties; him, of whom, and through whom, and to whom, are all things?

As we cannot remove from this earth, or change our general business on it, so neither can we alter our real nature.

Therefore no exercise of the mind can be recommended, but only the exercise of those faculties you are conscious of. Religion does not demand new affections; but only claims the direction of those you already have, those affections you daily feel: though unhappily confined to objects, not altogether unsuitable, but altogether unequal to them. We only represent to you the higher, the adequate objects of those very faculties and affections. Let the man of ambition go on still to consider disgrace as the greatest evil; honour, as his chief good. But disgrace, in whose estimation? honour, in whose judgment? This is the only question. If shame, and delight in esteem be spoken of as real, as any settled ground of pain or pleasure; both these must be in proportion to the supposed wisdom and worth of him, by whom we are contemned or esteemed. Must it then be thought enthusiastical to speak of a sensibility of this sort, which shall have respect to an unerring judgment, to infinite wisdom; when we are assured this unerring judgment, this infinite wisdom does observe upon our actions?

It is the same with respect to the love of God in the strictest and most confined sense. We only offer and represent the highest object of an affection, supposed already in your mind. Some degree of goodness must be previously supposed: this always implies the love of itself, an affection to goodness: the highest, the adequate object of this affection, is perfect goodness; which therefore we are to love with all our heart, with all our soul, and with all our strength. "Must we then, forgetting our own interest, as it were go out of ourselves, and love God for his own sake?" No, ~~then~~ forget your own interest, no more go out of yourselves than when you prefer one place, one prospect, the conversation of one man to that of another. Does not every affection necessarily imply, that the object of it be itself loved? If it be not, it is not the object of the affection. You may and ought if you can, but it is a great mistake to think you can love, or fear, or hate any thing, from consideration that such love or fear or hatred may be a means of obtaining good or avoiding evil. But the question whether we ought to love God for his sake or for our own, being a mere mistake in language; the real question, which this is mistaken for, will, I suppose, be answered by observing, that the goodness of God already exercised towards us, our present dependance upon him, and our expectation of future benefits, ought, and have a natural tendency, to beget in us the affection of gratitude, and greater love towards him, than the same goodness exercised towards others were it only for this reason, that every affection is moved in proportion to the sense we have of the object of it, and we cannot but have a more lively sense of goodness, when exercised towards ourselves than when exercised to others. I added expectation of future benefits, because the ground of that expectation is present goodness.

Thus Almighty God is the natural object of the several affections love, reverence, fear, desire of approbation. For though he is simply one yet we cannot but consider him in many different views. He is in himself one uniform Being, and for ever the same without variableness and change; but his infinite greatness, his goodness, his wisdom are different objects to our mind. To which is to be added, that from the changes in our own characters together with his unchangeableness we cannot but consider ourselves as more or less the objects of his approbation, and really be so. For if he approves what is good, he cannot merely in the unchangeableness of his nature approve what is evil. Hence must arise more various movements of mind, more different kinds of affections. And this greater variety also is just and reasonable in such creatures as we are though it respects a Being simply one good and perfect. As some of these affections are most particularly suitable to so imperfect a creature as man, in this mortal state we are passing through, so there may be other exercises of mind, or some of these in higher degrees, our employment and happiness in a state of perfection.

SERMON LXXXI.

By Bishop BUTLER.

CONSIDER then our ignorance, the imperfection of our nature, our virtue and our condition in this world, with respect to infinitely good and just Being, our Creator and Governor, and you will see what religious affections of mind are most particularly suitable to this mortal state we are passing through.

Though we are not affected with any thing so strongly, as what we discern with our senses, and though our nature and condition require, that we be much taken up about sensible things, yet our reason convinces us that God is present with us, and we see and feel the effects of his goodness: he is therefore the object of some regards. The imperfection of our virtue joined with the consideration of his absolute rectitude or holiness, will scarce permit that perfection of love, which entirely casts out all fear, yet goodness is the object of love to all creatures who have any degree of it themselves, and consciousness of a real end is us to approve ourselves to him, joined with the consideration of his goodness is it quite excludes servile dread and horror, so it is plainly a reasonable ground for hope of his favour. Neither fear, nor hope nor love then are excluded, and one or other of these will prevail according to the different views we have of God, and ought to prevail, according to the changes we find in our own character. There is a temper of mind made up of, or which follows from all three, fear, hope, love, namely, resignation to the divine will, which is the general temper belonging to this state which ought to be the habitual frame of our mind and heart, and to be exercised at proper seasons more distinctly, in acts of devotion.

Resignation to the will of God, the whole of piety it includes in it all that is good, and is a source of the most settled quiet and composure of mind. There is the general principle of submission in our nature. Man is not so constituted as to desire things, and be uneasy in the want of them, in proportion to their known value : many other considerations come in to determine the degrees of desire ; particularly, whether the advantage we take a view of, be within the sphere of our rank. Who ever felt uneasiness, upon observing any of the advantages brute creatures have over us ? And yet it is plain they have several. It is the same with respect to advantages belonging to, creatures of a superior order. Thus, though we see a thing to be highly valuable, yet that it does not belong to our condition of being, is sufficient to suspend our desires after it, to make us rest satisfied without such advantage. Now there is just the same reason for quiet resignation in the want of every thing equally unattainable, and out of our reach in particular, though others of our species be possessed of it. All this may be applied to the whole of life ; to positive inconveniences as well as wants ; not indeed to the sensations of pain and sorrow, but to all the uneasinesses of reflection, murmuring, and discontent. Thus is human nature formed to compliance, yielding, submission of temper. We find the principles of it within us ; and every one exercises it towards some objects or other ; i. e. feels it with regard to some persons, and some circumstances. Now this is an excellent foundation of a reasonable and religious resignation. Nature teaches and inclines us to take up with our lot : the consideration, that the course of things is unalterable, hath a tendency to quiet the mind under it, to beget a submission of temper to it. But when we can add, that this unalterable course is appointed and continued by infinite wisdom and goodness ; how absolute should be our submission, how intire our trust and dependance ?

This would reconcile us to our condition ; prevent all the supernumerary troubles arising from imagination, distant fears, impatience ; all uneasiness, except that which necessarily arises from the calamities themselves we may be under. How many of our cares should we by this means be disburthened of ? Cares not properly our own, how apt soever they may be to intrude upon us, and we to admit them ; the anxieties of expectation, solicitude about success and disappointment, which in truth are none of our concern. How open to every gratification would that mind be, which was clear of these incumbrances ?

Our resignation to the will of God may be said to be perfect, when our will is lost and resolved up into his ; when we rest in his will as our end, as being in itself most just, and right, and good. And where is the impossibility of such an affection to what is just, and right, and good, such a loyalty of heart to the Governor of the universe, as shall prevail over all sinister indirect desires of our own ? Neither is this at bottom any thing more than faith, and honesty, and fairness of mind ; in a more enlarged sense, indeed, than those words are commonly used. And as, in common cases, fear and hope, and other passions, are raised in us by their respective objects : so this submission of heart, and soul, and mind, this religious resignation, would be as naturally produced by our having just conceptions of Almighty God, and a real sense of his presence with us. In how low a degree soever this temper usually prevails amongst men, yet it is a temper right in itself : it is what we owe to our Creator : it is particularly suitable to our mortal condition, and what we should endeavour after for our own sakes in our passage through such a world as this ; where is nothing upon which we can rest or depend ; nothing but what we are liable to be deceived and disappointed in. Thus we might acquaint ourselves with God, and be at peace. This is piety and religion in the strictest sense, considered as an habit of mind ; an habitual sense of God's presence with us ; being affected towards him, as present, in the manner his superior nature requires from such a creature as man ; this is to walk with God.

Little more need be said of devotion or religious worship, than that it is this temper exerted into act. The nature of it consists in the actual exercise of those affections towards God, which are supposed habitual in good men. He is always equally present with us ; but we are so much taken up with sensible things, that Lo, he goeth by us, and we see him not ; he passeth on also, but we perceive him not. (Job, ix. 11.) Devotion is retirement, from the world, he has made, to him alone: it is to withdraw from the avocations of sense, to employ our attention wholly upon him, as upon an object actually present, to yield ourselves up to the influence of the Divine presence, and to give full scope to the affections of gratitude, love, reverence, trust, and dependance; of which infinite power, wisdom, and goodness, is the natural and only adequate object. We may apply to the whole of devotion those words of the son of Sirach, When you glorify the Lord, exalt him as much as you can; for even yet will he far exceed: and when you exalt him, put forth all your strength, and be not weary; for you can never go far enough. (Ecclus. xliii. 30.) Our most raised affections of every kind cannot but fall short and be disproportionate, when an infinite Being is the object of them.

This is the highest exercise and employment of mind, that a creature is capable of. As this divine service and worship is itself absolutely due to God, so also is it necessary in order to a further end, to keep alive upon our minds a sense of his authority, a sense that in our ordinary behaviour amongst men we act under him as our governor and judge.

Thus you see the temper of mind respecting God, which is particularly suitable to a state of imperfection; to creatures in a progress of being towards somewhat further.

Suppose now this something further attained; that we were arrived at it: what a perception will it be, to see, and know, and feel, that our trust was not vain, our dependance not groundless? That the issue, event, and consummation, came out such as fully to justify and answer that resignation? If the obscure view of the divine perfection, which we have in this world, ought in just consequence to beget an entire resignation; what will this resignation be exalted into, when we shall see face to face, and know as we are known? If we cannot form any distinct notion of that perfection of the love of God, which casts out all fear; of that enjoyment of him, which will be the happiness of good men hereafter; the consideration of our wants and capacities of happiness, and that he will be an adequate supply to them, must serve us instead of such distinct conception of the particular happiness itself.

Let us then suppose a man entirely disengaged from business and pleasure, sitting down alone and at leisure, to reflect upon himself and his own condition of being. He would immediately feel that he was by no means complete of himself, but totally insufficient for his own happiness. One may venture to affirm, that every man hath felt this, whether he hath again reflected upon it or not. It is feeling this deficiency, that they are unsatisfied with themselves, which makes men look out for assistance from abroad; and which has given rise to various kinds of amusements, altogether needless any otherwise than as they serve to fill up the blank spaces of time, and so hinder their feeling this deficiency, and being uneasy with themselves. Now, if these external things we take up with, were really an adequate supply to this deficiency of human nature, if by their means our capacities and desires were all satisfied and filled up; then it might be truly said, that we had found out the proper happiness of man; and so might sit down satisfied, and be at rest in the enjoyment of it. But if it appears, that the amusements, which men usually pass their time in, are so far from coming up to, or answering our notions and desires of, happiness, or good, that they are really no more than what they are commonly called, somewhat to pass away the time; i. e. somewhat which serves to turn us aside from, and prevent our attending to, this our internal poverty and want; if they serve only, or chiefly, to suspend, instead of satisfying, our conceptions and desires of happiness; if the want remains, and we have found out little more than barely the means of making it less sensible; then are we still to seek for somewhat to be an adequate supply to it. It is plain that there is a capacity in the nature of man, which neither riches, nor honours, nor sensual gratifications, nor any thing in this world, can perfectly fill up or satisfy: there is a deeper and more essential want, than any of these things can be the supply of. Yet surely there is a possibility of somewhat, which may fill up all our capacities of happiness: somewhat, in which our souls may find rest; somewhat, which may be to us that satisfactory good we are inquiring after. But it cannot be any thing which is valuable, only as it tends to some further end. Those therefore who have got this world so much into their hearts, as not to be able to consider happiness as consisting in any thing but property and possessions, which are only valuable as the means to somewhat else, cannot have the least glimpse of the subject before us; which is the end, not the means; the thing itself, not somewhat in order to it. But if you can lay aside that general, confused, undeterminate notion of happiness, as consisting in such possessions, and fix in your thoughts, that it really can consist in nothing but in a faculty's having its proper object, you will clearly see, that in the coolest way of consideration, without either the heat of fanciful enthusiasm, or the warmth of real devotion, nothing is more certain, than that an Infinite Being may himself be, if he pleases, the supply to all the capacities of our nature. All the common enjoyments of life, are from the faculties he hath endued us with, and the objects he hath made suitable to them. He may himself be to us infinitely more than all these: he may be to us all that we want. As our understanding can contemplate itself, and our affections be exercised upon themselves by reflection, so may each be employed in the same manner upon any other mind: and since the Supreme Mind, the Author and Cause of all things, is the highest possible object to himself, he may be an adequate supply to all the faculties of our souls; a subject to our understanding, and an object to our affections.

Consider then: when we shall have put off this mortal body; when we shall be divested of sensual appetites, and those possessions, which are now the means of gratification, shall be of no avail; when this restless scene of business and vain pleasures, which now diverts us from ourselves, shall be all over; we, our proper self, shall still remain: we shall still continue the same creatures we are, with wants to be supplied, and capacities of happiness. We must have faculties of perception, though not sensitive ones; and pleasure or uneasiness from our perceptions, as now we have.

There are certain ideas, which we express by the words, order, harmony, proportion, beauty, the furthest removed from any thing sensual. Now what is there in those intellectual images, forms, or ideas, which begets that approbation, love, delight, and even rapture, which is seen in some persons' faces upon having those objects present to their minds? "Mere enthusiasm!" Be it what it will: there are objects, works of nature and of art, which all mankind have delight from, quite distinct from their affording gratification to sensual appetites; and from quite another view of them, than as being for their interest and further advantage. The faculties from which we are capable of these pleasures, and the pleasures themselves, are as natural, and as much to be accounted for, as any sensual appetite whatever, and the pleasure from its gratification. Words to be sure are wanting upon this subject; to say, that every thing of grace and beauty throughout the whole of nature, every thing excellent and amiable shared in differently lower degrees by the whole creation, meet in the Author and Cause of all things; this is an adequate, and perhaps a proper way of speaking of the Divine Nature: but it is manifest that absolute rectitude, the perfection of being, must be in all senses, and in every respect, the highest object to the mind.

In this world it is only the effects of wisdom and power and greatness which we discern: it is not impossible, that hereafter the qualities themselves in the Supreme Being may be the immediate object of contemplation. What amazing wonders are opened to view by late improvements! What an object is the universe to a creature, if there be a creature who can comprehend its system! But it must be an infinitely higher exercise of the understanding, to view the scheme of it in that mind, which projected it, before its foundations were laid. And surely we have meaning to the words, when we speak of going further; and viewing, not only this system in his mind, but the wisdom and intelligence itself, from whence it proceeded. The same may be said of power. But since we dom and power are not God, he is a wise, a powerful Being; the Divine Nature may therefore be a further object to the understanding. It is nothing to observe that our senses give us but an imperfect knowledge of things; effects themselves, if we knew them thoroughly, would give us but imperfect notions of wisdom and power; much less of his being, in whom they reside. I am not speaking of any fanciful notion of seeing all things in God; but only representing to you, how much an higher object to the understanding an infinite Being himself is, than the things which he has made; and this is no more than saying, that the Creator is superior to the works of his hands.

This may be illustrated by a low example. Suppose a machine, the sight of which would raise, and discoveries in its contrivance gratify, our curiosity: the real delight, in this case, would arise from its being the effect of skill and contrivance. This skill in the mind of the artificer would be an higher object, if we had any senses or ways to discern it. For, observe, the contemplation of that principle, faculty, or power, which produced any effect, must be an higher exercise of the understanding, than the contemplation of the effect itself. The cause must be an higher object to the mind than the effect.

But whoever considers distinctly what the delight of knowledge is, will see reason to be satisfied that it cannot be the chief good of man: all this, as it is applicable, so it was mentioned with regard to the attribute of goodness. I say, goodness. Our being and all our enjoyments are the effects of it: just men bear its resemblance: but how little do we know of the original, of what it is in itself? Recall what was before observed concerning the affection to moral characters; which, in how low a degree soever, yet is plainly natural to man, and the most excellent part of his nature: suppose this improved, as it may be improved, to any degree whatever, in the spirits of just men made perfect; and then suppose that they had a real view of that righteousness which is an everlasting righteousness; of the conformity of the Divine Will to the law of truth, in which the moral attributes of God consist; of that goodness in the Sovereign Mind, which gave birth to the universe: add, what will be true of all good men hereafter, a consciousness of having an interest in what they are contemplating; suppose them able to say, This God is our God for ever and ever: would they then be any longer to seek for what was their chief happiness, their final good? Could the utmost stretch of their capacities look further? Would not infinite perfect goodness be their very end, the last end and object of their affections; beyond which they could neither have, nor desire; beyond which they could not form a wish or thought?

Consider wherein that presence of a friend consists, which has often so strong an effect, as wholly to possess the mind, and entirely suspend all other affections and regards; and which itself affords the highest satisfaction and enjoyment. He is within reach of the senses. Now, as our capacities of perception improve, we shall have, perhaps by some faculty entirely new, a perception of God's presence with us in a nearer and stricter way; since it is certain he is more intimately present with us than any thing else can be. Proof of the existence and presence of any thing is quite different from the immediate perception, the consciousness of it. What then will be the joy of heart, which his presence, and the light of his countenance, who is the life of the universe, will inspire good men with, when they shall have a sensation, that he is the sustainer of their being, that they exist in him; when they shall feel his influence to cheer, and enliven, and support, their frame, in a manner of which we have now no conception? He will be, in a literal sense, their strength and their portion for ever.

When we speak of things so much above our comprehension, as the employment and happiness of a future state, doubtless it behoves us to speak with all modesty and distrust of ourselves. But the Scripture represents the happiness of that state under the notions of seeing God, seeing him as he is, knowing as we are known, and seeing face to face. These words are not general or undetermined, but express a particular determinate happiness. And I will be bold to say, that nothing can account for, or come up to these expressions, but only this, that God himself will be an object to our faculties, that he himself will be our happiness; as distinguished from the enjoyments of the present state, which seem to arise, not immediately from him, but from the objects he has adapted to give us delight.

To conclude: Let us suppose a person tired with care and sorrow, and the repetition of vain delights which fill up the round of life; sensible that every thing here below in its best estate is altogether vanity. Suppose him to feel that deficiency of human nature, before taken notice of; and to be convinced that God alone was the adequate supply to it; what could be more applicable to a good man, in this state of mind; or better express his present wants and distant hopes; his passage through this world as a progress towards a state of perfection; than the following passages in the devotions of the royal Prophet? They are plainly in an higher and more proper sense applicable to this, than they could be to any thing else. I have seen an end of all perfection. Whom have I in heaven but thee? And there is none upon earth that I desire in com- parison of thee. My flesh and my heart faileth; but God is the strength of my heart, and my portion for ever. Like as the hart desireth the water-brooks, so longeth my soul after thee, O God. My soul is athirst for God: yea, even for the living God: when shall I come to appear before him? How excellent is thy loving-kindness, O God! and the children of men shall put their trust under the shadow of thy wings. They shall be satisfied with the plenteousness of thy house: and thou shalt give them drink of thy pleasures, as out of the river. For with thee is the well of life: and in thy light shall we see light. Blessed is the man whom thou chooseth, and receivest into thee, he shall dwell in thy court, and shall be satisfied with the pleasures of thy house, even of thy holy temple. Blessed is the people, O Lord, that can rejoice in thee; they shall walk in the light of thy countenance. Their delight shall be daily in thy name, and in thy righteousness shall they make their boast. For thou art the glory of their strength: and in thy loving-kindness they shall be exalted. As for me, I will behold thy presence in righteousness: and when I awake up after thy likeness, I shall be satisfied with it. Thou shalt shew me the path of life; in thy presence is the fulness of joy, and at thy right hand there is pleasure for evermore.

FAMILY LECTURES:

PART II.

SERMON LXXXII.

By F. W. L. ST. JOHN, D.D.

Rector of Yeldon in Bedfordshire.

JOB, xxvii. 5, 6.

Tell me, I will not remove my integrity from me; my righteousness I hold fast, and will not let it go: my heart shall not reproach me, so long as I live.

These were the words of good and holy Job, the most innocent, perhaps, and yet at the same time the most afflicted man that ever was; I might have added the most miserable of all men, had he not been innocent. And in them we cannot but observe, what a mighty satisfaction the good man takes in the peace of his conscience, and the performance of his duty, and the steadiness of his resolution. (Whatever should befall him,) never to let that go, never to be flattered nor frightened out of it by any temptation or discouragement whatsoever. And never surely was there a resolution more vigorously maintained, or more eminently rewarded: for to make good the character God himself had given of his servant, we find him remarkably put upon all the several trials that human nature is capable of undergoing. The devil had pretended, that integrity supported with a prosperous condition, was but an imperfect discovery of the man, and never would desist, until he had obtained a commission from God to assault and prove him with the extremities of adversity. And no sooner had he obtained it, but immediately he enters upon the execution of it with all the might and fury he is master of. In one moment he lays waste the fortunes of his house, and the hopes of his posterity, he brings down this mighty prince from his throne, he fills the dunghill, and there afflicts him with poverty and disease. He bereaves him of his friends, he bereaves him of his wife (and the wife of him, who is the best of the rest,) instead of being the comforters of his afflictions, are the reproachers of his distress. In this manner and manner of affliction, it was the good man's business to have somewhat reserve, which he could safely call his own, and which it was neither in the power of the devil to ravish, nor of the Chaldeans and Sabeans to plunder, nor of any outward violence to destroy.

In the want of all the good things he had formerly abounded with, he was left with comfort still (and a mighty comfort sure was) to remember, that he had enjoyed them innocently, and employed them faithfully. Under the heavy load of all the evils he at present suffered, it was no doubt, a great refreshment to his spirits, to consider that it was not for any notorious provocation of his God, or injury to his neighbour, that they were come upon him. Under all the reproaches of his enemies, and the uncharitableness of his friends, he could at all times appeal to his conscience for redress; nay, in confidence of his integrity, he boldly durst look up to God himself, and maintain his ways before him. He bid him judge, whether he had not walked innocently, (Job, xiii. 15.) and if there were any wickedness in his hands; notwithstanding an humble assurance also, that God, in his own good time, would take away his plagues from him, would speedily remove the afflictions with which he had been pleased to visit him, more, he knew, for the trial of his patience, than the punishment of his sins; that he would graciously turn again at the last, and reward him after his righteous dealing, and according to the cleanness of his hands in his eye-sight. (Job, xviii. 25.) Such hope and confidence had holy Job at a time when all other hope and confidence failed him, in the sense of his innocency, and the integrity of his ways; and no wonder therefore if we find him so very loth to let it go; no wonder if he held it fast, as his best and most valuable treasure, as something much dearer to him than life itself, because it was this alone could support the miseries of life, and in God's good time make way for the removal of them. Tell me, I will not remove my integrity from me, etc.

In discoursing to you on these words, the plain and familiar use I would beg leave to make of them, shall be only this, to shew you the wisdom of this resolution, of holding fast our integrity, and never letting it go, upon any prospect or temptation whatsoever.

Had this great example of patience and fidelity been given us in these loose unsettled times of ours, men, instead of imitating the steadiness, would have laughed, I am afraid, at the impolicy of his principles. They fools would have counted his life madness, (Wisd. v. 4.) and wondered what he meant by serving God for nought, and still retaining his integrity, when he found himself so very ill encouraged for it.

I would not willingly be thought to speak uncharitably of the age and country we live in, but I heartily wish we were less able to justify the severity of this reflection. For what, alas! is become of those old antiquated notions of honour and conscience, of virtue and religion, so justly extolled in the writings of the heathens, and so eminently conspicuous in the sufferings of the Christians? I doubt, upon inquiry it will be found, that we have little more than the name and the profession of them alive among us: here and there perhaps we may meet with an honest well-meaning man, who shall dare upon occasion still to speak and suffer for them; but the crafty and the cunning, and the great pretenders to the wisdom of this world, have long since exploded them, and taken up a more convenient set of principles in their room. They, good men, to give them their due, can be as faithful to their God, as dutiful to their prince, and as honest to their neighbour, as one would wish them, as long as there is nothing to be lost, as long as there is any thing to be got by being so. They, good Christians, can come to church to-day for a good place, and with every whit as good a conscience go and betray that church to-morrow for a better. To favour a design, they can be loud, and warm, and stickle for this or that religion, and when they have no further occasion for it, as easily bring themselves to shake hands with all; they never trouble themselves with considering what is virtuous, but what is safe; influenced in their actions by no other principle but the hopes of advantage, or the fears of inconvenience, and ready to stand about with the first fair wind that shall promise but to carry them on with success, and bring them off again with safety.

If this now be the wisdom of this world, as confident and as popular as it is, it will be found upon inquiry to be but foolishness with God. (1 Cor. iii. 19.) The way, which God hath pointed out, whereby we may arrive at happiness, is quite opposite to this; the tracks and foot-steps of our duty are all along as plain and as legible as we can wish; and if we will but follow them, will lead us on as strait and as direct a path as we can go. So that the very windings and turnings, through which unfaithfulness wanders, are enough to convince us, that it mistakes its course, and instead of carrying us, as it pretends, a shorter way, is losing sight apace of happiness, and insensibly making on to misery.

And how indeed can these men possibly fail of being in the wrong, when the very first step they advance proceeds upon mistake? And their mistake is this; they falsely divide their duty from their interest, the two things in the world of all others most strictly inseparable. For it is as certain as the appointment of God, and the nature of the thing itself can make it, that every man is so far happy as he is virtuous, and miserable as he is vicious. Upon this foundation it is, that the happiness of God himself is conceived to stand; for could we but suppose it possible for that infinite Being to decline but never so little from those eternal rules of holiness and equity, which he steadily pursues, God himself would from that very instant immediately cease to be happy, and begin to be miserable. Had the devil himself but held fast his integrity, he had been happy still; nor can he ever destroy the happiness of man, but by persuading him to that by which he lost his own. God may sometimes suffer him to put forth his hand, and to touch all that we have, (Job, i. 2.) he may consume our families, and plunder our estates, and torment our bodies; all this we find he did to holy Job; but then this was the worst and the utmost he could do. And what, alas! is all this to the forfeiture of a good conscience, and the loss of our integrity? If we keep but masters still of these, in spite of any outward calamities which can befall us, we may still make a shift to live tolerably easy, we may be sure we can never be extremely miserable under them; nay, it is our own fault too, if we are not in many respects considerably the better for them. But if ever we should be unhappily persuaded, upon what account soever, to let these go, our case is desperate: we have made ourselves as completely miserable as the devil himself can wish us; we leave ourselves naked and exposed to the severest of his cruelties, and what is worst of all, we have lost the only thing in the world that can serve to make them tolerable. And therefore it is, that God, who has made so sure provision for our happiness, that we have nobody but ourselves to thank if we are miserable, hath given us a more secure possession of our integrity, than of any one thing in the world besides, that we can call our own. Other things he hath left us the uncertain masters of; but the sense of our innocence, but the satisfaction of a good conscience, are essential to our happiness, and therefore always in our power: our integrity is that better part, which may be abandoned by cowardice, or given up by treachery, but can never, by downright violence, be taken from us. (Luke, x. 42.)

And therefore the wisdom of resolving to hold it fast and never to let it go, will abundantly appear, as from several other considerations I might mention, so more especially from these that follow:

First, Because in parting with our integrity we let go that without which prosperity itself can never make us happy.

Secondly, Because we let go that which, being once gone, affliction needs must render us insupportably miserable.

And finally, We let go that which alone can avail us in the day of judgment.

And first, I say, in parting with our integrity, we let go that without which prosperity itself can never make us happy.

I am apt to believe, there is not any one mistake about the matters of religion has done it more real disservice, than that which men so very frequently run into, concerning the seeming happiness of the wicked in this life. How many false exceptions against Providence, and discouragements from virtue, has it sometimes started in the best of men? How often does it stagger the honest man, and make him almost repent of his integrity, and begin to think with the psalmist, that he hath cleansed his heart in vain, and washed his hands in innocency, when he sees the ungodly (as it sometimes happens) in such prosperity? (Psalm lxxiii. 13.) It is true indeed, and must not be denied, that as to the outward advantages of this life, its riches, its power, its honours, and the like, (though, by the way, integrity is generally observed to bid fairest for them,) yet they are not so strictly appropriated to the virtuous only, but that God does sometimes suffer them to become the inheritance of folly, and the recompence of vice. But even in this seeming equality of his distributions to the wicked and the good, God, we may observe, has made a very sensible distinction, and done abundantly enough to justify the conduct of his providence, and the wisdom of our integrity. Both of them, it is true, (both the wicked and the good,) may be equally rich, and honourable, and mighty in the world; but then both can never be equally happy; God punishes the wicked with those very blessings he admits him to partake of, and to make his prosperity itself a curse to him, denies him, in his anger, the power of enjoying it. For what enjoyment, alas! can the wicked ever taste in the lawless acquisitions of prosperous fraud, or successful violence? But not thyself, saith the psalmist; because of the ungodly, neither be thou jealous against the evil-doer. (Ps. xxxix.) Never grudge him the rise of his honours, nor the increase of his estate; if they were twice as large and as many as they are, he abundantly deserves them all; never fear, the man has paid for them to purpose, and for ought we know, undone himself by the purchase. Perhaps he has renounced his God, or dissembled his religion; it may be he has sold his country, or betrayed his master for them; perhaps he has been doing nothing else these many years, but plundering the fatherless, and oppressing the widow.

And now may we not fairly ask him, To what purpose was all this waste? (Matt. xxvi. 8.) This vast irreparable expence of honour and conscience, and whatever else is truly valuable? And what has he got after all this mighty labour of sinful industry, but the pleasure at last of appearing to be happy, and the pain of being really miserable?

But not therefore (says the Wise Man) the glory of the sinner, for thou knowest not what shall be his end. (Ecclus. ix. 11.); nay, thou knowest not so much as how it fares at present with him. In the sight of the universe (Wisd. iii. 2.) he seems to be happy; they stand ignorantly gazing at the brightness of his figure, and never suspect all the while the miseries it conceals; they see him only in his best light, and in his easy hours, when his pleasures or his company are amusing him, or when business diverts him from preying on himself. But could they but follow him into the agonies of his retirement, and there behold the wretched creature accusing, condemning, and tormenting himself, ever jealous of discovery, and afraid of punishment, they would pity and lament him heartily, notwithstanding all his splendor and his jollity, and begin to think with Solomon, that (if this be the joy of sinners) then better is a little with righteousness, than great revenues without right (Prov. xvi. 8.); better to wander about from house to house, an honest cheerful pilgrim, without so much as bread to eat, or a place where to rest our weary head, than to sleep, and surfeit in the dwellings of unrighteousness.

And how should the thought of this make every honest man, (the poorest man amongst us, if he but honest,) how, I say, should it make him bless himself, and his integrity, and resolve with holy Job to hold it fast, and never let it go, and think himself, as he really is, infinitely more happy with the little that he has, than the ungodly can ever be, in the abundance of the things that he possesseth: if it is but little that he has, he enjoys that little fearless and secure; fearless of any injuries from others, because he never knew what it was to practise any, and secure of His providence, who careth for the righteous, and hath pleasure in the prosperity of his servants. (Psalm, xiv. 8.—xxxv. 27.—ii.) But as for the ungodly, it is not so with them. In the revenues of the wicked (says the Wise Man) there is trouble (Prov. xv. 6.) The tears of the fatherless, and the clamours of the injured, are continually disputing his title, and disturbing his possession. He will be ever and anon reflecting, how unfairly he came by what he has, and how easily he may lose it. Every one he meets with, he naturally suspects of the same treacherous designs he himself is guilty of, and fancies they are contriving how to revenge the public, and make reprisals on him. As for God and his providence, he never thinks on them, but with horror and amazement; for how can he expect God should long secure him in those possessions he has obtained in defiance of his laws, and by the assistance of his enemies, and which he had neither the modesty to ask of him, nor the gratitude to thank him for?

And here I dare appeal to the greatest, and the best paid sinner of them all, and for once will venture to admit his evidence. Let him tell us, if he can, he who has been so long trading with the devil for his integrity, whether he thinks he ever yet did give him a fair equivalent for it. When did he ever reap so great advantage from it, as not a thousand times since to repent him of his bargain? How often, if the truth were known, and how heartily has he wished, that every body had their own, and he the peace of his conscience again? Or lastly, let him tell us, if he can, what one good day he remembers to have seen, since he foolishly parted with the pleasures of his innocency? No; without these, it is impossible he should be happy: heaven itself, could a man be supposed to go guilty thither, would never make him so. And if this be then the case; if those few, who let go a good conscience at their own price, and the best the devil can afford to give them, if they have yet no better bargain than this to brag of, what a wretched uncomfortable one must those poor creatures make, who sell their integrity for nought, and take no money for it. (Ps. xlv. 12.) If the riches, and the honours, and the best assignments the devil can make us, are themselves but punishments, I hope the disgraces and the miseries he generally pays us in, will pass upon nobody for very desirable encouragements. But this consideration will more naturally fall under the second head I proposed to speak to; which was,

That, in putting with our integrity, we let go that which, being once gone, affliction needs must render us insupportably miserable.

There is not any thing in the life of man he may with so much certainty depend upon, as a share in the troubles that inseparably accompany it. And to hear the complaints men are every hour of the day making on this subject, one would really believe there was no one truth in the world they are more experimentally convinced of. And yet, alas! how very few among them do we see make any provision at all for that, which all are sensible that nobody can avoid, or however, not that wise and that safe provision which alone may be depended on for service and support? As long as the world runs smoothly on their side, on they travel, thoughtless and secure, never considering, that though it is fair and sunshine now, the weather soon may change, and a storm they little dream of break suddenly upon them. Tush, say the fools to themselves, in their vain security, we shall never be cast down, there shall no harm happen unto us (Ps. x. 6); they think, they are sufficiently provided with shelter and retreat; they have been a long time strengthening themselves in the multitude of their riches, in the number of their dependants, and the interest of their alliances. But, alas! no sooner do the rains descend, and the floods come, and the winds begin to blow and beat upon them, (Mat. vii. 25.) but these blind presceptors to their sorrow find, that they have all this while been working on a false foundation, and fortifying on the sand. Whereas the wise and the honest man, who builds upon the sure foundations of his own integrity, stands unshaken and secure. The rains may descend, the floods may come, the winds may blow and beat upon him, but the bottom he leans upon is sound and good, and will bear the severest stress of wind and weather. Afflictions may dash and spend themselves upon him, but his hope and his confidence (like the rock it is built upon) may not be removed but standeth fast for ever. (Ps. cxxv. 1.)

This, Job in his prosperity was happily aware of, and delayed not to make provision for it accordingly. The most flourishing of his fortunes could never make him forget that they were slippery and uncertain; that a time might come, when his riches would fly away, his glory vanish, and his friends forsake him; and therefore he wisely bethought himself to make sure of one; one friend he knew he had, a conscience I mean, well assured of its integrity, which had never basely flattered him in his prosperity, and was the more unlikely therefore to forsake him in adversity. Thus therefore he resolved to hold fast, and never let it go. And how soon did he live to make trial of this friendship, and bless the choice that had so happily secured it! For in the day of that distress which so surprisingly befel him, when his neighbours and his kindred, and his own familiar friends in whom he trusted, forsook him hastily and fled, this faithfully accompanied him into the worst of fortunes, and wonderfully supported him under them; then the blessing of him that was ready to perish came seasonably upon him, because he had delivered the poor when he cried, (Job, xxix. 13.) the fatherless, and him that had none to help. In the multitude of the sorrows that he had in his heart, these comforts still refreshed his soul, (Ps. xciv. 19.) that he had never done any thing that he knew of to deserve so severe a punishment; had never attempted sinfully to avoid his troubles before they came, nor unlawfully to break loose from them after they were fallen upon him. And therefore since his heart condemned him not, he would still continue to have confidence towards God (1 John, iii. 21.); and in the hopes of his mercy, and the assurance of his favour, wait with patience all the days of his appointed time, until his change should come (Job, xiv. 14.); when God should once more remember Job and all his troubles, and comfort him again after the time that he had plagued him, (Psal. cxxxii. 1.) and for the years wherein he had suffered adversity, (Psal. xc. 15.)

The spirit of a man, with these reflections to support it, will go a great way towards sustaining his infirmities, and carry him on through this short vale of life and misery, and the shadow of death itself, with comfort and security. But a wounded spirit who can bear? (Prov. xviii. 14.) When that which alone can give us any comfort, itself is comfortless; when the devil has assaulted us, and our God forsaken us, and our own minds the mean while write bitter things against us; when every stroke we feel, carries in it the marks of a punishment; and the reproaches of sin; and we have hardly so much as the remembrance of any one good action we have done, to refresh our drooping spirits; what can sustain a man oppressed with these sorrows, and acquainted with such griefs? And yet how light are these sorrows, how easy are these griefs, under all the guilty miseries of life, if compared with those a wounded spirit feels when death and judgment look it in the face! How will the man, doth he think, behave himself, when he feels his soul draw nigh unto hell, and the pains of death get hold upon him? (Psal. lxxxviii. 3.) What would he now give for the supports of that integrity, which once he might have kept, but which then he wantonly prostituted to a lust, or sacrificed to a passion? What would he now give for the comforts of that faith which, it may be, he has long ago renounced for impatience, or dissembled for prudence? (Psalm xvi. 15.) Right precious then in his sight will be the death of God's saints, and the pains of their martyrdom itself desirable. How will he wish a thousand and a thousand times, that he had died like one of these, for the testimony of a good conscience, rather than thus have expired under the tortures of a bad one? He then should have had the righteousness of his cause, and the presence of his God, and the assurance of his reward, to support and comfort him. And, O! what a blessed confidence, what an unshaken security will these refreshments give us at our departure hence! Then, when we walk through the gloominess of death itself, even then to fear no evil! (Psal. xxiii.) Then to be able to look back on the world we are about to leave, and with a satisfaction not altogether unlike to that of its Creator, to see that all that we have done in its good, (Gen. i.) nothing that we have done in it is unpardonably wicked: then to be able to say unto God with our departing breath, and with good Hezekiah's humble confidence, Remember now, O Lord, I beseech thee, how I have walked before thee in truth, and with a perfect heart, and have done that which is good in thy sight (Isaiah, xxxviii. 3.); I say, if there be any thing in this world can deserve a serious wish, it is a conscience always thus prepared to leave it; and since God and our integrity are our best and our last supports, both in life and in death, that he will never suffer us, for any pleasures of life, for any pains of death, to fall from him.

And indeed if there were nothing in any of the foregoing considerations to evince the necessity of resolving to hold it fast, this one consideration alone, exclusive of all others, were abundantly sufficient. For let us now allow the dishonest person as many and as great advantages as ever any man could yet propose to himself, and many more, God knows, than ever any yet could find by being so, we will suppose his villainies for once (which yet they never were) infallibly secure of secrecy and success; we will load him with as many ill-gotten honours and estates, as avarice and ambition itself can wish for; we will give him too, upon the supposal, that which in reality he is utterly incapable of, the power of enjoying all this without disturbance or remorse, and of living as pleasantly, and of dying as easily, as much honest men can do without them; why, truly all this put together will amount to a very fair provision for the short stay we are to make in this life; but then it is a provision for this life only. What preparation (if a man may ask him) has the tool been all this while a-making for eternity? He that is so dexterous at striking in with every pitiful advantage, and declining every little inconvenience in his way, has he been wise enough, with all his cunning to secure eternal happiness? Has he been careful enough, with all his caution, to avoid eternal misery? If he has not, God knows, he has been plotting and contriving, and taking abundance of pains, to very little purpose. For, alas! our great and final interest lies out in another country, and beyond the grave; and it is the grossest misapplying of our consideration imaginable, to contrive only how we shall rub on the few days, and months, and years we have to live, and never once to bethink ourselves what will at last become of us, and in what condition we shall subsist for ever?

Now whatever hopes a man may have of carrying on an interest in this world, by acting contrary to his duty, no man, I dare say, was ever weak enough to imagine it could be of any service to him in another. Nay, does not every man's conscience directly tell him that it will not? Upon every unlawful action he commits, does he not immediately feel a regular process commence within him? and is he not as certainly accused, convicted, and condemned upon the spot? And happy we! to-day it we will hear this mighty voice, and not harden our hearts, (Psalm. xcv. 8.) but be warned by its whispers to avoid the thunder that will one day accompany it; for, if we will not hearken to them now, the time will come, when our consciences will be heard by us whether we will or no; when the devil shall join in charging home the evidence, and God himself appear to confirm the sentence. And then shall all the celebrated arts of dissimulation and hypocrisy be detected and exposed, and lie down in the shame and misery of those that practised them: and the strictest honesty be found upon the whole to have been the truest policy. Then, happy they! who instead of purchasing any thing in this life at the hazard of their soul, were glad to lose even life itself, that they might save it! How bold and fearless will they stand before the dread tribunal, secure of being justified in their trial, and clear when they are judged! (Psalm, li. 4.) How will it transport them, to hear their innocence vindicated, and their integrity proclaimed, and their wisdom applauded in the ears of all men! With what pleasure then will they look back on the past travail of their soul, and be satisfied! (Isaiah, lxi. 11.) on all the little hardships and discouragements they have met with here below, in the cause of afflicted virtue, and of persecuted truth! And how will they bless the torments, and the death itself, that at last has brought them, through so light a trial, to so inconceivable an happiness! In the eyes of men they were punished, and their departure was taken for misery (Wisd. iii. 4.): but now are they numbered with the children of God, and their lot is amongst his saints! (chap. v. 5.) where, having been a little chastised, they shall be greatly rewarded: where God himself shall graciously condescend to bid them welcome to their happiness, and in these transporting words, at once acknowledge and recompence their integrity: Well done thou good and faithful servant; thou hast been faithful in a few things; I will make thee ruler over many things; enter thou into the joy of thy Lord (Matt. xxv. 21.)

 ford College, Oxford.

On Patience.

LUKE, XXI. 19.

In your patience possess ye your souls.

OUR blessed Saviour having, from the 5th verse of this chapter, foretold the destruction of the temple and city of Jerusalem; and from the 12th enumerated to his disciples the several evils they should undergo, before this should come to pass; as that men should lay hands on them, and persecute them, delivering them up to the synagogues, and into prisons, being brought before kings and rulers for his name's sake: that they should be betrayed both by parents, and brethren, and kinsfolks, and friends, and that some of them should be put to death: he concludes with an assurance, that there should not an hair of their head perish: and with an exhortation to them to possess in the mean time their souls in patience. In your patience possess ye your souls.

From these words thus spoken by our blessed Saviour, I shall discourse to you concerning the duty of patience under those afflictions to which we are all exposed, and for the bearing of which, when we meet with them, we ought to be so prepared, that how many, and how great soever they be, how suddenly soever they come upon us, and how long soever they stay with us, we may possess our souls in patience.

In treating this subject, I shall consider,

I. What Christian patience is, and wherein it consists.

II. I shall endeavour to shew what motives there are to induce us to the practice of this duty.

III. I shall lay before you some considerations, some rules, by which this virtue, this art of patience, if I may so call it, may be most effectually acquired.

I. Then I am to shew what is meant by patience, and wherein it consists.

Patience, then (as far as it is a duty), I take to be a moderation of grief under afflictions.

To grieve under afflictions, is natural to us, and cannot be avoided by us; but that this grief keep within its due bounds; that it do not break out into excess; that it be not disproportioned to the occasions of it; that it be confined within those rules which reason and religion prescribe; that it be not inordinate either as to its measure or its continuance, is the work of that patience, in which we are required to possess our souls.

Sometimes, the loss of what is pleasant, and the fear of what is hurtful to us, affect us with an irregular grief. Our concern on these occasions hath often so strong an influence upon us, as to disturb our reason, and to make us even disregard our religion, rather than not indulge our passion.

Sometimes, the injuries we receive from our neighbour affect us with an immoderate grief, and make us resent them too keenly, and pursue our revenge of them too warmly.

Sometimes, again, the evils we suffer, considered as the allotments of Providence, affect us with an unwarrantable grief, and make us repine against the Almighty, and murmur at that justice which punishes our sins according to their desert; nay, even at that goodness which punishes them much less than they deserve.

And since these are the evil effects of immoderate grief, as to ourselves, to our brethren, and to Almighty God, the better to shew you, wherein patience or this moderation of grief consists, I shall explain it according to these three several respects. And,

I. I shall shew, what this moderation of grief is, with reference to ourselves; and what influence it ought to have upon us in the government of our passions; in which respect, patience is the same with what we usually call constancy, or Christian fortitude.

2. I shall consider it, with relation to our neighbours; or how we ought to bear the injuries we receive from them. Patience, in this view of it, is the same with Christian meekness.

3. I shall consider it in regard to God; or how we ought to behave ourselves towards him under those afflictions which he is pleased to visit us withal. Patience, in this respect, is the same with Christian resignation.

1. I am to shew, what this moderation of grief is, in reference to ourselves; or what influence it ought to have upon us in the government of our passions. In which respect, patience is the same with what we usually call constancy, or Christian fortitude.

When we define patience to be a moderation of grief under afflictions, we suppose it lawful for us to be sensible of the evils we suffer.

Insensibility under afflictions (of which, as it is very uncommon, and rather affected than real in those who pretend to it, much needs not be said) lies as wide from moderation on the one side, as excess of grief doth on the other. It is not so usual to be too little, as it is to be too much grieved under the calamities that befall us: but he who is too little, is as far from true patience, because he is as far from moderation, as he who is too much afflicted with the evils under which he labours. Moderation doth not consist in a total unconcernedness about the object we are to shew our moderation in; but in proportioning our concern to the object we are concerned about. So that it is as possible for us to fall short of a due mean as to go beyond it.

Not to be grieved at the calamities which befall ourselves is unnatural, and inconsistent with that self-love which is the first principle of all our actions, and inseparable from us. Not to be concerned at the calamities which befall other men, is ill-natured, and contrary to that great precept of our Saviour, which enjoins us to love our neighbour as ourselves.

It is as much the duty of a Christian to weep with them that weep, as to rejoice with them that rejoice. Some there are indeed who tell us, that when the Apostle bids us weep with them that weep, he doth not prescribe to us the affection of grief, but the effects of it, as good counsel, assistance, and the like: but certainly he bids us weep with them that weep, in the same sense as he bids us rejoice with them that rejoice. If the internal affection is commanded or allowed in the one case, why not in the other? Our Saviour, when he saw Mary weeping, and the Jews also weeping, over the grave of Lazarus, groaned in the spirit, and was troubled, and wept. Here was the internal affection of grief, as well as the outward indication of it. Our Saviour felt that inward pain which he outwardly expressed. He first groaned in his spirit, and was troubled, before his sorrow brake forth in tears. This passion of grief had certainly never been lodged within us, if it was never to have been exercised by us. Our Creator had not made us liable to so many occasions of sorrow, if it were unlawful for us, upon any occasion, to be sorrowful. He made us subject to this passion, no doubt, that being grieved at those things which were not good for us, we might endeavour to avoid the things which were thus accompanied with grief; that, being tenderly affected with objects of compassion, we might be forcibly excited to relieve those whom we were thus, by a natural sympathy, obliged to pity; that sorrow might be a punishment for our past sins; and consequently promote our amendment for the time to come; that it should be the effect of our repentance, and therefore the cause of our conversion.

To justify this passion from any imputation of guilt, nothing more needs to be said. Nothing can be said more to the purpose, than what hath been already intimated: that our blessed Saviour, who was free from all sin, having assumed our nature, was acquainted with grief; and bearing our iniquities, was emphatically a man of sorrows.

Be it therefore supposed, that grief is allowable, if kept within its due bounds: and let us now proceed to shew, what those bounds are.

Now, in order to set the proper boundaries to this passion, which is so apt to exceed; to shew how far a man may be grieved, and yet possess his soul in patience; it is necessary to take notice, that the cause of our grief ought to be warrantable, and that our grief ought to be proportionate to that cause.

Now the warrantable occasion of grief is the loss of some good which we have reason to be pleased with; or the accession of some evil, which we are with good reason averse to.

Amongst those things, therefore, the loss of which may innocently be deplored by us, and justly affect us with grief, we may reckon the goods of fortune, so far at least as this loss deprives us of the power of doing good; or of the necessities or comforts of life; or as it may expose us to the temptation of retrieving them by unlawful means; or of repairing our fortunes at the hazard and expence of our precious souls.

We may also be innocently grieved; we cannot, perhaps with innocence, but be grieved at the loss of friends, as they were linked to us by the ties of nature and blood; and much more, as they were by their society, their counsels, and their examples, instrumental to our virtue and to our happiness; as they were agreeable companions, who made our passage through this troublesome world more easy and delightful to us; and as they were useful guides, who pointed out to us the way, and led us, as it were, by the hand, to those paths that might bring us to everlasting life.

But, above all, national calamities, and those particularly which endanger our religion, ought, in a more especial manner, to affect us with grief. Thus, good old Eli heard the sad news of the death of his sons, and of the defeat of the Israelites, though not without grief, yet without sinking under the weight of it. but when he was told that the ark of God was taken, he fell down backwards, and his neck brake, and he died.

To shew what ought to be the precise measure of our grief, in proportion to those several evils which afflict us, would be endless. It may suffice to lay down this general rule, that no concern should ever be so violent upon any occasion, how just and how great soever, as to take away the use, or hinder the free operations of our reason.

We ought not, therefore, under our afflictions, to suffer ourselves to be transported; to refuse comfort; to be industrious to improve our sorrow, and to treasure up heaviness to our souls; to dwell upon our affliction, and, by a strange unaccountable indulgence of our grief, to pass from one fond uneasy thought to another, till, by a great deal of misplaced diligence, we work ourselves up to an unmanly softness, to an unwarrantable dejection of mind, to a total oppression of spirits.

We ought, on the contrary, to oppose and resist this passion in its first rise; and to bear up against it when we find it growing upon us; to be deaf to its demands of our attention; and to quit the subject that begins to be uneasy, before it comes to be intolerable. So that our sorrow, though it move us, shall not wholly possess us; though it affect us, shall not overwhelm us; though heaviness may endure for a night, but joy, that joy which arises from the comfort of having set the grievous matter right in our own minds, shall come in the morning.

But we shall not discharge this duty of Christian fortitude as we ought, nor possess our souls in patience, to the degree required by our great Master, barely by keeping the mastery over our passion of grief, and by the use of our reason so far, as that the anguish of present afflictions doth not transport us; unless we do moreover so fortify our minds against distant evils, that the prospect of future calamities may not make us swerve from our duty.

For the effect of immoderate grief under afflictions, doth not only shew itself in depriving us of the succours of reason, whilst we are under the pressure of a calamity which at present lies heavy upon us; but also in tempting us to despair and distrust; to unsteadiness and wavering in the faith; to the desertion of that truth, and to the neglect of that duty, which expose us to those evils so unwelcome to human nature.

Now the virtue which alone can prevent these evil effects of our immoderate grief, founded in the terrible apprehension of distant evils, or, in other words, of our weakness and pusillanimity, is that fortitude which we are now recommending; whereby we resolve well, and are steady to our resolutions; whereby we resist the soft insinuations of sense from within, and the subtle contrivances of a deceitful wicked world from without; by which we are so supported, as that neither the frowns of adverse fortune shall be able to terrify us, nor the threats of insulting power force us into a compliance with any thing which we know to be sinful; nor any prospect of danger make us desert that truth, which we acknowledge ourselves bound to maintain.

In the strength of this Christian grace, though the waves of persecution do on all sides beat upon us, we shall stand like a rock, unmoved and unshaken.

It was from this noble principle, that St. Paul was enabled to make that brave challenge and declaration, which we read in his epistle to the Romans. Who shall separate us from the love of Christ? Shall tribulation, or distress, or persecution, or famine, or nakedness, or peril, or sword? Nay, in all these things we are more than conquerors, through him that loved us. For I am persuaded, that neither death, nor life, nor angels, nor principalities, nor powers, nor things present, nor things to come; nor height, nor depth, nor any other creature, shall be able to separate us from the love of God, which is in Christ Jesus our Lord.

Having thus far endeavoured to shew, wherein patience or moderation of grief consists with respect to ourselves, I shall proceed, in the Second place, to shew more briefly, what it is in relation to our neighbours, or how we ought to bear the injuries we receive from men; in which sense patience is the same with Christian meekness.

Now it is the proper work of patience, in this view of it, to possess our minds with these considerations: That our sins *deserve greater severities, than any which God suffers evil men to inflict upon us. That if God thinks fit, he can, and will do right to his servants who are oppressed; but that we are not always commissioned to do this right to ourselves. That therefore we are obliged to take care, that the passion of grief, under the injuries

we receive, doth not transport us to any unlawful act, or forbidden desire of revenge. That we are not at liberty so much as to curse the Chaldeans and Sabeans, though they fall upon our oxen and our asses, though they destroy our children and our servants: because the same God who thinks fit to bring upon us such afflictions, doth also think fit to make use of such instruments to execute his wise, and holy, and righteous purposes. That we are neither proper interpreters of the injuries we receive, nor proper judges of the returns which are to be made to them. That we are too partial to estimate the measures of each with that equity and justice we ought. That we are apt to use a double weight and a double measure, in trying the greatness of those evils which others do to us, and which we do to others. And that vengeance being what we know not how to use aright, we must leave it to him to whom it belongs; and who knows how to dispense it, with the exactest weight and measure. And, lastly, that we are, by the precepts of evangelical meekness, enjoined not only to be slow to anger; not only to be upon our guard that we be not too far transported by it, but even to pray for them who despitely use us: to bless them that curse us; to do good to them that hate us; and to be so far from being overcome of evil, as to be conquerors in this conflict with wicked and unreasonable men, and to overcome evil with good.

Thus our blessed Saviour, when he had endured all the insolence and derision, all the indignities and affronts, all the outrages and scorn that could possibly be offered to the very worst of men; and was led to suffer a death in its own nature the most painful; in its duration the most lingering; in the opinion of men the most ignominious; in the estimate of the divine law the most accursed; in the midst of his agonies, whilst the sense of them was the most pungent, acute, and afflictive, cried out, Father forgive them; for they know not what they do.

And thus, in imitation of him, that holy martyr, who first trod in those bloody steps, which this Leader and Captain of our Salvation had just before marked out for his followers to trace, when he was stoned, knelt down and (to shew his earnestness,) cried with a loud voice, Lord, lay not this sin to their charge.

And what the church has made the subject of our prayers, ought also to be the object of our endeavours; that, in all our sufferings here upon earth, for the sake of a good conscience (upon which account only we can suffer from the hands of men, if we suffer as Christians), we may learn by these examples to bless our persecutors, considering, that if when we do well, and suffer for it, we take it patiently; this is acceptable with God. For even heretofore were we called: because Christ also suffered for us, leaving us an example that we should follow his steps: who did no sin, neither was guile found in his mouth: who, when he was reviled, reviled not again, when he suffered, he threatened not; but committed himself to him that judgeth righteously.

I shall now proceed, in

The third and last place, to shew what patience or moderation of grief is, when considered with relation to God; or how we ought to demean ourselves towards him, under those afflictions which he is pleased to visit us with; which is the duty of patience taken in the same sense with submission to God's will, or resignation.

And here the criminal effects of immoderate grief occasioned by afflictions, are a proud and irreverent behaviour under the hand of the Almighty; impious and unworthy thoughts of his glorious Majesty; daring and contemptuous reflections upon his wisdom and providence. For though nature will be very apt to plead for the reasonableness of a more than ordinary concern under more than ordinary pressures; yet according to the example of our blessed Saviour, even whilst we tremble at the prospect of what we are going to endure; whilst we ardently desire the removal of the bitter cup, we are with him also to pray, that the will of our Father, not our own will, be done.

We are to look forward, and to wait for the inheritance of the promises; and taking an impartial view of heavenly and earthly things, are to shew, by a cheerful resignation, that our expectations are not confined to the narrow compass of this world. We are to consider our afflictions not only in themselves, in which regard they may appear frightful and insufferable, but also in their consequences, which may make them appear not only tolerable, but even desirable.

We are to recollect what we have learnt from the word of God, that though no chastening for the present seemeth to be joyous, but grievous; nevertheless, afterward it yieldeth the peaceable fruit of righteousness, unto them which are exercised thereby.

We are to weigh our present sufferings, and our future hopes, in the balance of the sanctuary; and examining them by this true standard, we shall find, that the lightness of the one bears no proportion at all to the weight of the other. For our light affliction, which is but for a moment, worketh for us a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory; while we look not at the things which are seen or felt, but at the things which are not seen: for the things which are seen, and the pains which are felt, are temporal; but the things which are not seen, and the pleasures which are not yet felt, but which shall hereafter be enjoyed by all those who submit themselves with patience to the chastisements of God, are eternal.

There is no sin more unworthy of a man, or more unbecoming of a Christian, more contrary to the plain dictates of natural reason, or to the whole tenor and design of supernatural revelation, than murmuring and repining at the dispensations of Providence: and yet this is a vice, not peculiar to the profligate and profane, who blasphemously set their mouth against the heavens; and whose tongue walketh through the earth; but is, in some measure, to be found also in men of a better character, who have some awe of God, and some sense of religion upon their minds.

The holy Psalmist, that sweet melodious singer of Israel, was not wholly exempt from this great sin. He himself tells us, that his feet were almost gone; that his steps had well nigh slipped. For he was envious at the foolish, when he saw the prosperity of the wicked; in-somuch, that he began to repent of his own integrity, and to say, that he had cleansed his heart in ruin, and washed his hands in innocency.

Whilst the smart of present sufferings is keen and afflictive, men are apt to complain that their grief is not thoroughly weighed, or their calamities laid in the balances together. Nay, they have sometimes the confidence to plead their cause with God, and to contend and strive with their Maker, crying out, O that we knew where we might find him! That we might come even to his seat! We would order our cause before him, and fill our mouths with arguments. We would know the words which he would answer us, and understand what he would say unto us.

Vain mortals! Do they hope to strive against him, who giveth not account of any of his matters? Who hath enjoined him his way? Or who can say unto him, what dost thou? Who art thou, O man, that repliest against God? Shall the thing formed say unto him that formed it, why hast thou made me, or why hast thou used me, thus? Hath not the potter power over the clay, of the same lump to make one vessel unto honour, and another unto dishonour? Let the potsherd strive with the potsherd of the earthen; but wo unto him that striveth with his Maker. Is he a man as thou art, that thou shouldst answer him, and come together or contend with him in judgment? Hast thou an arm like God? Canst thou thunder with a voice like him? Shall mortal man be more just than God? Shall a man be more pure than his Maker? Is it fit to say to a king, thou art wicked? And to princes, ye are ungodly? How much less to him, that accepteth not the person of princes, nor regardeth the rich more than the poor?

Is it not much more fit to humble ourselves under the sense of God's displeasure; to acknowledge the justice and the mercy of his chastisements; to resign ourselves with reverence and submission to the unerring providence of God; and to say, even when his hand lies heaviest upon us, Righteous art thou, O Lord, and true are thy judgments!

Thus have I attempted to shew, wherein the duty of patience consists; what its proper work is; how our conduct is to be regulated by it, with respect to ourselves, to our brethren, and to our God.

I should now proceed in the second place to consider, what motives there are to induce us to the exercise of this virtue; and then go on to lay down some rules for the attainment of it; but having not time to dispatch these heads, I shall not now enter upon them, but defer them to another opportunity.

SERMON LXXXIV.

By Doctor NEWTON.

On Patience.

LUKE, XXI. 19.

In your patience possess ye your souls

In speaking to these words of our blessed Saviour, (who by his example as well as by his doctrine was the best teacher of patience which the world ever beheld), I proposed to shew,

First, What patience is, and wherein it consists.

Secondly, What motives there are that may induce us to the practice of this duty.

Thirdly, What those rules and methods are by which this virtue, this art of patience, if I may so call it, may be most effectually acquired.

What patience is, wherein it consists, what are the effects of it, how our conduct and demeanour are to be regulated by it, in relation to ourselves, to our brethren, and to our God; with what constancy and steadiness of mind we ought to bear those calamities which we cannot avoid; with what meekness we ought to suffer those injuries wherewith we are loaded by men; with what cheerful resignation of mind we ought to submit ourselves to the chastisements of God, punishing us no more than we deserve, or much less than we deserve, for our sins; I have already shewn. I proceed now, in the

into the deep and mysterious counsels of God, not to discover the ends and purposes which our all-wise Creator has in afflicting us, we do not know but they may be for our good; nay, that from the manifestation of his designs, which he in his word has made unto us) we have good reasons to be persuaded that they are always by him intended for, and, by a careful management on our parts, may always be subservient to our good.

There is no man that is born into the world, but is born to suffer more or less, and the sufferings of some men do so much overbalance their enjoyments, that if their hopes were confined to this world, it were better for them not to have been born; but since our expectations reach farther into another world, it is not only our advantage to have been born, but also to suffer; and that.

First, as afflictions are a trial of our faith, whereby we may discover, whether we are indeed most firmly persuaded of those truths, which with our lips we constantly profess to believe.

For he, who steadfastly believes another life after this, and is undoubtedly assured of future happiness upon the performance of his duty, will have his mind so taken up with that comfortable and joyful prospect, that he will leave but little room for those crosses he meets with here, to make any deep or lasting impression upon him. He that believes there is a reward reserved for the righteous; a bliss more exquisite, more durable, more complete, than any good upon earth; which cannot be taken away, cannot be interrupted, cannot be so much as intermitted; which, contrary to all earthly pleasures, shall be greater in enjoyment or possession than it was in expectation; and which shall always go on to please, and shall satisfy without satiating; must have but a mean notion of, and consequently must be but little affected with, all worldly enjoyments. The possession of these will not elate his spirits, nor the loss thereof sink them immoderately. That good, in which he finds so many excellent qualities, which are not to be found in any thing which this world affords, will much cheapen the value of these earthly blessings; and whilst he is secure of that inestimable reversion, all present evils will appear tolerable to him.

This one single thought is the surest refuge for an afflicted soul to fly unto; and one would think there should be nothing but the doubt of this could make it continue to be afflicted. It is but reflecting upon our future hopes to give us present ease; that what we suffer is but transient; that what we shall be rewarded with will be eternal; for certainly we can never repine at the scanty proportion of pleasure which is measured out to us here, whilst we remember and think of that place, where there is fullness of joy.

But because the prospect of a future life can be comfortable to those only who do not doubt of their being happy in it; and because none can have a rational and well-grounded assurance of their being happy in another world, but those who have led a virtuous and godly life here; it will make us more sensible of the benefit of afflictions to reflect upon,

A second advantage arising from them, as they do highly promote our virtue.

For a course of life altogether easy and uninterrupted by any misfortunes, is apt to betray us into a dangerous security. To be free from the indispositions of body which others undergo; to be exempt from the losses which our neighbour sustains; not to meet with any of those disappointments which all who are about us meet with; is apt to make us too inconsiderate of the future, and too much taken up with the present; too proud, and too careless; too far presuming upon our own strength, and too little sensible of our dependance. Whereas some seasonable afflictions would put us in mind of our mortality, and should the Almighty stretch out his hand against us, we should quickly know ourselves to be but men.

In this case therefore we are not to look upon the afflictions which God Almighty is pleased to visit us withal, as the result of his wrath, but as the effect of his mercy, and consequently we ought to be so far from repining at them, that we should unfeignedly thank him, that he hath been pleased of his gracious good ness to choose this way of making a sensible impression upon the stubbornness of our hearts, thereby to bring us more effectually to repentance.

A third motive to patience under afflictions, is, that we cannot avoid the calamities which God Almighty is pleased to bring upon us; they are the secret and irresistible determinations of his will; and as we have not wisdom enough to foresee, or to prevent, what is like to befall us; so neither have we power sufficient to remove, or shake off, what we find sits uneasy upon us. It is most advisable therefore to rest satisfied with our condition, however deplorable it may appear, not only because it pleased our Maker to bring us into it, not only because it may probably tend to our advantage, but because we cannot help ourselves.

For whatever we enjoy in this world, however pleasant and useful to us, being not properly our own, because neither is it of our own procuring, or in our own power to dispose of; and the truth of this being verified, by all that ever befall the sons and daughters of affliction; we cannot but be convinced of the extreme folly of impatience, since we must needs know, that the Lord is king, he the earth never so unquiet; that our vain, fruitless, impotent strugglings may provoke that almighty power which we are sure never to subdue; that the yoke will not sit more easy upon our necks, by our ineffectual endeavours to shake it off; but that the more fretful we are, the more we shall be galled, and shall increase our burden by not bearing patiently, that which in itself, and with the strength which God would be ready, if asked, to endure us with, would be supportable to us.

In the fourth and last place, it will be another proper inducement to patience, for us to consider, that the afflictions which are brought upon us are just, and what our frequent provocations of the Almighty do highly deserve.

He who reflects how oft he has been guilty of those sins which God detests, and has peremptorily forbidden; how oft he has neglected those duties which God delights in, and has with great earnestness enjoined: he who looks back upon his wilful deliberate commission of the one, and his frequent supine neglect of the other: he who considers how easily he has complied with the least temptations to be wicked, and how obstinately he has resisted the most powerful motions of the spirit of grace disposing him to holiness and virtue: he who compares his numberless bad actions with his few good ones, and finds, upon the comparison, such aggravations in those as render them highly deserving of punishment, and such abatements in these that they rather want to be excused, than merit to be rewarded: he who makes these reflections, which are very obvious and proper to be made, will not only be satisfied, that God is righteous in the judgments he inflicts upon him; but will also acknowledge, that his offences both in their number and in their nature do mightily exceed his afflictions.

And if he carries this consideration a little farther, and calls to mind, how formal and partial his confessions of his sins have been; how insincere his repentance; how unsteady his resolutions of amendment; how weak his endeavours towards a better life; how frequent and scandalous his relapses to his former vicious courses; he will not complain when he is gently afflicted, but will admire that he is not utterly destroyed. Why then should a living man complain? A man for the punishment of his sins!

Having thus far considered the most important motives to induce us to be patient under afflictions; I shall proceed to lay down some rules as proper to be observed, in order to the attainment of patience.

The first is, to expect that afflictions will some time or other befall us. We know our state and condition in this world. What we place any part of our happiness in here, is of very uncertain continuance to us. Fortune cannot raise us so high, but envy and malice reach us. Riches, which men so eagerly pursue, make themselves wings and fly away. Health, and vigour, and beauty, if for a season they escape the evil accidents that await them, must suffer a natural decay. Friends are not always faithful, nor children always obedient; and the most faithful and obedient are mortal.

If then in the midst of our prosperity we would entertain these thoughts, and, as it were, anticipate what we conceive would be grievous to us, and make it familiar to our imaginations (not to destroy the sense of providential blessings, but only to regulate our affections about them): the sharpness of every calamity would be so far at least abated, that we should not be surpris'd into any unmanly or unchristian behaviour under it. Reason and religion would seasonably step in to our assistance, and moderate that grief which human infirmity makes us liable to.

But if (we will not thus fortify ourselves against all these evil impressions, we shall be every moment unhappy. And if) instead of this we will go on to fill our hearts with mirth and to prove them with joy; carelessly to rely upon the present without any thoughts of the future; and value what we possess or hope for, not only above its proper value, but above those things that are inestimable; we must not think that the force of any arguments, or the application of any well-chosen moral reflections, or any apposite references to the highest authority that can be named, even to the oracles of God, will be able to restrain and govern that passion which a disappointment in any of these things will excite in us. Though perhaps when the case was not our own, we could, with our aunts, have upholden him that was falling, and have strengthened the feeble knees. But now it is come upon us, and as for it: it touches us, we are troubled.

The mind must therefore be prepared before it be oppressed, and expect an evil day in order to weaken its violence. For no passion when worked up to an excessive height will condescend to either what reason or what religion have to offer. And time only then must work that cure which reason and religion should have done: when a man cannot so properly be said to have exercised his patience as to have forgot the affliction.

As it will very much contribute to our patience, to expect our portion of the evil things of this life before they happen, so will it,

Secondly, to consider of what nature those evil things are which do happen.

As Providence doth frequently for wise and good reasons afflict us, so may we sometimes for no reason at all afflict ourselves. Many accidents befall us which have not that malignity in them which they appear to have. Many that have at first view the appearance of evil, upon further examination are found to be useful to us. And men, through a wrong apprehension, have often been impatient at an event, that hath proved to be the most prosperous that could happen to them.

It will, therefore, become every man, that would keep his temper even and undisturbed, to consider the nature of what he apprehends to be a calamity, and the circumstances with which it is attended, before he suffers himself to be transported by it; and see in what respect, and in what degree, it is really hurtful to him; as also whether, if in some respects it be hurtful, it may not in others be beneficial, and then also, whether the hurt or the service it is like to do us be the greater. He that is fallen from a high station, may yet be less perplexed and more secure. He who is deprived of the means of charity and beneficence, is sure that God will accept of his will to have performed those duties if he had been able. What value we may seem to lose on account of any blemishes or defects that debase the outward form, we may restore and supply to ourselves by the exercise of those virtues which adorn the mind. And the less we set those objects of our love who are most dear to us, as of this use, to excite us to the imitation of their excellent qualities for which we love them, so to recover to us the thoughts of leaving this world without reluctance, so to be with them, while it whom we can no longer be easy or happy.

The circumstances also of the calamity that befal us must be considered by us. Is the loss we sustain retriev'd? Is it not? If it be not, if we shall never be able to compass our fond wishes, but shall hurt ourselves; why art thou so heavy, O my soul, and why art thou so disquieted within me? If it be, it is surely more likely to be so by the exercise of that reason, and judgment, and foresight, and industry, and dexterity, which the cool and calm alone can fixly use, than by that transport, that violence of passion which makes all these faculties useless to us, and so prevents the remedy we seek.

Again, is what we suffer a common, or an uncommon affliction? If the former, let us consider what a multitude of companions we have in our misfortunes; as also how little affected we were used to be with the calamities we now bewail, when it was the lot of others to endure them. If the latter, let us turn our eyes towards those whose wisdom and courage we have admired, and see with what firmness, and constancy, and pious resignation, they have endured as great or greater evils than we suffer, and from thence acknowledge, that it is as much below the dignity of human nature to sink under its afflictions, as it is necessary to its condition to feel them.

Again, many of our afflictions are brought upon us by our enemies, and many we create to ourselves. If we too much regret the calamities which are brought upon us by our enemies, we only make ourselves unhappy to assist them in their designs upon us, and to second that malice at which we repine. If we complain of the sorrows we create to ourselves, we are at once imprudent and unjust. And it would much better become us to make our former miscarriages the ground of our future discretion, and to regulate our unruly and corrupt affections, the true cause of our distress, than lament our distress, the known and confessed effect of them. Let us but regulate our desires, our self-love, our pride, and our envy, and all conditions will be easier to us.

For we do not perceive that in proportion to our desire of obtaining things innocent and warrantable, will be our uneasiness if we do not obtain them; and that if we overvalue what we possess, we shall be tormented with the fear of losing it, and with inconsolableness at the loss of it? And that in things criminal and immoral, the loss of estate, of health, of reputation, of virtue, attend our eager pursuits? And that in things innocent, our desires must be moderated, and in things criminal subdued, unless we will be every moment unhappy?

Do we not perceive that the immoderate love of ourselves is apt to represent our calamities greater than they are, and that from hence, either to move compassion or excuse impatience, we appeal to mankind for their consent and allowance that we suffer equally with others, is still greater when we, than when they suffer it? Behold and see, if there be any sorrow like unto my sorrow.

And again, is it not evident that our pride represents the afflictions that befall us as altogether undeserved? We first arrogate more merit to ourselves than we really have, and then are surprised and ruffled at every event that seems to derogate from it. From hence any misrepresentation of our character, or opposition to our measures, or disappointment in our aims, becomes insupportable to us. Want of deference to our judgments, or of submission to our power; contempt of our person, or neglect of our virtues, makes us peevish and fretful, weary of ourselves, and tasteless of every thing that should be agreeable to us in others.

And, lastly, do we not see how envy compares our own condition with that of our neighbours to our great disadvantage: how another's supposed prosperity afflicts us: how his health compared with our infirmities, his affluence with our poverty, his honour with our disgrace, makes us impatient in that state, which of itself is not intolerable? How reasonable this is will soon appear, if we consider that there are many whom we esteem extremely happy, and who seem not to come into misfortune like other men; who have yet many secret pressures, and perhaps greater than what we endure, which, however hid from us are sharply felt by themselves. So that sometimes we envy those whom we should pity, and because they have not a dark, gloomy, severe, dejected countenance, are apt to think that all is well, and that there is peace in that breast, when perhaps there is no peace.

But, thirdly, another method of becoming patient under afflictions is a virtuous and religious life.

Neither philosophy nor religion can raise our minds above the sense of pain or grief; and it is not of credit or service to either, to attribute that to them which they do not effect; for it makes men rather doubt of their efficacy, even where they certainly operate very powerfully. Though, therefore, a life of holiness and virtue will not make us insensible of our afflictions, yet the consideration of having led such a life, will be so full of comfort, as in a great measure to lessen the weight and pressure of them. And we cannot be furnished with better materials to balance the crosses we shall meet with here, than the grateful reflections we shall have, upon the conquests we have gained over the sundry temptations that have assaulted us, and upon the many good deeds we have done.

Prudent economists lay up some portion of their worldly substance to support themselves under those evil accidents, which in common life may happen to them; and religious wisdom will prompt us to become rich in good works, that out of such valuable and delightful treasure, we may relieve our afflicted minds in time of need.

To have supported the weak, to have helped the friendless, to have rescued the oppressed, to have instructed the ignorant, to have converted a sinner, to have been any ways instrumental to the happiness and virtue of any of our fellow-Christians, will be so many cordials to our drooping spirits in the day of our adversity; and will alleviate at least what they cannot perfectly cure.

Whereas if the mind is not at ease, every thing else will be uneasy to us. If we are not pleased with ourselves, we shall be dissatisfied with our condition. When a man shall fly for refuge to his own breast, and on seeing all his life past faithfully represented to him, can find no comfort there, all other comforts will be but fallacious and deceitful. The comforter that should receive his soul is far from him. His conscience is another affliction to him, and that the sorest. A wounded spirit who can bear?

The last method I shall mention of arriving at such a measure of patience under afflictions, as shall be accepted with God, is to supplicate him who only can give it, to endue us with it.

He who orders them, and that for our good, best knows when they shall have answered that end, and when it is proper we should be released from them. When therefore there shall be given us any of these thorns in the flesh, any of these messengers of Satan to buffet us, lest we should be exalted above measure, let us earnestly beseech him that they may depart from us, or at least that his grace may be sufficient for us, that if the embittered cup may not pass away from us except we drink it, his will may be done; that he would sanctify our afflictions to us, and make them produce that sincere repentance, those effectual resolutions of amendment, that exemplary constancy, and that just acknowledgment of his love towards us in thus dealing with us as sons, which he intended by them. Let us humbly intreat him, that the pains we feel may not any way move us to offend him, by murmuring at these his severe dispensations, or by despairing of his goodness in the return of the light of his countenance upon us.

And whilst we acknowledge our sufferings to be a just recompense of our evil deeds; let us beg of him to look upon them as a recompense with which he will be satisfied, that we may, through the mercy and merits of our Saviour, be exempt from any future punishment for them.

Lastly, let us particularly, and most earnestly beg of God, that in that extreme and difficult conflict which we must all one time have with the last enemy that shall be destroyed, when the snare of death shall compass us round about, and the pains of hell get hold upon us, he would so strengthen us in the inward man by the power of his might, as to make us more than conquerors through him that loveth us: that our souls being escaped, as a bird out of the snare of the fowler, may take their flight towards the blissful mansions above, and there mixing with that heavenly choir, may joyfully sing this rapturous and triumphant song, The snare is broken, and we are delivered.

SERMON LXXXVI.

On Integrity.

By DOCTOR NEWTON.

PROV. X. 9. Former part.

He that walketh uprightly, walketh surely.

SELF-preservation is a principle universally implanted in human nature, and inseparably united to it. Our own safety and security, our own peace and prosperity, are what ingrosses all our attention. And without doubt, our all-wise and merciful Creator hath induced us with this solicitude and concern for ourselves and our welfare, on purpose that we should avoid what would hurt us, and pursue what would make us happy. Security from evil, therefore, is what we universally do, and must of necessity desire. But though the desire of security be an excellent first step towards the attainment of it, yet is there no small difficulty in being able to discern where safety is to be found, that we may fly unto it; and where it is that danger lies, that we may timely retire from it. Things do many times appear very different from what in fact they are; and a good deal of caution and circumspection are required that we be not mistaken in the notions we form of them. Sufficient cause there is to doubt, whether that be always to be pursued that invites; and to consider, whether that which is likely to affect us with pleasure this moment will not probably be attended with pain hereafter; and whether momentary satisfaction be not too light to be laid in the balance with lasting uneasiness. And here, I think, we ought with great thankfulness to acknowledge the goodness of God towards us, in that he hath not only implanted in the nature of man such a principle as must of necessity make him desire his own security and happiness, but hath moreover bestowed upon him the light of reason to discern wherein they consist, the power to distinguish between what is fit to be declined as hurtful, or embraced as beneficial to him, to the end that he might not err in his choice when good and evil should be set before him.

But still, though man be endued with this excellent prerogative above all other creatures, that he can deliberate upon, compare and judge of what passes before him, view it in itself and in its consequences, and prefer one thing to another; yet it must be confessed he is also made subject to very strong passions, which either so cloud and obscure this noble light, that he cannot always clearly discern which of the two things he hath compared is fittest to be chosen by him, or which so overpower his will as to push him on to the choice of that which in his judgment he condemns, so that the bare reasonableness of doing or forbearing to do, is not always sufficient to determine him absolutely either one way or other.

Allowing this to be true, as indeed it is, and that what we would we often do not, and what we would not that we perversely do, there immediately appears the necessity of some standing rule of our actions for us to walk by, that if at any time the reason of things should seem to alter, according as frail men biassed by their passions might be disposed to think they did, they might have recourse to this steady, unvariable, positive rule, compare them with it, and by it conduct themselves safely in their moral ways. And therefore God Almighty, as a further instance of his beneficence to man, lest his passions, to which for wise purposes he is made liable, should either hinder him from consulting his reason or from obeying the dictates of it, hath moreover given him a positive rule to walk by, a written law for his guide. And that a due regard might be paid to this law, he hath annexed eternal rewards and punishments to the observance or neglect of it.

And again, lest what is future and at a distance should not so effectually work upon his hopes and fears, as what is nearer at hand and just before him, God hath also commissioned the civil magistrate to make other laws in aid of his own, and intrusted him with the power of the sword, to the end that such men, as have not the fear of God before their eyes, might be restrained from hurting themselves, and from obstructing their own happiness, by the fear of temporal punishment immediately to be inflicted on them.

And again, lest ignorant or perverse men, left to themselves, should misunderstand or pretend to misunderstand these laws, whether divine or human; and when they did not find it convenient to walk uprightly in conformity to them, should bend them to favour their own iniquity, and wrest them to their destruction; God hath appointed certain interpreters thereof, fallible men indeed, but in a particular manner bred to the knowledge of these laws, and under as strict obligations to explain them faithfully, as others are to obey them sincerely.

Behold the care which God hath taken of man! He hath implanted in him a desire of happiness, that he might endeavour after it. He hath endowed him with an acute discernment, that he might know whether what he desired was worthy his pursuit. He hath fenced him about with laws for his security, that he might not forfeit the blessings intended him, by making excursions from these bounds, to follow his own vagrant imaginations. He hath also annexed both temporal and eternal sanction to the violation or observance of these laws; that if by some passions he should be inclined to deviate from the paths of piety and virtue, he might by others be recalled into the right way, and that walking uprightly therein, according to the best knowledge he hath or can get, he might also walk securely.

Uprightness then is a conformity to these laws divine and human.

When I say, that uprightness is a conformity to human laws, I would be understood to mean such human laws as are reasonable, equitable, not against the law of nature, or the law of God. This sure is not unnecessarily premised: since unreasonable laws there have been, and I suppose, still are in all countries, to which men may be tempted to conform for fear of punishment; at the same time that they may think themselves obliged not to conform in point of conscience. Against such as these the prophet Isaias crieth out, Wo unto them that call evil good, and good evil. And again, Wo unto them that decree unrighteous decrees. And Tully hath occasionally thought it proper to say, that nothing can be more foolish than to think that every thing is just that is contained in human institutes; since these are often obtained by force or fraud, to effectuate the private schemes of men in power, without any regard to public utility. How many of our own statutes have been mended, which shewed they were imperfect, and how many repealed, which supposes they were inconvenient? and it would be to flatter the Legislature to say, there were none that are bad still remaining unrepealed. I do not then mean that uprightness consists in a conformity to such human laws as these, but in a conformity to such as are reasonable, equitable, not against the law of nature, or the law of God; and even to such as of which we do not see the reason, if therein we see no unreasonableness, iniquity or contrariety to the law of nature or law of God.

Uprightness, then, is a conformity to the divine and human laws; and I shall endeavour to shew that in this moral and legal rectitude consists our security,

1. From shame.
2. From remorse of conscience.
3. From punishment temporal and eternal.

First, In the observance of the laws of God and of our country, consists our security from shame. Men naturally desire to be thought well of in general; and therefore particular persons, whom we so love or revere, that we would not forfeit their good opinion of us for any thing this world contains; and others, perhaps, so ill affected to us, that we should be loath to give them occasion to triumph over our weakness; or the pleasure to rejoice at our disgrace.

Reputation is as dear to some men as their lives. Some have not been able to outlive the loss of it. Others have thought no hazards, no labours, no austerities, too great to retrieve it. That men put a very great value upon it, there needs no other proof, than that whoever goes about to lessen it, must do it at his peril. A hurt of this kind will not fail to raise some resentment in the breast of every sufferer. If unmerited, those who have little restraint upon them from any religious considerations, will be sure, as they see occasion, to retaliate the wrong hath been done them: and if denied, the instrument of so painful a sensation will have derived upon himself an enmity to his person, and a vigilance to find him faulty; and perhaps a misrepresentation of him, if innocent. And indeed a good character is of that importance, that not to value it very highly, is to be profligate. And those who pretend not to care what others say of them, are mistaken, if they are serious men. For it is the power of doing good, and of inestimable price. The hopes of it incite to what is laudable, and the attainment of it makes us careful to preserve it, and studious to improve it.

Now shame is the sense of a loss of reputation, of our having done something which we should not have done, and for having done which, men will have a bad opinion of us. And what surer course can we take to avoid this uneasiness of the mind, than by being strict observers of the laws of God and of our country?

With regard to the laws of God, to moral laws, there is a dignity and gracefulness in virtue. To be superior to a temptation, is greatness, as well as goodness. To subdue inordinate affections, and to bring into captivity every irregular thought to the obedience of the law of God, is a victory that shews moral conduct and courage, and ought to be matter of greater triumph, than to conquer armies. In vice there is a meanness, a reproach to our reason, a reflection upon our discretion, an impeachment of that patience, and fortitude, and steady resolution, by which great and good men abstain from whatever is misbecoming or unworthy of them, or will be shameful to them. That vicious men do themselves think vice to be shameful, is evident, in that they choose to practise it secretly; and if they are discovered, yet, to avoid as much of shame as they can, find it necessary to extenuate their faults; and sometimes to prevent discovery, and the shame consequent upon it, are guilty of the greatest crimes that can be committed; and through impatience of other's consciousness of their folly, are sometimes tempted to wish the witnesses of it out of the world, even though there be no apprehension they will divulge it. They are in pain in the company of sober men, having a misgiving of heart that others know what they know amiss of themselves; the true reason of seeking a refuge, and finding a pleasure, in the conversation of those, of whom they know as much ill as they know of themselves. Mutual guilt fears no imputation, it not only doth not accuse, but excuses, and even justifies by such sort of reasonings, as to the parties concerned appear plausible, and of which it is their interest and their comfort not to see the error. Why should one have a great deal, and another nothing, is to them a sufficient argument for the invading the property of any man; forgetting that their own idleness, and lewdness, and intemperance, are the cause that they have no property of their own, or that others are backward to give them what they foresee will not better their condition. There are men, it is said, who boast themselves of their wickedness, and, in their own representation of their immoral achievements, make themselves a great deal worse than they are, from whence it should seem as if they thought not infamy, but reputation belonged to their evil deeds. But in this there may be a mistake. The praise they solicit is not to the evil deed, but to the dexterity and address, to the activity and dispatch, to the intrepidity and presence of mind, with which it is committed. For all these qualities, when applied to laudable purposes, are really laudable. But no man sure can think that wickedness is an honour to him. The utmost that can be said is, that modesty, by degrees, may be impaired. That from an impatience of reproach, they may resolve not to be affected with it. And, after having done violence to themselves in suppressing the sense and feeling of it, may appear as unconcerned for their immoral behaviour as if they were innocent. This, however, hinders not, but that there will for ever be a great deal of difference between the impudence of a prostitute, and the confidence of a clear conscience.

Let us see, in the next place, whether the violation of human laws, reasonable and equitable, be not also matter of shame to every serious man who wishes the peace of societies, or makes a conscience of his duty to God.

That the law-makers do themselves often break the laws; that there is a general remissness in the execution of them; that some in power like it better that men should rather be obnoxious to the laws than punished by them; that numbers are equally guilty of the same violations; and that some will argue, what is not evil in itself may be innocently done, though forbidden by human laws, the penalty being submitted to upon discovery; are considerations that may lessen the terror of breaking human laws, but not the shame, or at least not the shamefulness.

But, besides that the laws of men are to be obeyed for the sake of God, is there no shame in breaking that law which one hath first agreed and consented should be made a law? Is it not better for one's country that its laws should be strictly observed, than that they should not? And is there no shame in having so little regard to the welfare of one's country, as to break the laws of it one's self, and to shew others the way to do so too? On the other hand, is there no dignity in doing that which is right, if, for no other reason but for this, because it is right? Is there no greater dignity in doing that which is right, the fewer there be that do it? Is there not still greater dignity in doing that which is right, the more one may do that which is wrong with impunity? Besides, is there no shame in being discovered? Doth not that term suppose one is found doing what one should not do? Doth it not also suppose one is doing it in a covert way, and in a clandestine manner? And is it worthy a man of honour and virtue to do any thing which he is afraid should be known; that he should blush to be surprised in, that he should be troubled to hear of? If it be not right, why does he attempt it? If it be right, why is he afraid to appear in it? Does not the being surprised in a thing one should not do, confound a man that hath any modesty? Does he know which way to look or what to say?

There are some, indeed, who, sensible enough of shame, in departing from certain frivolous rules of honour of their own making, live in the utter contempt of the laws of God and man shameless: and not only so, but arrogate also a sort of reputation to their immoral and unlawful actions, and often make themselves a great deal worse than they are, purely for the magnanimity they think there is in being above restraint. But let them not be mistaken. Shame doth not less attend them, because they have learnt to glory in it. The end and design of laws is to curb the vicious and irregular appetites of men. And where is the reputation of owning they are so much more vicious and irregular than other people, that the laws themselves are not able to restrain them?

With regard to many laws purely political, there are also multitudes who professedly live, and allow themselves in the breach of them. Conceiving, perhaps, that what is not evil in itself is therefore innocent; that their numbers will keep them in countenance, and protect them from shame; and that there can be no great harm in the violation of these laws, so long as they are ready to submit to the penalty of them, if they be discovered.

And however ready they may be to submit to the penalty of the laws they violate, yet is there no shame in penalty? Have rewards and penalties lost their nature, or if praise attends the one, doth not disgrace adhere to the other?

There is, therefore, no security from shame but in uprightness, but in a strict conformity to the divine and human laws. The hypocrite well knows the value of this virtue, and how much it concerns his worldly interest that men should have a good opinion of his integrity. And therefore, though he is not upright, yet he pretends to be so. But as this in him is dissimulation, and not virtue, so the event is generally the same to him and to other wicked men. He cannot always be upon his guard. There are times when the exact observer will see through, or at least have reason to suspect, that artful behaviour, by which he would steal away the reputation which only belongs to upright men. And the world is generally so ill-natured, that whomever they suspect, they defame.

But what disgrace can ever attend the man who does his duty? Who, considering his own imbecility, thinks it a privilege to be under the restraint of wholesome rules, and his greatest honour to obey them? Wrapped in his own virtue, envy and malice cannot hurt him. The love and esteem of all good men are engaged to protect and defend him.

But were it possible for men to wear this disguise without suspicion, and to sin so privately that they should not be found out, and that shame should not always be the consequence of evil deeds; yet let them not hereby think themselves secure so long as they shall be subject,

2. To remorse of conscience.

Peace of mind is the greatest blessing man can have, and that alone which gives a relish to all other enjoyments. This is what we aim at in all our pursuits, and if we can be so happy as to arrive at it, is an ample recompense of all our labours. Neither riches, nor honours, nor preferments, nor popular applause, nor great men's favour can bestow it. The only source from whence it springs is a man's own breast, which, kept clean and unpolluted, will be an inexhaustible fountain of the most refreshing waters. Nothing but uprightness can secure to us this peace of mind, this lovely tranquillity. There is no peace, saith my God, to the wicked. For every man, who is conscious to himself of evil deeds, carries about with him his own accuser, his own tormentor: before he has committed the premeditated crime, his thoughts are so taken up with the prospect of some present pleasure or advantage resulting from it, that he sees not the dreadful consequences that will attend it; but, after the evil action is once done, and cannot, if he would, give ten thousand worlds, he undoes: when the guilt that seemed little before it was incurred, is now enhanced, and the satisfaction or benefit that was before proposed, is now diminished: then it is, that innumerable uneasy thoughts are apt to crowd upon him in a tumultuous manner; then it is, that he feels the insupportable pain and anguish of a wounded spirit. What refuge does he hope for in retirement, whilst the fatal arrow sticks fast in his side, and the mind is at leisure to lay before him a faithful representation of what he dreads to behold? And when, for ease, he would change his solitude for society; then it is, that, in the midst of his amusements and diversions, the remembrance of guilt obtrudes itself upon him, and damps the jollity of all his entertainments. Then it is, that he must be forced to hear the like crimes he is guilty of condemned in others, and apply the same censures to himself which are due to them, with an aching heart. What sort of security is this, to walk dishonestly in by-paths and crooked ways unseen of men, if we ourselves disapprove the irregular steps we take, and for ever lament, that we would retreat, and cannot? What avails it any man to have hid his theft, his murder, his adultery, his perjury from men? The all-seeing eye hath discovered him, and the Almighty, with a stretched out arm, pursues him.

But it may be, there are some so accustomed to do evil, of so lost a reputation, and of so scared a conscience, that they are insensible of shame, incapable of remorse; and who, if these were all the dismal consequences of doing evil, find no discouragement from hence. If the violations of the laws of God and man were attended with no other dangers than infamy and after-reflections full of horror, they are as secure from any apprehensions of these as uprightness itself can make them. But God be thanked, these shameless hardened wretches are still of the same weak frame and make with other men; are still as sensible of external pain, fear punishment, and fear death still as other men; and the less they believe of another world, the more unwilling they are to be hurried out of this: which brings me to observe,

3. That their fancied security in the two former respects, will but more effectually expose them to those dangers which they do, and must fear, and from which the upright man alone can possibly be secure, viz. of temporal and eternal punishment. The prospect of some present pleasure or profit is the great temptation to wicked men to sin, which would be of little consideration to them, if they were thoroughly acquainted with virtue, whose ways are ways of pleasantness, and all whose paths are peace; and which, as it is, would hardly be a temptation great enough to overcome them, if they were not buoyed up with the hopes of impunity.

But let not the wicked man flatter himself that he shall go unpunished, either in this world, or in the world to come. His designs may be deeply laid; his schemes may be cunningly contrived; his outward behaviour may be so plausible as not to be suspected: he may have succeeded in his dark practices so often without discovery, as to be confirmed in his opinion, that he shall never be found out; he may have blamed the misconduct of others who have miscarried in their wicked enterprizes, and fancy that he himself, in the same cases, could have used greater dexterity, and that, however, they were taken in the crafty wiliness that they had imagined, yet he could have escaped.

But, after all, he cannot be more wary to attempt a villainy, than others will be watchful to discover him. The laws were made for the security of the community, and the breaker of them is a common enemy. To hurt one man, is to alarm the neighbourhood; and every man that regards his own safety, will in this respect be concerned for that of others; and will think it his interest to pursue the invader of it, and bring him to justice, both that he may be freed from any future apprehension of injuries from him, and that others, being terrified by the example of his punishment, may be afraid to offend.

It is very rare that any notable crime hath escaped being brought to light; and the numbers yearly convicted and condemned to the punishments they deserved, might convince any man, that was not too fond of his own parts, that running the same hazards, he would not be likely to be more fortunate. No man that does evil is ever secure, however secret. He may look about to see who seeth, but he is not sure he is not seen. If the darkness of the night invite, the silence of it often betrays. If the villain goes alone, there is usually a misgiving of heart and fearfulness to attempt; there is usually a slowness to dispatch what was intended.

and a disorder in his own scheme, and an invitation of resistance, all which tend to discovery. In the confidence of an accomplice, there is no better security. What his fidelity would hide, his inadvertence may disclose. What the present friendship conceals, future disagreements may lay open. Who is safe from the weakness, or folly, or passion of a frail criminal? What wicked man is above the temptation that may be offered for a wanted discovery? What taciturnity is to be expected in the decay of parts, or loss of senses, which in the course of life may happen to any man? What sagacity can foresee all the questions that may be put to suspected persons? or be able to evade the force of them, or to contrive a defence so connected, so uniform, so agreeing in all its parts, as that the audience shall not fail to pity the falsely accused, and retire under a full persuasion of their innocence? Or what if a wicked partner should repent, and not being able to make restitution for the wrongs he hath done, should, under the terrors of his conscience, think himself obliged, in his last moments, when he is launching out into eternity, to confess his crimes, and fearing no other reproach like that of his own heart, to declare who it was that betrayed him into them, or assisted him in them?

But if men of this bad character are usually so hardened that nothing of this needeth to be feared (though this in fact hath often happened,) yet who is always so wary and circumspect in doing ill, and after he hath done it, that he can be sure he shall not betray himself? There is a hurry and confusion that attends guilt, in the midst of which those very things are often done to cover, which effectually expose the wicked person. God Almighty will infatuate him, that he may destroy himself. He is afraid where no fear is; he fleeth when no man pursueth; and, as it were offers himself up to the punishment he seeks to escape.

But alas! what are temporal punishments compared with eternal! If those are to be dreaded because they are more immediate; these are justly terrible, in that they are more exquisite and more lasting. Therefore let not the heart of man be set in him to do evil because ser-

tence is not executed speedily against him. Nor let him flatter himself that this is at so great a distance. How short is the longest life compared with eternity ! It is even as nothing. At best it is but a span long ; and God Almighty, incensed at the disobedience of men, may be provoked to cut it shorter than they are aware of. When a man is descending to the grave, and must enter into an eternal state of happiness or misery, according as he hath obeyed or disobeyed the laws of his Maker, what are all the pleasures of sin which he hath enjoyed for a season ? What security is it to him to have been able to evade the examinations of an earthly magistrate, and to have escaped the punishment assigned to the breach of human laws ? The damnation that he hath been so often warned of, and which seemed at a distance, now lingereth not, and the just vengeance of God is ready to overtake him. In vain doth he call to the hills to hide him, and to the rocks to cover him, for all things are naked and opened to the all seeing eyes of the supreme Judge with whom he now hath to do. Nor hath there been any thing heretofore so secret, which shall not now be made manifest. Now the upright and the wicked shall hear their respective dooms pronounced : Come, ye blessed of my Father, receive the kingdom prepared for you. Go, ye cursed, into everlasting fire.

I hope, by the above reflections it hath appeared, that there is no security from shame, or remorse of conscience, or present or future punishment, but in uprightness, or a conduct agreeable to the laws of God and of our country. But before I conclude this discourse, I beg leave to observe, that as there is an uprightness, required in keeping, so there is in explaining, these laws ; and that security in all the fore-mentioned respects will belong, as to the upright observer only, so only, to the upright interpreter of them.

The gross of mankind can neither be their own counsellors in matters of human law without prejudice to their temporal interests ; nor their own casuists in matters of divine law without hazard to their spiritual : nor at any time competent judges in their own case.

Hence arises a necessity that some men should apply themselves in a particular manner to the study of these laws, and to get therein such knowledge as may enable them to advise those who shall consult them, what may be done with safety in points of law or conscience.

To invite applications to them for their advice, they profess themselves ready and able to give it. The higher are their stations, and the greater their reputation for skill in their several professions, the greater is the authority and influence of their opinions and doctrines.

If they mislead, how many do they mislead ? And if those who are misled are men of power, how fatal, how extensive may be the mischief of the error ?

Histories will sufficiently inform us, that illegalities warranted to be law, and indefensible tenets pressed upon the conscience for gospel, by their respective great professors, have subverted kingdoms.

But what could be a sufficient motive ? Naturally, if there be no bias upon the mind, men choose to say that which they really think, and it is with reluctance that they ever bring themselves to say otherwise. No other motive hath appeared, than to gratify the mean appetite, which they could not forego, to a greater fortune, or a higher station, by pleasing men, who could enrich them, and advance them.

But do they seek to please men ? If they yet seek to please men, they will not be the servants of Christ.

And if in these cases they cannot be said to walk uprightly, neither will they be found to walk securely. Their high character will not screen them from reproach, but rather expose them to it. Or if others should acquit them, they would yet condemn themselves. Moreover it is required both of the dispensers of the laws of the realm, and of the stewards of the mysteries of God, that men be found faithful ; and, if they be not, He that is higher than the highest, regardeth ; and there be higher than they.

Away, then, with all these temptations, which do so easily beset unsteady, covetous and ambitious men. Away with this childish fondness for outward pomp and splendour, for corruptible riches, for deceitful favour. Our education here, and our experience every where, will teach us the emptiness and vanity of these trifles. To a man who daily considers his mortality, and that he is going to the land where all things are forgotten, what are the greatest earthly advantages which the greatest prince hath to bestow, compared with the satisfaction of his own conscience here, and the glory which shall be revealed in him hereafter? Then, let not our heart reproach us so long as we live. Let us keep our integrity, though we die. Uprightness is the greatest ornament of the greatest men of all professions. It conciliates trust and confidence, affection and friendship; for it is the greatest security can be given to men, that we will not injure them, nor deceive them. There is no fortune so low, nor aspect so mean, to which it doth not add a value and a beauty. The person adorned with it may possess his superiority without envy, and his frailty without censure. It disarms the malevolent of his malice, and the punished of his resentment. It gives a serenity in solitude, a cheerfulness in society, a pleasure in devotion, a consolation in misery, and, at the approach of death, hopes full of immortality.

SERMON LXXXVII.

By Archbishop SECKER.

The Duties of the Rich and Great.

1 TIM. vi. 17, 18.

Charge them that are rich in this world, that they be not high minded, nor trust in uncertain riches, but in the living God, who giveth us richly all things to enjoy: that they do good, that they be rich in good works, ready to distribute, willing to communicate.

EVERY condition of life hath its peculiar dangers to be avoided, and duties to be done, but none hath dangers more threatening, or duties more important, than that of the rich and great: whose situation, notwithstanding, is seldom considered by those who are in it, as having any thing to be feared: and is generally imagined by others, to comprehend almost every thing that is to be wished. Now the mistakes even of the lower part of the world concerning this matter are attended with some exceeding bad consequences; disposing them very unreasonably to envy their superiors, and be uneasy at their own lot. But the mistakes of the rich and great themselves concerning the advantages and obligations of their station, produce the most fatal effects that can be, on themselves and all around them. And it greatly adds to the unhappiness of their case, that whilst they have many things to divert their attention from what is right, and prompt them to what is wrong; to make the gratifying of their bad inclinations easy, and support them in the world, let them act as they will; they have commonly scarce any one to remind them, if they act amiss. Intimations of misbehaviour, however prudently given, are to most persons disagreeable; but to persons of rank they appear disrespectful too. And such of them, as will bear to be told of their managing their healths or their fortunes ill, shew a great reluctance to let their conduct, in point of religion or morals, be touched with any seriousness. So that, just where they need admonition most, they have the least given them. It is but few, that can with propriety use freedom enough with them, to do any good; for, to slight and distant hints they think no serious regard is due. And amongst those that can, there are fewer yet that will undertake an office, in which they have little prospect either of success or thanks. Indeed the generality of those that come about them, in all likelihood, mean nothing, but their own interest, or their own amusement; and these, they may be sure, will take care never to offend them by giving them good advice: but there is much cause to suspect, what the great, notwithstanding seldom do suspect, that they will often court them by giving them bad; or, if they do not directly persuade them into sin, (which might sometimes be too gross behaviour), will however more covertly dispose them to it; encourage and countenance them in it; either to bring about some particular end, which they have to serve by it, or with a general view of making themselves agreeable.

To be thus environed with temptations,

and probably sensible of none of them, is a most pitiable condition. And yet the rich and great, when they are led wrong, do not so deserve compassion, as not to deserve much blame too. For as there are some things to excuse their faults, there are many that aggravate them. Their education, so costly and laboured in several respects, must have been conducted with the absurdest negligence in the most material; if it hath not given them a much superior knowledge of their duty, to that which common persons can usually acquire. Their disengagement afterwards from cares, that others are swallowed up in, affords them peculiar leisure for thought and recollection; and the vast and evident importance of their whole behaviour, on such a multitude of accounts, one should think could not fail of engaging their attention to every step they take. So that if they have fewer occasional admonitions given them; it might be hoped they would have less need of them; for their very situation admonishes them constantly, that they are raised by Providence above others, in order to be authors and examples of good, not evil, to their fellow-creatures. This is directly their business and trust; it is the noblest and happiest that can be. The labours of it are softened by many honorable and pleasing distinctions, which God hath bestowed on them; for which he will justly expect they shall make him a return. If it be such as it ought, they will be eminent for ever in the next world, as well as for a few days in this; and how can persons be excusable, that are uninfluenced by such considerations?

It is very true, our Saviour doth express, in very strong terms, the difficulty of a rich man's entering into the kingdom of heaven. But he means, of such a one's professing himself a subject of Christ; which required uncommon resolution at that time, when all worldly advantages were to be given up, and the bitterest persecutions undergone for the sake of the gospel. Yet even then no man was excused, either from embracing or practising christianity; much less now. And if at all times the great have temptations beyond others, they have also reasons beyond others for struggling with them, and will be rewarded beyond others for overcoming them. Therefore St. Paul in the text gives them no dispensations, but only provides for them stronger warnings; and instead of authorising the ministers of God's word to wink at their faults, requires that they admonish them with singular earnestness to perform their duties. The only prerogative in relation to this matter that can be allowed them. But as in general the least offensive, and therefore most efficacious way of admonishing, is by public instruction, we usually confine ourselves to that; and the upper part of mankind ought to attend upon it more constantly, and hearken to it more seriously, in proportion as they are less likely to be told their faults and their dangers, in private, to good purpose; and should suffer the word of exhortation (Heb. xiii. 22.) to be given with greater plainness and freedom to them all in common, the greater objections there are against taking any considerable liberties with each of them singly.

And as those of middle rank, may yet, when compared with their inferiors, be considered as highly exalted, and accordingly consider themselves as such. All degrees above the lowest, are concerned to cherish the Apostle's charge; and the very lowest will find their own failures, and their own obligations intermixed of course with what will be said about those of their betters.

Now the peculiar dangers of the rich and great (for though the Apostle names only the former, the connexion is so close, that he may well be understood to mean both) arises either from the eminence of their station, or the abundance of their wealth; and therefore the text points a caution against each. But I shall be able at present to treat only of the first; which is, that they be not high-minded.

Every superiority, of every sort, which men only imagine themselves possessed of, is too liable both to be over-rated and improperly used. But superior fortune and condition are advantages so visible to all eyes, create such dependencies, and give such influence, that it is no wonder, if they tempt to uncommon haughtiness. Even such as rise to them by accident, are so eager to have all the world acknowledge them to be what they are just become, that they often quite forget what they were a while before. Such as acquire them by their own application and abilities, hardly ever fail to think very highly of themselves on that account. And they who are born to them, usually set out from the first with despising those beneath them: as indeed to be descended from ancestors of note; to bear a name which others have been accustomed to respect; to enjoy perhaps hereditary honours, and on every occasion to be addressed in other language, than is used to the vulgar sort of men; these things are enough to over-set the minds of the weak; and they have some degree of wrong effect upon most; more, perhaps, than they themselves are sensible of.

Now undoubtedly distinguished rank is entitled to distinguished regard: and the good order of society very much depends on keeping up that regard; and therefore the great should in a proper manner be much more careful to keep it up, than many of them are. For indeed their condescensions and familiarities, are often with such very wrong persons, and in such very wrong ways, that preserving an over-distant behaviour would, of the two, be much the better, both for themselves, and those whom they are pleased to honour with their intimacy. But when they nurse up the consciousness of their own superiority into a contemptuous neglect of others, and insolent expectations of unfit submissions from them; they have great need to be reminded, that respect is paid to wealth and birth, because the common good requires it, not because the persons who receive it, are always worthy of it: and when they are unworthy, they have much more reason to be humble on their own account, than vain on account of their estates or their ancestors. The wise and good indeed will shew them the outward regard, to which they are entitled; but inward they must expect from none, except the weak and inconsiderate: nor will the false appearances of it from the artful and interested do them any service: but their dishonourable behaviour will be the more conspicuous for their honourable station.

And even supposing them guilty of nothing else to lessen the esteem they claim; yet claiming too much of it, or too openly, will frustrate their intention most effectually. For neither equals nor inferiors will suffer near so much to be extorted from them, as they would have bestowed most freely of their own accord. Haughtiness therefore towards all, who are not absolute dependants, is a most ridiculous thing; and to such as are, it is a very imprudent one. For the highest lie greatly at the mercy even of those who serve them, and attend upon them; in respect of their characters, their credit and weight in the world, their fortunes, their ease, their very safety. And therefore to treat those, who are ever so much at our command, with such humanity and affability, as may secure their good opinion and good will, is mere common honest policy.

But one sort of condescension to inferiors may be of peculiar advantage; I mean, listening to useful information and advice from them: things, which the great are apt to think themselves above, when every one else sees they have much need of them. The rich man, as Solomon observes, is wise in his own conceit: but the poor, that hath understanding, searcheth him out. (Prov. xlviii. 11.) Neither affluence, nor high rank, by any means imply superiority of judgement; or if they did, the best judgements often want to be instructed in the nature and circumstances of what they are to judge upon; and indeed to be guarded against the mistakes, to which inexperience, inadvertence, or unseen prejudices, may expose them. And the more important any matter is, and the less carefully and seriously we have weighed it, the more necessary there evidently appears, that we should hear others in relation to it. How attentively then should the greatest hear the appointed teachers of religion: the one thing needful (Luke, x. 42.) to their eternal happiness; and perhaps the very thing that many of them have hitherto considered the least, yet possibly set themselves the most to despise and ridicule! But in their worldly affairs too, it might prevent innumerable errors and distresses, if they would vouchsafe on fit occasions, to receive and encourage lessons of wisdom from those beneath them. Thus, you will easily discern, is a very different matter from being led and governed: to which the most self-sufficient of men, under artful management, are often the most subject. It is governing ourselves by exerting the rational powers, which God hath given us, instead of being slaves to our passions and fancies. We cannot alter truth : and therefore, how exalted soever our condition be, we should think it no disgrace, but the highest honour, to submit to it. Nor is the obligation of doing so in the least different, whether we discover it ourselves, or learn it from others. If reason hath at all a right to direct us, it hath an equal right, whence soever it comes. And the most truly considerable persons have always been the readiest to follow the opinion of such, as were in all respects their inferiors, whenever they happened to be in the right. Nor is there perhaps any part of humility, that can give us more reputation than this, or do us more service.

But if humility in the great could be no other way beneficial to them ; yet avoiding the guilt of so injurious a behaviour, as indulging a proud spirit prompts them to, is surely a motive important enough. Hence it is that instead of learning forgiveness of him, who was meek and lowly in heart (Matt. xi. 29.), they often resent offences of very small consequence, nay undesigned ones, very immoderately ; and some, even to the demanding of the blood of others at the hazard of their own. And though perhaps they themselves began the injury, yet they imagine their honour binds them to violate the laws of God and man in order to revenge it : which absurd notion they have patronized in the world, till persons, so far beneath them, have taken it up, that one should hope they might be induced to lay it down for that reason, if not for better. But the haughtiness of the great, without being combined with anger, doth in cold blood infinite mischief. And they should consider, that it is the same aggravation of the fault, if one who is justly possessed of superiority already, unjustly affects more ; as it would be in the rich to pilfer and rob. In countries of legal liberty indeed, there is not so much room, for the pride of the upper part of the world to bear upon the lower. And truly both may thank God for it : the one, that they are thus delivered from the temptation ; the other, from the suffering. For very dreadful is both the wickedness and the misery, to which unlimited power leads : and Solomon describes the latter very pathetically : I returned and considered all the oppressions, that are done under the sun : and behold, the fears of such as were oppressed, and they had no comforter : and on the side of their oppressors was power ; but they had no comforter. Wherefore I praised the dead, that are already dead, more than the living, which are yet alive. Yea, better is he, than both they, which hath not yet been ; and hath not seen the evil work that is done under the sun. (Eccl. iv. 1, 2, 3.) But though a merciful Providence hath preserved this nation, freer than any other, from such extremities ; yet every where the rich and great make their inferiors suffer a great deal too much : sometimes by a designed and studied haughtiness, often by a careless and contemptuous one, which renders them inattentive to what those in lower life may feel ; when perhaps from principle, such as it is, they would avoid doing injuries to their equals, and are by no means without tenderness towards them.

Thus too many treat their tenants hardly, or permit them to be so treated : sometimes indeed from avarice ; sometimes from the urgency of wants which follies and vices have created ; but frequently, from not thinking it worth while to inquire, whether such mean creatures are well or ill used, and refusing to be troubled with their complaints and remonstrances ; which, though often groundless, may often likewise be very just. Now were we in this wretched case, we should soon discern it to be extremely cruel in our superiors, to imagine us undeserving of being regarded and eased in bad times, or under the pressure of unexpected accidents ; to indulge their own love of money, or keep up their idle expensiveness to the full, whatever we and our families might undergo, whose labour must pay for all ; to throw new burthens upon us, not because we were able to bear them, but because they were unwilling ; to subject us, without redress, to the partialities and resentment of their agents, or crush us under the weight of their own ; obliging us perhaps to seek a livelihood elsewhere to our certain loss and probable ruin, if at any time we were less obsequious to them than they required, though on occasions where we ought to be left free. Such behaviour all men would think exceedingly barbarous, were they to experience it; and therefore all should resolve never to be guilty of it, and apply to this case amongst others, that admirable exhortation of the Son of Sirach: make not an hungry soul sorrowful; neither provoke a man in his distress: reject not the supplication of the afflicted, neither turn thy face away from a poor man. Turn not away thy eye from the needy, and give him no occasion to curse thee. For if he curse thee in the bitterness of his soul, his prayer shall be heard of him that made him.—Let it not grieve thee to bow down thine ear to the poor; and give him a friendly answer, with meekness. (Ecclus. iv. 2, 4, 5, 6, 8.)

Another sort of persons, for whom superiors too commonly will not vouchsafe to have the consideration that they ought, are those who come to them upon business. Obliging such to an unreasonable attendance, making them wait long, and it may be return often, (when perhaps only idleness, or caprice, or occupations that might well be interrupted, prevent their being dispatched immediately,) is a very provoking and a very injurious kind of stateliness. Time ought to be precious to all men; and is peculiarly precious to those, who have affairs and appointments to fill it with, that either must be attended on, each in its season, or they and theirs must suffer, perhaps be undone. And were it considered, but near so much as it ought, how very large a share of the time of others, a few of these proud or thoughtless men are sufficient to consume, it would be found a matter of no small seriousness.

But there is another fault still worse frequently joined with this; deeming it beneath their notice, whether such of their inferiors, as have just and reasonable demands upon them, are paid when they ought. At the same time they would think it infamous not to pay, what they lose to the vilest wretch in the pernicious practice of gaming, though the law, for the public good, discourages and almost forbids their doing it. Notwithstanding which, by a monstrous perversion of language, they call these last their debts of honour, in opposition to the former. It is very true that a man is not at all akin to pride, frequently to be seen those of high rank to neglect or even neglect satisfying their creditors. But so far as they take liberties in this respect, which, were they less considerable in the world, they would not dare to take, and probably would not think of taking; so far their injustice arises from a haughty confidence in their own greatness; and a contemptuous indifference, to what inconveniences and difficulties they expose others. There needs but a little consideration to see, what exquisite distresses such a conduct must produce; and how pitiable the situation of those poor people must be; who, on pain of losing all their business, dare not refuse credit; and yet are in a likely way to be ruined if they give it. The common method of saving themselves, I fear, is, by making unreasonable gains from the good part of their customers, to indemnify themselves for the delays, and often final disappointments, which they meet with from the bad. But this is plainly punishing such as use them well, for the faults of others who use them ill: a behaviour of which no one should be guilty, and therefore no one should be driven to it; but least of all by those, whose circumstances either do or might exempt them the most entirely from any necessity of such injustice. The care of being punctual in the discharge of their debts, and considerate, for that purpose, in comparing their income and expences, and attentive to keep the latter within the compass of the former, far from being below the greatest, enables them to shew themselves truly great on many occasions, when otherwise they could not: but the figure which they make in the eyes of mankind, amidst all their splendor, for the want of this care; and the poor arts, to which they are obliged to condescend, for quieting their creditors, and supporting their extravagances, are extremely unsuitable to a station, that claims distinguished respect.

Another, very blameable, and very pernicious instance of high-mindedness in the great, is, imagining the management of their families an attention too low for them. Even that of their children they very commonly despise to an astonishing degree. And yet think it no dishonour, to throw away on every trifle and folly, that they can hunt out, many of those hours, a few of which might do a great deal towards making life a blessing, (which now through their fault is often a curse), to those whom they have brought into it. Or if they have humility enough to inspect some part of their education, it is usually the outward and shewy, but least material part: and they would be ashamed of the supposition of their taking any serious pains, to plant in them those principles of religion and virtue, on learning which the present and future happiness of their children depends; and their own, on teaching them. If persons can treat the very fruit of their body (Mich. vi. 7.) in such a manner, no wonder if the servants under their roof are treated amiss. And yet a tender regard to the meanest of them is unquestionably the duty of the highest of those who employ them. For our common humanity requires, that their disadvantageous condition be not rendered more so than it needs, either by design or negligence, of which nature hath given them as strong a feeling as their betters. And therefore, of our own accord, we should inquire and consider about them: when they offer complaints, we should receive them; and if there be some impropriety in the manner of making them, pass over that, as proceeding perhaps from ignorance, perhaps from a present sense of suffering; look to the substance of what they allege, and grant them due redress. Again, when they seem to be in a fault, we should submit to hear patiently, and examine equitably, every plea they have to make. For there may be circumstances of no small weight in their favour, both as to what they remonstrate about, and what they are accused of, which we may not have rightly understood or considered; and therefore should permit them to be laid before us. Otherwise we treat them as unworthy of common justice, and incur that guilt, which Job hath expressed in such affecting words that they can never be omitted, when this subject is mentioned. If I did despise the cause of my man-servant, or my maid-servant, when they contended with me; what shall I do when God riseth up, and when he visiteth, what shall I answer him? Did not he that made me, make him: and did not one fashion us in the womb? (Job, xxxi. 13, 14, 15.)

every small domestic concern, may sit ill upon people of rank; and perhaps be inconsistent with their attention to affairs of more importance. But so far as they can with any propriety look into things, they should be careful, not only to behave mildly and equitably to their servants themselves, but to see that they behave so one to another. For in large families especially, there are sometimes dreadful grievances of this kind: and requisite subordination may be sufficiently preserved, without either countenancing or permitting oppression.

Not that under colour of gentleness to them, we should suffer them to live uncontrolled, and to do as they please. This would be a false good-nature, and extensively pernicious. We may think perhaps, that we shall hurt nobody by it, but ourselves; and even this we ought not to do. But indeed, along with ourselves, we shall hurt the fortunes, it may be the morals too, of those who ought to be dearest to us; for wicked servants are dangerous corrupters: we shall set an example of ill management in our own families, which will make it more difficult for others to manage theirs well: and we shall do the greatest prejudice of all to those, who will probably at present the least complain of it; I mean the poor wretches, whom we indulge so wrongly. For it is hardly to be hoped, but that our negligence about their conduct, will tempt them, either to be dishonest, or idle, or wasteful, in our service; or vicious and dissolute; or however, forgetful of their duty to God. And we owe it to them, as we have taken them under our care, to preserve them, if we can, from all these sins; to direct their steps in the ways of religion and virtue; and not expose them to ruin here, and misery hereafter, for want of vouchsafing to look a little after them: a shocking instance of haughtiness in relation to our brethren for whom Christ died. (1 Cor. viii. 11.)

I have enlarged so long on these particulars, in which the upper part of the world are too high-minded, to attend to their duty; that I must comprehend the rest in a very few words; which I beg all, who are concerned, to reflect upon more distinctly, and apply to themselves impartially. Whoever makes his rank or his wealth a privilege, either to say or do things to any one that are injurious or unbecoming; or to omit things that are right and good: whoever makes use of his inferiors for his own advantage or amusement, to their inconvenience, and neglects them when he hath done; whoever expects more from them, in any respect, than he hath a reasonable claim to; or makes his superiority, by the ostentation of it painful, or by the misuse of it detrimental, justly falls under the Apostle's charge, as a high-minded offender against man and God. And though offences of this kind are heinous in all persons, yet they are peculiarly so in christians; whose rule, which they profess to follow, is: Be kindly affectioned one to another, with brotherly love; in honour preferring one another: mind not high things, but condescend to men of low estate. (Rom. xiii. 10. 16.) Let nothing be done through strife or vain glory, but in lowliness of mind let each esteem other better than themselves. Look not every man on his own things, but every man also on the things of others. Let this mind be in you which was also in Christ Jesus, who being in the form of God, took on him the form of a servant, and humbled himself unto death, even the death of the cross. (Phil. ii. 3-8.) All of you be subject one to another, and be clothed with humility: for God resisteth the proud, and giveth grace to the humble. (1 Pet. v. 5.)

SERMON LXXXVIII.

By ARCHBISHOP SECKER.

1 TIM. vi. 17, 18.

Charge them that are rich in this world, that they be not high-minded, nor trust in uncertain riches; but in the living God, who giveth us richly all things to enjoy: that they do good, that they be rich in good works; ready to distribute, willing to communicate.

In this passage the Apostle requires the ministers of God's word, first, to caution persons of wealth and rank against the sins of which they are peculiarly in danger: then to lay before them the duties, to which they are peculiarly bound. I have endeavoured already to obey his injunction, in relation to the former of the two sins, which he specifies, that of being high-minded; and now proceed to the latter, trusting in uncertain riches: which phrase comprehends placing the happiness of life either in wealth itself, or in those pleasures and amusements, which it is commonly made the instrument of procuring. The prohibition therefore of doing this extends to regulate the acquisition, the possession and use of a great fortune: and to go through the subject fully, each of these points must be considered.

1. The acquisition. In speculation it seems hardly to be expected, that any one, who is once master of enough to answer his real and reasonable wants, should feel any desire almost, on his own account, of having more: that he should take much pains about it, is very wonderful; and that he should do any thing wrong for it, quite unaccountable. But that they, who have superfluous wealth already, should both disquiet themselves and injure others merely to obtain a larger superfluity, is incredibly absurd. And yet, in fact, these are the persons whose passion for augmenting their incomes is usually the strongest. When riches increase, set not your heart upon them, is the caution of scripture (Ps. lxxii. 10.); and accordingly the son of Sirach pronounces, Blessed is the rich, that is found without blemish, and hath not gone after gold. Who is he? and we will call him blessed; for wonderful things hath he done among his people. Who hath been tried thereby, and found perfect? then let him glory. (Ecclus. xxxi. 8, 9, 10.) For indeed neither the mean nor the unjust things, to which necessity prompts the poor, are to be compared with those, which persons, far above necessity, will notwithstanding do for gain. Too many there are, who seem to account their follies and their vices in the number of things necessary; and though they have abundantly sufficient to live according to their rank, provided they would live prudently and virtuously, will submit to acquire, by wicked means, what they want only to support them in wicked courses. And others, though unable to find out either good or bad uses for what they have already, yet are not at all the less eager for adding more to it; but will do almost any thing to enlarge, what they enjoy nothing from, except as Solomon observes beholding it with their eyes (Eccl. v. 11.); and he hath observed further, that the eye is not satisfied with seeing. (Eccl. i. 8. Comp. iv. 8. v. 10.) Desires increase continually, and cares along with them. Such acquisitions cannot really promote even their present happiness; or supposing they could, yet if using unfair or low arts to serve their own interests be excusable in the wealthy, in whom is it that any thing is inexcusable? No temptation is a warrant for doing wrong; but to do wrong, without any thing that deserves the name of a temptation, is exceedingly bad. And it cannot be nature, but merely an absurd habit, wilfully indulged, that tempts men to accumulate what they have no need of.

But though riches alone render eagerness for more very blameable and unbecoming, yet greatness added to them doubles the fault. For exalted rank absolutely calls for the exercise of honourable disinterestedness. And there are several things, in strictness, very lawful and honest, which yet are beneath people of condition; who, as far as they can with any tolerable prudence, ought ever to avoid the shadow of a mean action; and leave no room for the imputation of being misled by sordid motives in any part of life. For who shall set the example of resisting such considerations, if they give way to them? And yet what sort of example is there more needful or more beneficial? Not that people of birth and fortune ought to think themselves above all views, either of private advantage or of due recompence for their public services. This, in many cases, would be a false and romantic delicacy; unreasonably detrimental to themselves and their families, and productive of no benefit, but harm, to the world around them. But in every case, to act with a steady regard to truth and right and common good, and, without hesitation, to prefer their character before their interest, when they interfere, is indeed the general duty of all men, but of the rich and great above all. Whoever violates it in private life is almost sure to contract an infamy, that will make his gains a dear purchase. And in affairs of a more public nature the guilt at least is the same; often greater, as the mischief done, or however bad the example set, is more extensive. I am very sensible how common it is for men of seriousness and worth in other respects, not to consider these things as matter of conscience at all, and accordingly to take strange liberties in relation to them. But a little impartial reflection would soon show, that both reason and religion prohibit the obstructing of useful measures by opposition, forwarding bad ones by subserviency, encouraging wickedness or worthlessness, departing from justice and equity, for any selfish or any party end whatever. Were even a general good proposed to be served by it, evil is not to be done that good may come (Rom. iii. 8.); nor will any come from it that would not have been more effectually obtained, and longer preserved, by other means. And as for good merely personal, whoever aims at that by methods hurtful to his country, whatever outward advantages he may get by it, will lose all title to peace within. And it will be found, if not soon, yet, which is worse, too late, that his own interest, and that of his posterity, are so connected with the interest of the whole, that all advantages, made by a behaviour inconsistent with it, will be truly uncertain riches, as the text calls them; will make themselves wings and fly away (Prov. xxiii. 5.), in the time of general calamity; or perhaps long before, in the preceding general wickedness, which he hath been instrumental in hastening on: and then reproach and shame will be the only portion left to him or his. But how righteous soever the acquisition of their wealth may have been, the rich in this world have need that a charge be given them.

2. Concerning the possession of it. In the possession alone, some of them seem to have placed the whole of its value; making literally, as Job expresses it, gold their hope, and saying to the fine gold, thou art my confidence (Job, xxxi. 24.); and neither employing it, to any benefit of their own, nor of any one else. Now keeping a heap of wealth, merely for the sake of keeping it, is an apparent absurdity. Keeping it, merely for the repute of having it, is a very low inducement. And if laying up against future accidents be pretended, a moderate store will suffice for a reasonable security, and nothing can secure us absolutely. Indeed the larger the fortune, the more room for accidents, in one part or another of it; and the loss of a small part will be as grievous to a heart set upon riches, as that of a larger to another man. Besides, whoever lives only to the purpose of saving and accumulating, will be tempted by this ruling passion to a sinful neglect of the poor and the worthy among his friends and dependants, perhaps among his relations and very children. For that important obligation of providing for their own, and specially for those of their own house, (on which St. Paul, in the chapter before the text, (1 Tim. v. 8.) hath laid so great a stress, and which the covetous imagine, or pretend, they are faithfully performing,) doth not consist at all in hoarding up for them as much as they can, but in bestowing upon them as much as they need. This not only the context proves, and the use of the original word in other authors, but the nature of the thing. For whoever is in want of any thing requisite, is evidently unprovided for, how much wealth soever another may say he keeps for him, whilst he really keeps it from him. And when any one hath made provision enough for those who peculiarly belong to him, to put them in a way suitable to their condition, he can seldom be bound, and is not always at liberty, to do more. The care of them indeed is the first demand upon him; yet after this is sufficiently taken, and even while it is taking, there may be many other most equitable claims; and they are all of them entitled to a proportionable regard by that general precept of reason, as well as scripture, withhold not good from them to whom it is due, when it is in the power of thy hand to do it. (Prov. iii. 27.) Some occasions present themselves to every one, and frequent occasions to the rich and great, on which extending acts of liberality far beyond the narrow bounds of a family, is indeed but discharging a debt; which the participation in common of human nature brings upon us, and he that hath made us all of one blood (Acts, xvii. 26.) expects we shall pay. Nor will he fail to impute it for heinous guilt, at the day of judgement, (as our Saviour hath given us awful warning,) if they whom he hath particularly qualified for works of charity, and expressly appointed the stewards and dispensers of what he hath bestowed on them purposely for that very end, shall, in breach of so sacred a trust, confine to themselves the bounty which was placed in their hands, that all around them might receive a proper share of it.

But some of the higher part of mankind adventure to go still greater lengths than this, to preserve the possession of what they have: detain from others, without scruple, what even in legal justice they are entitled to; and defend themselves against the demand of it, on the advantage-ground of their wealth, or their rank and station; which render it often difficult and expensive, sometimes impossible, for their inferiors to obtain redress. A most ungenerous, dishonest, tyrannical use of the prerogatives of their condition! Every one must see it to be so: and they, upon whom the eyes of every one are fixed, should have no little regard to this consideration, amongst others that are still weightier. The privileges granted by law to some were granted for the security of the public good, not the patronage of private oppression. And those, which others take to themselves, of awing or ruining, by the superiority of their fortune or their credit, such as presume to think of recovering what is denied them, are contrary to the whole intent of law and of human society. Not to say, that whoever hath a spark of true greatness, will be desirous to put any one, with whom he hath a controversy, fairly on the level for an equitable decision of it. and will say, with Elihu in Job, if thou canst answer me, set thy words in order before me, stand up. Behold, my terror shall not make thee afraid, neither shall my hand be heavy upon thee. (Job, xxxiii. 5, 7.)

But perhaps they will plead, that the demands, which they refuse to satisfy, are unjust impositions. And without question, if that be really and evidently so, they not only are warranted to stand out themselves, but ought to protect others in doing it, as far as they properly can. But then, it is never allowable to make this plea, without being satisfied of its truth: and men cannot be reasonably satisfied of any thing, concerning which they have not impartially sought for full information, and coolly considered it. They may have entertained suspicions, they may have heard reports, they may have received positive assurances, perhaps from the prejudiced, perhaps from the ignorant; but these things, without knowing what the other side hath to answer, are no foundations at all to determine upon, in matters of property: where it should ever be observed, as a general rule, that though we are indeed concerned to inquire what demands are ill-grounded, and reject them; yet we are much more concerned to inquire what are well-grounded, and comply with them. Our interest only is at stake in one case, and often a very small interest too; but our honour and conscience in the other. For whoever presumes, in any matter, to say, he will not do what justice or equity requires he should do, may in other respects be a worthy man, but in this he is very blamable: and were the same temper to influence his whole conduct, he would be completely wicked. Indeed, to say the truth, unjustly withholding things is much the same crime as unjustly taking them away. And whoever is in reality, as well as name, a man of honour, were it ever so much in his power, by his own authority, or the complaisance of others, to procure himself unequitable profits or savings, without any possibility of controul; will not endeavour, will not permit, that a preference or favour, injurious to any one person in the world, shall ever be shown him. He will check the baseness of those who would pay court to him by such vile practices, and obviate the fears of such as apprehend they may displease him by acting uprightly, where it makes against him. Far from contriving or desiring to be eased at the expence of those beneath him, he will require to be put on no better a footing than other men; and to be charged with his full share of the burdens of society, since he receives his full share of its benefits. No matter, that while he behaves thus, others, and it may be those of his own rank, will not fail to behave very differently, nor he perhaps to be a sufferer by it. He will be content, if they please to have it so, that seeking and enjoying unfair advantages, shall be their character; and refusing and despising them, his.

But besides the sins, which may be committed in the getting or keeping of wealth, there are

3. Others, committed too frequently in using it; which persons of superior fortune and rank must be charged to avoid, and which undoubtedly the text comprehends. For putting their trust in riches is just as much the description of those, who place the happiness of life in the enjoyment of large estates, as those who place it in the possession of them. Nay indeed, as a very great part of the antient wealth consisted immediately in plenty of those things, which give pleasure in the consumption of them; so voluptuousness, which surely the Apostle would not omit on this occasion, was perhaps more especially designed to be forbidden than rapaciousness, or excessive parsimony. And it confirms this, that when our Saviour was cautioning his hearers against laying up treasure for themselves, instead of being rich towards God; the parable, by which he chose to do it, was that of a person, who having, as he thought, abundant provision of good things for many years, determined upon it from thenceforth to take his case, eat, drink, and be merry. (Luke, xii. 17—21.) Now this man is the representative of a numerous multitude, who agree entirely in his general scheme, though they differ from each other in several particulars.

Some trust in their riches so very inconsiderately, that they trust there will never be an end of them, let them be squandered as extravagantly as they will. So they set out with gratifying themselves in every thing, and looking after nothing; till, having been the admiration of the weak, and the pity of the wise for a few years, and contribute to undo their equals by their example, and their inferiors by the honour of employing and not paying them; they are reduced from the grandeur, which they should not have affected, to difficulties that they need never have known. But they will feel them now the more severely for their preceding indulgences, and yet perhaps will be tempted to plunge forward, through meanness and wickedness, into deeper ruin, instead of retreating as soon as they perceived their mistake; which last if they would do, with an ingenuous acknowledgement of it, they would deserve to be treated with much tenderness, as having erred only through inexperience and thoughtless levity, not ill design.

Others, if they do not dissipate their estates in so wild a manner, yet use them principally to minister to their sensuality and debauchery; vices which men of superior fortune somehow imagine they have a sort of right to be guilty of; and men of superior rank behave, to many of them, as if they had no other end of their being. Commonly they do so in the beginning of life, and, in truth, not uncommonly to the end of it. Yet it is evident, beyond denial, that reason no more allows, and inclination no more excuses, these things, in the highest of mankind than the lowest; and were all mankind to practise them without restraint, there would be no living in the world. Indeed there is not any degree of vicious practice, but hath its proportional degrees of mischief, to some one or other, following it; especially as one wrong step leads on imperceptibly, and at last, (as the guilty are apt to think), unavoidably, to many others; and thus the most harmless and best-natured vices in appearance, produce perhaps the cruellest injuries. But the fatal effects of sensual indulgences and dissolute pleasures on the healths, the fortunes, the usefulness, the reputations, the peace, of those who give way to them, on the quiet and prosperity of families, on the good order and strength of civil society, are so obvious in themselves, so often insisted on from this place, and so universally acknowledged, (how little soever the acknowledgement influences men), that there can be no need to enlarge on them at present. And were they much less notorious than they are; yet, since God hath been pleased to interpose his peremptory commands in a case where surely he may, and to deliver by express revelation such rules for the government of every appetite, as his infinite wisdom saw to be fit, it behoves the greatest of those, who presume to transgress the limits which he hath set them, to consider well with themselves what plea they will make to him another day for so doing. That nature prompts them to it, is not always a truth; for their excesses are often a perversion, a force upon nature: and it is never a justification, unless it be justifiable for men to do everything to which they are inclined: when yet they show perpetually, that they can, if they please, curb their strongest inclinations of this sort, on motives far less considerable than those of religion. And for the remaining excuse of general custom, what is wrong for one to do is wrong for more; and God will not dispense with his laws, merely because a number of his creatures join to disobey them: besides that persons of rank are bound, both in honour and duty, to set the example, not to follow it blindfold. Examples of vice they have set, till those about them and beneath them have learned much more of it than their superiors, I believe, wish they had; but they must wish in vain, till they change their own conduct. And indeed, the men of condition especially, have left no room for any of themselves to make a distinguished figure in wickedness, without becoming abandoned to the most shocking and pernicious degrees of it; nor hardly then. But by a virtuous example they may be most honourably singular; for the esteem of goodness is still general, however rare the practice be. And not only the sober part of mankind, but the bulk of the immoral, (though doubtless more delighted with such as keep them in countenance, and often poorly affecting to ridicule others), yet, do, and must, inwardly, both respect and envy the worthy few, who adorn exalted rank by an uniform regularity of life, in the midst of every temptation to the contrary.

Another very bad use of wealth, which too many seem to place (if may judge from the vehemence which they pursue it) no small part of their happiness, is that of

fixes itself so deep in the hearts of such numbers, it is hard to say; whether it be an absurd covetousness, an unmeaning fondness for victory, a groundless persuasion of superior skill; an idle conceit of being favoured by fortune, or a wretched longing to get rid any how of unwelcome thoughts and tedious hours: whatever be its origin, its effects are most fatal. That all play is at all times, and to all persons, either unlawful or inexpedient, I would by no means affirm. But that very often it is so, cannot be denied; and every one, who takes a share in it, should consider seriously the nature and tendency of what he doth. If it inclines him to passionate, and perhaps profane expressions; if it inwardly agitates his mind, sours his temper, or wastes his spirits; if it tempts him to any sort or degree of fraud or unfairness; if it mixes him with company dangerous or unsuitable to him; if it devours more time than is consistent with a due attention to the business of his station, public or private, or to the regular order of his family; if it takes up any part of the time that ought to be spent in religious recollection of his ways, or other improvement of his soul at home in piety and virtue; if either by its direct and immediate, or any concomitant expences, it leads him into difficulties and distresses, that may lead him into sin; if it consumes a greater part of his income than justice to his creditors, the duty of providing for those who belong to him, or of liberal charity to every proper good purpose allows; or if, without any other harm, it engages his heart, and a fondness of it grows upon him; if it lowers his character, and so lessens his ability of doing good in the world; nay, supposing it doth him no harm at all, yet if it doth harm by his means to others; if it brings the worthless and the wicked into credit and familiarity with their betters; if it entices the well-meaning by example, or forces them by false shame, into doing anything, which either in itself, or in their circumstances, is unlawful or unwise: in every one of these cases it is without question very damnable. And whoever impartially considers how he shall preserve himself from guilt, as to all of them, will easily find it requisite either to abstain wholly intirely, or to restrain it in yet to much narrower bounds than most men do. For the great have, in this matter, as well as many more, trusted to their riches so indiscreetly, and neglected other considerations so intirely; and their inferiors, down to the lowest of those that can call themselves persons of fashion, (and even beneath that rank), have followed them so thoughtlessly and wildly, that play is become one of the principal sins of the present age, is spread to a degree that none of the former ever knew, and daily brings forth fruits that many succeeding ones may have cause to lament.

But supposing wealth be neither spent in this, nor any of the gross vices mentioned before; yet if it be employed in ministering to a course of more decent and refined luxury, or in supporting such a pomp of life as nourishes vanity and pride, or in filling so much time with unprofitable entertainment, that little room is left in the mind for objects of importance: these things also the rich and great must be charged to amend. For though their condition will permit plenty and elegance, diversions, and amusements, perhaps dignity and grandeur; yet it will not permit their living to these things, their being quite taken up with them, and lost in them. For not only the transition is too easy from several innocent pleasures to forbidden ones, and expensiveness in any way breeds powerful temptations, both to omit right and to do wrong things; but supposing these dangers avoided, yet a life devoted wholly or chiefly to the gratifications of sense, the enjoyment of greatness, or indulgence of trifles, is not the life of a rational agent; less still of a moral and religious one; but least of all of a miserable sinner, who has so very much to account for, and that so very soon. And what our account will end in, if we make it our great business here to delight ourselves, without looking further, St. Paul hath given us a strong intimation, when he saith, they that live in pleasure are dead whilst they live. (1 Tim. v. 6.) Our Saviour too hath forewarned us at large to the same purpose, in that awful parable of the rich man, who, being neither charged with injustice nor debauchery, but only described as clothing himself in purple and fine linen, jarring sumptuously every day, and receiving these as his good things, on which he placed his heart; did notwithstanding after death lift up his eyes in torment, and petitioned in vain for a mitigation of his sentence (Luke, xvi. 19—31.) an undeniably just one upon all those who trust in uncertain riches, or any thing they can procure with them, instead of the living God, who giveth us all things richly to enjoy. But this part of the text must be reserved for the subject of another discourse. I would only observe further at present, that our blessed Lord hath cautioned us no less against the cares than the pleasures of this life; and that his reason to avoid overcharging our hearts with either, is the most forcible that can be; lest that day come upon you unawares. (Luke, xxi. 34.) Riches and greatness no one thinks can secure him from death; but they can make many forget it as absolutely as if they did think so; and please themselves with the imagination, that they have much good laid up for many years, till, when they apprehend it least, their soul is required of them. (Luke, xii. 19, 20.) Therefore we should often call to mind the Psalmist's admonition: They that trust in their wealth, and boast themselves in the multitude of their riches, none of them can redeem his brother, nor give God a ransom for himself, that he should live for ever, and not see corruption: when he dieth, he shall carry nothing away; his glory shall not descend after him. Man that is in honour, and understandeth not, is like the beasts that perish (Psal. xlix. 6, 7. 9. 17. 20.) like them in this world; but will wish in vain to be like them in the next, when all that have lived unmindful of God, the kings of the earth (as St. John foretells), and the great, and the rich, and the mighty, shall hide themselves in the dens, and in the rocks of the mountains; and shall say to the mountains and the rocks, Fall on us, and hide us from the face of him that sitteth on the throne, and from the face of the Lamb; for the great day of his wrath is come, and who shall be able to stand? (Rev. vi. 15, 16, 17.)

By Archbishop SECKER.

1 TIM. vi. 17, 18.

Charge them that are rich in this world, that they be not high-minded, nor trust in uncertain riches, but in the living God, who giveth us richly all things to enjoy; that they do good, that they be rich in good works; ready to distribute, willing to communicate.

I HAVE already, in two discourses on these words, explained and enforced the two cautions, which St. Paul requires that the ministers of God's word shall give to persons of wealth and rank, against the sins, to which they are peculiarly liable. And now I proceed to the duties of which he enjoins they shall be peculiarly reminded.

I. The first is, to trust in the living God, who giveth us all things richly to enjoy.

After warning them against placing their happiness in the pre-eminences, the possessions or pleasures of this world, it was very natural to direct them where they should place it: for somewhere we must. And his precept carries the proof of its own fitness along with it. For the living God must have the greatest power to reward our trust, and he who giveth us all things richly to enjoy, hath shown himself to have the greatest will also. All that we are, and have, and can hope for, proceeds from him, and depends upon him. Since therefore he hath made us capable of knowing this; duty, gratitude, and interest, conspire to demand, that we devote our whole being to him; use what he hath bestowed on us agreeably to the rules, which he hath prescribed, and for the attainment of the ends, which he hath in view; nor ever be so absurdly attentive to his gifts, as to forget the giver; whose bounty, the more largely we taste of it, ought surely to inspire the warmer love. And therefore the rich and great, on whom Providence hath conferred so many distinguished benefits and privileges, (of the value of which they seem in general highly sensible), are bound, beyond others, to a most affectionate piety in return : and yet, is it not on the whole visibly true, that these of all others express the least piety in the whole compass of their behaviour ?

Too many of them scorn to observe or acknowledge any rule of conduct at all, unless it be fashion, worldly advantage, or pleasure. A great part of those who will own, and occasionally seem zealous for the obligations of virtue, or however of some virtues, manifest very little sense, if any, of the duties of religion. Some have never had the condescension, or imagine they never had the leisure, once to think of it : others have heard objections against it, or at least have heard there are such ; which, to prove themselves no bigots, they resolve to believe are unanswerable, without further inquiry. And not a few, who are fully persuaded, after a sort, both of the greatness and the goodness of God, still are as absolutely negligent of him, as if no regard whatever were due to him for either. Yet, if we are to reverence authority, and love mercy, and believe in veracity, and be sorry for offences, amongst men ; why are not all these things unspeakably more necessary in relation to our Creator ? Some persons, it may be, when they are pressed upon the subject, will plead, that they are by no means without inward regard to God ; though they cannot say, they give much outward demonstration of it, in acts of worship. But how real, how deep, how practical, this regard is, they would do well to ask their hearts very carefully : for he that sees their hearts knows with certainty : they that see only their lives, can form a strong presumption : and no one will ever be a gainer, by attempting to deceive either God, or man, or himself.

But supposing them sincere, what reason can there be, why respect to God should not be paid outwardly, when respect to every superior besides is ? For surely his knowing we have it, is no sufficient reason for omitting to express it : since visible and stated acts of homage to him appear notwithstanding, both from reason and experience, highly requisite, to preserve and strengthen a sense of religion in our own minds, and to spread it in the world. Or could we have doubted of this otherwise ; yet, when he hath expressly required himself to be worshipped, both in public and in private, what pretence have we to a shadow of piety, if we either disobey or think meanly of that command ? And they among the great, who neglect to honour God, discern very clearly the necessity, not only of their inferiors paying honour to them, but of their paying honour to persons that are a little above them : and would think the excuses extremely frivolous in their own cases, which they are determined, shall be good and valid in his. What can this inconsistency mean ? Surely they do not think it beneath them, to fall down and kneel before the Lord their Maker (Psal. xcv. 6.), while they can bow so very low to a fellow creature, perhaps a worthless one. And yet really, the manner, in which they sometimes speak of religion, looks a good deal this way. I mean, when they own its importance to keep the vulgar in order, and their obligation to attend on its exercises conscientiously, for that purpose ; but intimate, that some how or other they themselves are exempted. Now the difference in the eyes of God, between the highest and lowest of men, is as nothing ; and if any part of the world hath need to be restrained by the ties of religious duty ; the upper part, being the least subject to other restraints, hath the greatest need : nor can it be more their interest, that the rest of mankind should have a sense of piety kept up amongst them : than it is the interest of the rest of mankind, that the great should. But if this were otherwise, they may depend upon it, that if they will slight religion ; such as see them do so, will not be influenced by them, to respect it. And therefore all the choice they have is, either to show some regard to its precepts themselves ; or to be content, that their families, their dependants, and the world about them, shall have none. This latter is the resolution that many seem to have taken : what will follow from it hath been already felt too much ; and if they go on, will be felt continually more. But God grant they may rather see, before it be too late, both the wickedness and the folly of throwing off that reverence, which is so justly due to him, whose laws are, every one of them, provisions for our temporal happiness in this world, as well as our eternal felicity in the next. Men of rank and fortune have a much greater concern in the welfare of society than others, and therefore are more bound in point of prudence to support religion: they have a much greater ability of doing it, and are particularly intrusted with it, and therefore are more bound in point of conscience. But what completes their obligation, in both respects, is, that if they neglect it, the endeavours of others will, humanly speaking be all in vain. There may be some hope, even for a wicked nation, while the fear of God remains in any considerable number of the wealthy and ruling part of it; but when they once come to be thoroughly corrupted, then every thing is ripe for ruin. And therefore the prophet Jeremiah, after complaining very pathetically of the sinfulness and impiety of the bulk of his countrymen, still thought there was one resource left. But when he found that those of high condition were as bad, or worse, than the rest, he immediately gives up all, and pronounces their destruction: I said, (speaking of the common people), these are poor, they are foolish; they know not the way of the Lord, and the judgement of their God. I will get me unto the great men, and will speak unto them: for they have known the way of the Lord, and the judgement of their God. But these have altogether broken the yoke, and burst the bonds. Wherefore a lion out of the forests shall tear them, and a wolf of the evening shall spoil them; a leopard shall watch over their cities; because their transgressions are many, and their backslidings are increased. (Jer. v. 4—6.)

But it is possible for us to keep up a sufficient profession of religion, to secure both public order and domestic tranquillity; yet by no means have a sufficient sense of it, for obtaining eternal life: and what will the former avail us without the latter? It is not a merely prudential and political piety; it is not one, that will only form our behaviour into an outward regularity, or affect our hearts transiently now and then, that will stand us in stead hereafter: it must be a fixed inward principle, that moves us effectually to look beyond every thing in this world, to God the fountain of all good; and to take him for our hope and our portion in the land of the living. (Psal. cxlij. 6.) He offers himself for such, and surely we ought to accept the offer. He is able to make us happy, and nothing else is: whatever earthly good we have most pleasure in, quickly fails: or if it did not, in a few years life itself will fail: and what is our hope, when God taketh away our soul? In that awful hour, if we have not him to trust in we shall have nothing; and the foundation must be laid now, if we would build upon it then. But honours, riches, and pleasures unaccountably turn away men's attention from these obvious truths, and present them with such temptations, to trust in themselves and the external advantages of their condition, for all the happiness they need; that they cannot be admonished too often, to trust only in the living God; and that only in such a manner as he hath declared they safely may.

Some have a bold and irreverent confidence, that all is well with them in respect to the divine favour, on no other ground than that they are guilty of only such faults, as the generality of the world are: as if God would not dare to punish a majority; and men might be as wicked as they would provided there were but enough of them so. But over and above this, persons of rank seem extremely apt to think, that they shall be treated with peculiar indulgence: whereas indeed, since much hath been given them, much will be required of them (Luke, xii. 48.); and in comparison, Mercy will soon pardon the meanest, but the mighty shall be mightily tormented. (Wisd. vi. 6.) Others acknowledge the necessity of a virtuous life for all men, but indulgently presume their own to have been so, which in strictness hath been far otherwise; and then trusting in themselves that they are righteous, (Luke, xviii. 9.), imagine God their debtor. Or if they do confess they have been faulty; repentance and amendment, (which they apprehend to be sufficiently in their own power at any time), they conceive, immediately blots out all, and gives them a claim of right to pardon and reward.

Now, on the contrary, reason itself shows, that forgiveness is an act of mere voluntary mercy; and that nothing is due from justice, even to a creature perfectly obedient, but that his being be not made, on the whole, worse than not being. To this, experience adds, that our best obedience is very imperfect: and agreeably to both, the gospel teaches, that by the deeds of the law shall no flesh be justified; for all have sinned and come, short of the glory of God: that we are justified freely by his grace, through the redemption that is in Jesus Christ, whom God hath set forth to be a propitiation, through faith in his blood; that he might be just, and the justifier of him which believeth in Jesus. (Rom. iii. 20—26.) It teaches also, that we are not sufficient of ourselves, even to think any thing; but our sufficiency is of God. (2 Cor. iii. 5.) That by his grace we are what we are; and when we perform good works, it is not we, but the grace of God which is with us (1 Cor. xv. 10.); and proceeds from his holy Spirit, whom he will give to them that ask him. (Luke, xi. 13.)

A doctrine, which so entirely excludes boasting (Rom. iii. 27.), must be very disagreeable to human pride in general: but especially mortifying to those, whom the flattery of the world, and of their own hearts, hath accustomed to consider themselves in a light, extremely different from that of miserable sinners. For this reason, amongst others, in the early ages not many mighty, not many noble, were called (1 Cor. i. 26.) effectually: and down to the present, worldly greatness hath ever been a powerful obstacle to christian humility, in faith, as well as practice. What our Saviour said to the Jews: How can ye believe, which receive honour one of another, and seek not the honour, which cometh from God only. (John v. 44.), holds but too true concerning the upper part of those who call themselves his disciples. They therefore should apply with peculiar care, to become such indeed, by looking into their own breasts, and considering well their need of the divine mercy: casting down imaginations, and every high thing, that exalteth itself against the knowledge of God, and bringing into captivity every thought to the obedience of Christ. (2 Cor. x. 5.) Trusting in ourselves, can afford us only a false peace for a time, which will ruin us at last; but whose putteth his trust in the Lord, mercy embraceth him on every side. (Ps. xxxii. 10.) He hath a covenant-right to pardon and comfort, assistance in all good, protection from all evil, and everlasting life to crown the whole.

But then to make his title sure, he must exert his trust in all circumstances, and walk by faith, not by sight. (2 Cor. v. 7.) Even good persons are strangely apt to lay much too great a stress on worldly advantages. Hence it is, that they desire them so earnestly, and delight in them so highly; without considering, that God and a good conscience, can make us far happier, without them, than others are with them. Were we but convinced of this, we should feel, with what justice the Psalmist pours contempt on the vehement pursuers of what this earth hath to give. There be many that say, who will shew us any good? but, Lord lift thou up the light of thy countenance upon us. Thou hast put gladness in my heart, more than in the time that their corn and their wine increased. I will lay me down in peace; and take my rest: for it is thou, Lord, only that makest me dwell in safety. (Ps. iv. 6—9.) For want of reflecting on whom we depend, we are apt to be elated in our prosperity, and say, we shall never be moved; when indeed it is the Lord of his goodness that hath made our hill so strong; and the moment he turns his face from us, we shall be troubled. (Ps. xxx. 6, 7.) From the same cause we are apt to be dejected when afflictions befall us, or dangers threaten us; forgetting, that though great and many are the troubles of the righteous, the Lord delivereth him out of them all (Psalm. xxxiv. 19.) in this world, if it be expedient for him; if not, he shall be supported under them, and they shall increase his reward in the next. But the wicked God shall destroy for ever, and root them out of the land of the living: the righteous also shall see it and fear, and say with awful approbation of the divine justice, Lo this is the man that took not God for his strength, but trusted unto the multitude of his riches, and strengthened himself in his wickedness. (Ps. li. 6, 7, 8.)

We should all therefore learn to live more to our Maker; to imprint on our hearts, and exert in our whole behaviour, a stronger sense of his present providence, and future rewards. It would be a direction, a security, an improvement, a comfort to us, beyond expression. But especially they, who have the greatest number of interesting and pleasing objects in this world to fix their thoughts upon; they, who may seem to have the least need of looking further, have indeed the greatest, to be frequently charged, as the Jews were by Moses; beware lest when thou hast eaten and art full, and hast built goodly houses and dwelt therein; and when thy silver and thy gold is increased, and all thou hast is multiplied, then thine heart be lifted up, and thou forget the Lord thy God. (Deut. viii. 11—14.) Now if those persons forget him, who have the most reason to remember him, thankfully, it is double guilt, and indeed proportionable folly. For what can be more obvious, than that considering all our good things, as the marks of his kindness to us, must unspeakably inance their value; nor can it lay us under any other than beneficial restraints in the use of them. Then besides, how naturally doth this consideration lead us forward to the yet more delightful one, of that sweet security, in which we may live here under the superintendency of so gracious a being: and of those infinitely better things, which he hath yet in store for us hereafter. This God is our God for ever and ever. He shall be our guide unto death, (Ps. xlviii. 14.) Thou shalt guide me with thy counsel, and after that receive me with glory. Whom have I in heaven but thee? and there is none upon earth, that I desire in comparison of thee. My flesh and my heart faileth, but God is the strength of my heart and my portion for ever. (Ps. lxxiii. 23, 24, 25.)

There is nothing enthusiastic, nothing extravagant, in such reflections and feelings as these, when they are grounded on good evidence of our title to God's favour; and in that case we cannot act a more pious or more rational part, than to indulge or enjoy them. Only we must not dwell upon contemplation so as to forget action; but, as the Psalmist directs, trust in the Lord, and be doing good. (Ps. xaxvii. 3.) Agreeably to which rule,

2. The second duty prescribed in the text, as peculiarly necessary for the rich and great, is, that they do good, that they be rich in good works. Extensive and important as this duty is, its nature is so well understood, and the motives for practising it so obvious, as to make it unnecessary for me to enlarge particularly upon it. And indeed if men of rank and fortune observe duly the preceding part of the Apostle's charge, they will easily be induced to observe the concluding one. If they are neither so high-minded as to neglect, and despise their fellow-creatures; nor so selfish as to trust in uncertain riches, in the acquisition, the possession, or voluptuous enjoyment of them, for their happiness, but expect it only from their acceptance with the living God; they will naturally imitate him whom they desire to please, particularly in his beneficence, the most amiable of all his perfections. And it is not by their wealth only that they are able and therefore called to do good, but by their whole behaviour, by the example of their piety and justice, their abstinence from criminal and imprudent pleasures; by an active, yet mild, public spirit, and an honourable disinterestedness in private life, united with a decent frugality; by attention to the interests, present and future, of their families, their friends and dependants; conducted in such manner, as always to be consistent with a general care, to encourage and recommend worthy persons and actions, and treat the unworthy with the disapprobation and contempt which they deserve. These are methods, by which those of rank and influence may do much greater service to mankind than large liberalities would do; and by a contrary behaviour, in any one of the above-mentioned instances, they may easily be authors of more mischief than their whole estates would compensate for. Now the Apostle hath determined, that though they bestow all their goods to feed the poor, yet if they have not the charity to act in other respects as they ought, it will profit them nothing. (1 Cor. xiii. 3.)

But still, though almsgiving is by no means the whole of beneficence, yet it is an essential part in those whom God hath qualified for it. And he hath given them all things richly and in plenty, not merely for themselves to enjoy, in the vulgar sense, but that others may enjoy a due share of them, and they the pleasure of imparting it; the worthiest and highest enjoyment of wealth that can be. This therefore is the purpose for which we should remember we are intrusted with it, and be bountiful in proportion to the trust; for to with-hold but part of what is due, knowingly, is the same kind, though not the same degree of unfaithfulness, as to with-hold the whole. Indeed how much exactly is due, God hath no where determined; nor could there; in the midst of so great a variety of circumstances, have been given particular rules, fitted to every case: nor hath any pious mind, that endeavours to judge and act as rightly as it can, the least reason to be anxious for want of a more precise knowledge, where it is not to be had. But in general, that both our charity and our generosity should bear some decent and liberal proportion to our abilities, and the rich in this world be rich in good works also, not only the text enjoins, but common reason dictates; and if we are deficient, the poor widow with her two mites (Mark xii. 40.), will far outdo us in that very virtue, by the practice of which our Maker justly expects we should appear distinguished.

Nor is it sufficient for the rich to give plentifully, but they must do it, on every fit occasion, speedily; be ready to distribute, and not stay till the circumstances of the poor are beyond recovery, or their spirits broken under the weight of their misfortunes, but make haste to help them, and, as far as possible, prevent distress. Say not unto thy neighbour, Go, and come again, and to-morrow I will give, when thou hast it by thee (Prov. iii. 28.) and delay not to shew him mercy. (Ec-clus. xxix. 8.) Nor is it enough to be outwardly expeditious, but we must be inwardly willing to communicate; not part with our benefactions grudgingly and of necessity, as obeying the divine command merely because we dare not disobey it: for God loveth a cheerful giver. (2 Cor. ix. 7.) To the poor indeed it is all one from what principle we give, but to us the difference is infinite. In the heart lies all the value. Ever so little will be accepted of heaven, if it proceed from a mind that would gladly have done more; and ever so much will be despised, if we secretly wish we could have saved it. St. Paul's exhortation therefore is of unspeakable importance; He that sheweth mercy let him do it with cheerfulness. (Rom. xii. 8.) And indeed, what can we have more cause to rejoice in doing? It is very comfortable to think that we are able; it is delightful to think, that by our means the miseries of God's creation are lessened; it is no small satisfaction to be loved and blessed in this world, but it is the greatest possible to lay up in store for ourselves a good foundation against the next, that we may lay hold on eternal life (1 Tim. vi. 19.) and have it said to us by our Judge at the last day, well done, good and faithful servant; thou hast been faithful over a few things, I will make thee ruler over many things; enter thou into the joy of thy Lord. (Matt. xxv. 21.)

MATT. xi. 5.

—And the poor have the gospel preached to them.

THESE words are part of our Saviour's answer to the disciples of John the Baptist, who came to inquire, whether Jesus were himself the Messiah, or only a prophet commissioned to foretell his coming. For it appears from the first chapter of St. John's gospel, that many of the Jews expected, besides Elias, another prophet to precede or accompany their great Deliverer; mistaking perhaps the prophet described, Deut. xviii. for an attendant of the Messiah, instead of the Messiah himself, whom they were apt to consider only in the character of a king. And as Jesus had now manifested himself some time to the world, without taking this character upon him, it was natural enough for John's disciples to imagine, that perhaps he came in the other only. John himself indeed knew, and probably had told them the contrary; but finding them still desirous of further satisfaction, was extremely willing they should have it: and to make the inquiry as easy to them as possible, directs them to propose the question, not in their own name, but in his. On their doing it, Jesus performs in their sight a considerable number of his usual beneficent miracles, joined as it should seem, with suitable instructions; and then, without declaring himself expressly, (which he chose, for wise and kind reasons, to avoid before the multitude), dismisses them with an answer, taken, the greatest part of it, out of the words of Isaiah; in which he had foretold, that the Messiah should perform just such miracles, and give just such instructions. For we read, that in that same hour he cured many of their infirmities and plagues, and unto many that were blind he gave sight. (Luke, vii. 21.) Then he answered and said unto them, Go, and shew John again those things, which ye do hear and see. The blind receive their sight, and the lame walk; the lepers are cleansed, and the deaf hear; the dead are raised up, and the poor have the gospel preached to them.

The prediction, of his applying himself peculiarly to instruct the lower part of the world, it is probable, he purposefully reserved to the last place; because his doing it (besides its being the completion of a prophecy) was, though not a miracle, as the rest were, yet a singular proof, both of the humanity of his temper and doctrine, and of his disinterestedness too. For this method was incapable of doing him service, and in fact did him no small prejudice with those, who had the power of that nation in their hands! The Jewish teachers and rulers, who were the same, kept the common sort at a very great distance; and on that amongst other accounts, were highly revered by them. The familiarities therefore, to which Jesus condescended, immediately set all these against him; and furnished them with an opportunity of representing him and his disciples as equally contemptible. Thus, when their own officers, (whom it seems his discourses had struck as powerfully as they did the rest of the multitude) could not help applauding him before their faces, Nec ex man spake like this man; their answer is, Have any of the rulers, or the pharisees, believed on him? This people, which knoweth not the law, are cursed. (John, vii. 45—49.) But indeed the humble and unbiassed minds of the illiterate are much better judges of truth, when proposed to them, than such as are blinded with learned prejudice, worldly interest, or sensual pleasures. To the former therefore principally our Saviour vouchsafed his instructions, grieving to see them scattered abroad, as sheep having no shepherd (Matth. ix. 36); and they, receiving his doctrine into honest and good hearts (Luke, viii. 15), became in great numbers his followers; and at first were almost the only ones he had. For St. Luke tells us, he lifted up his eyes on his disciples and said, blessed be ye poor, for yours is the kingdom of God. (Luke, vi. 20.) The gospel indeed makes all blessed who receive it, both by its useful precepts, and its gracious promises; yet the poor especially, as they have most need of those directions and supports in this life, and assurances of happiness in the next, which it communicates. But then, to receive them, they must be not only poor, but his disciples. It is not being in a low condition, but being virtuous and pious in that condition, that entitles persons to God's favour, as it is not being wealthy and great, but making an ill use of wealth and greatness, that provokes his displeasure. So that the happiest or the wretchedest here, may, according as they behave, be infinitely more happy or wretched hereafter. Our Saviour therefore, we find, in St. Matthew, expresses himself thus: Blessed are the poor in spirit (Math. v. 3.), they, whose dispositions are suited to their mean circumstances, reasonable and resigned, lowly and submissive.

Preaching the gospel to the poor comprehends therefore, of necessity, instructing them in the duties, as well as the comforts, belonging to their state. And as our Lord and Master did both, so should his ministers. The duties of the rich and great I have lately recounted, and pressed upon them, very freely, from this place. And now, I hope, you, that are the inferior part of the world, will patiently bear, in your turn, the same well-meaning plainness of speech that your betters have borne; and make the proper use of it, as God grant them to do. Under the general term, poor, is contained a considerable variety of degrees; each therefore should apply peculiarly to themselves the precepts that peculiarly belong to them, and take no offence at the rest. Of such as are common to all, they may all reap the benefit; and the highest may receive some admonition from what is said to the lowest; as it will contribute to regulate, not only their way of thinking and behaving to their inferiors, but their temper and conduct in other respects. For to be poor in spirit, a very different thing from mean-spiritedness, is incumbent on the wealthiest and the noblest.

1. The first duty to be enjoined you, is, contentedness in your poverty. A hard saying, you will be apt to think, when scarce any one is contented in the midst of riches and honours. But the discontent of such, you will own, is without reason. And if it can at all arise from mere humour, without any thing in fact to justify it, possibly yours may be unjustifiable too. In order to try then, whether it be or not, let us consider what ground for complaint you can allege,

That some should have greater plenty than others, is no more a hardship, than that some should have better health or understandings, or longer lives. If there could be a claim of right to any of these things, all men would have an equal claim; but as they are intirely the free gifts of God, he may certainly give them in what proportion he pleases. He hath made some order of beings, as we see with our eyes, much lower than the lowest of men; he hath made others, as we are taught in scripture, much higher than the highest of men: and doubtless he could have made them unspeakably higher than they are. If then any part of the creation may complain of mere inferiority, every part may complain without end. If any part may complain merely because it suffers something, no part, that we are acquainted with, is exempt from all suffering. And amongst other evils, why may not God permit some to feel poverty?

Indeed, without perpetual miracles, how can it be prevented? For supposing equality of circumstances were to be established at this very time, it could never subsist. One person would be industrious and prudent, and mend his affairs; another, negligent or injudicious, and ruin them. Now that each should possess for his own, what his own care and labour hath acquired, is no more than strict justice; that what each dies possessed of, should descend to his own children and relations, preferably to others, is surely but reasonable. And yet from hence will of course follow, by degrees, all the wealth and all the poverty, that we now see.

The first christians indeed at Jerusalem had all their possessions in common (Acts, ii. 44, 45. iv. 33, 35.); but this neither appears to have been their practice any where else, nor to have lasted there, nor to have been designed to last, nor to have been more than a voluntary agreement. For St. Peter tells Ananias and Sapphira, that they needed not, unless they pleased, either to have sold their land, or put any of the purchase-money into the common stock: but that pretending they had put it in all, (which entitled them to a maintenance), when indeed they had secreted a part, and how large a part we know not, was an impious fraud. (Acts, v. 1—4.) Community of goods therefore was no command then; and very soon after we find, in the New Testament, the distinction of rich and poor established and allowed every where amongst believers. Nor can the destroying of it be attempted, without the most dreadful injustice, confusions, and mischiefs in human society; nor could the attempt succeed. And even suposing every one were to agree in the scheme, who can say what would follow upon it? In all likelihood, so universal a neglect of industry, that but few of the present conveniences of life would be provided; and perhaps mankind in general would be more destitute than most of the poor are now.

If then there must be high and low in the world, why is it harder that you should be of the latter sort than that others should? Were they in your place, ought not they to be content? and if so, why ought not you now? It may be, notwithstanding the different appearances you make, the difference of your happiness is very small; or possibly you have the most. The pleasures, for which you envy the great, are usually very tasteless to them; and would be so to you very soon, if you were in their place. Then, amidst all that they seem to enjoy, you little know what many of them suffer, and how much of it they suffer from being in the station they are. You will say indeed, that the inconveniences you feel you cannot avoid; whereas, if they feel any, it is their own fault. But, in truth, there are disquiets, belonging to their rank, from which yours is exempt. Or allowing it to be their own fault, what follows? Why that your sufferings proceeding from God's providence, if you behave well under them, you will be rewarded for them; and theirs, proceeding from their own wrong conduct, without repentance, they will be punished for them over and above. And who can tell, but were you in the same situation, you might fall into the same faults? Power and rank, and leisure and plenty may indeed be used to excellent purposes; but prove commonly, in fact, such strong temptations to the worst of sins, that a station less exposed to danger, and which obliges you in several respects to behave only as all persons ought to behave, may be the greatest worldly blessing you could have had; even though it were accompanied with much more grievous outward disadvantages than it is. But indeed some of those disadvantages consist in mere opinion and fancy. You are miserable, because you think yourself poor; at the same time there are those, who if they were but in your condition, would be happy, for they would think themselves rich. And the very persons, whom you envy, because they are above you, it may be are pitying themselves all the while, because others are above them. This, you see, is only fancy and folly on both sides.

But as to more real inconveniences. Just in the same manner, that custom makes a life of pleasure insipid to the great; it makes a life of labour and hardship tolerable and comfortable to their inferiors: unless they set their own minds to make it otherwise. Indeed when persons are reduced, from ease and affluence, to take pains and feel straits; this is a burden much heavier. But even then, reason and time, and especially religion, will teach you to support it very well. If it proceed from your own fault; you have little cause to repine, and an useful admonition to learn more wisdom. If from God's disposal of things, his justice and goodness will, sooner or later, amply recompense you for it; and all his servants will have compassion on you, and help you, in the mean while. The exhortation therefore is very reasonable: Fear not, my son, that we are made poor; for thou hast much wealth, if thou fear God, and depart from all sin, and do that which is pleasing in his sight. (Tob. iv. 21.) Whatever is brought upon thee take cheerfully; and be patient, when thou art changed to a low estate. (Eccclus. ii. 4.) But such as are born to that estate, may, for the most part be very happy in it, if they will. And so many of them are visibly fully as happy as the rest of the world; that the defect must lie in their temper, not their circumstances, if others are unhappy. When indeed any uncommon difficulties befall them: when they have numerous families, and perhaps little employment:

or when old age disables them from working; or sickness calls for relief, which they have not the means of procuring; then their case is very grievous; and all, who know it, should be tenderly affected, and assist them plentifully. But even at such times of distress, they should recollect, that their superiors are by no means entirely free from the same uneasinesses. Persons of considerable rank often find it hard enough to bring up and provide for a number of children decently: and when infirmities and diseases attack the wealthiest, though they may have better advice and accommodations than others, yet these things are not able to lighten the burthen near so much as they that want them imagine. And whoever hath health; which the common people that live regularly, have the most of: and a good conscience, which, all may have that will; seldom needs to be miserable on account of his circumstances. Health, said the wise son of Sirach, is above all gold: and a strong body above infinite wealth. There is no riches above a sound body: and no joy above the joy of the heart. (Ecclus. xxx. 15, 16.)

These comforts therefore you should value as they deserve: you should reflect also, that of every natural gratification, which God hath provided for man, (and all the artificial ones are trifling in comparison,) he hath provided you a good share. You can behold the light of the sun, breathe the freshness of the air, enjoy the beauties of the seasons, relish your food, and be refreshed by your sleep, as well as the greatest monarchs on earth. The higher and social pleasures too, of kind affections, real friendships, frank and cheerful conversations, are as much within your reach, as they can be within any one's if not more. And if your rank be not an honourable, it is however a necessary one: and proper care, to do the business of it skilfully and diligently, will and must, and you cannot but be sensible does, make you regarded and sought after by your betters. On the whole therefore, even the poor have sufficient cause, not only to be content, but thankful to heaven, for its goodness to them.

Still the straits and hardships of some of them, though God's help makes the worst supportable, may leave them small reason to be fond of life. But so may the pains and sorrows of the wealthiest. And even this situation affords you one advantage, that you will have less inducement to regret the approach of death; may detach your affections without reluctance from a world, the enjoyments of which are sadly embittered to others by the thoughts of leaving it; and comfort yourselves with the prospect of going to that place, where the weary be at rest, and the servant is free from his master. (Job, iii. 17, 19.) O death, how bitter is the remembrance of thee to a man that liveth at rest in his possessions, that hath prosperity in all all things! But acceptable is thy sentence to the needy, and to him that is vexed with all things. (Ecclus. xli. 1, 2.) Yet were deliverance from present evils by future endless insensibility the thing hoped for, this would be a melancholy relief. But religion sets, before us an infinitely brighter view of things: assuring us, that God hath chosen the poor of this world, rich in faith, and heirs of the kingdom, which he hath promised to them that love him. (James, ii. 5.) Here then is the strong consolation, that on however bad a footing any may be, in their temporal concerns, we are all on a level, as to our eternal interests: or, if there be any difference, it is in favour of the suffering part of mankind. Blessed are they that mourn: for they shall be comforted. (Matth. v. 4.)

But, admitting that there is by no means any ground to complain of God, the poor will all the more, that they have reason frequently to complain of their fellow-creatures, the rich and great, for shewing so little regard to them in their necessities. And far from denying this, it is our duty, who are ministers of the gospel, to plead it for them, and excite others to abound more and more in tender compassion and liberality towards them.

But then, whilst we endeavour, on all occasions, that due care may be taken of you who are poor; we must remind you not to be insensible of what is done, nor to require more than is reasonable, And here, in the first place, all the common people of this nation ought to esteem it an unspeakable blessing, that they live in a land of laws and liberty; where the meanest is protected from the oppression of the greatest, to a degree, that would be incredible in most countries. For too many countries there are, in which your small properties, your whole disposal of yourselves, and your very lives, would be subject to the will of arbitrary masters: and you would neither dare to speak a free word, nor even to worship your Maker in the way that your consciences direct you. Surely then your condition requires of you, great thankfulness, not only to God, but to your earthly superiors, who allow and preserve to you such valuable privileges; and great respect, in your manner, both of behaving towards them, and thinking of them: which is very ill shewn by murmuring against them for things that you cannot be judges of, and in all likelihood are utterly misinformed about.

But farther: the lowest part of the poor in particular, should consider, what ample provision for their wants is made here by law; such as no other nation upon earth hath established; what noble foundations, for their relief under sickness or accidents, and for the education of their children, private charity hath laid: and these things should dispose them to a better opinion, both of the comforts of their own condition, and of the goodness of those, to whom they are owing. If still you are any of you in distress, recollect, whether your own mismanagement hath not been the principal occasion of it: and lay the blame, which you ought, upon yourselves, before you lay any upon others. However, even in this case you are to be relieved; but not so liberally, as if you had deserved better. Consider too, whether even now you are not able to get or to save more than you do: and remember that no one is bound to give you, what your own diligence and frugality would supply you with, if you pleased. But supposing your want, and your merit, as great as possible; it is not every one, to whom you apply, that can do for you what you imagine. Undoubtedly the rich are often ~~hardhearted~~ hardhearted: but perhaps the poor are full as often, immoderate in their expectations, and unjust in their censures. You do not know, what sums people are able to give in charity: for, in all likelihood, you are neither well acquainted with their incomes, nor the various demands that there are upon them, of other sorts; which last may easily be greater than you can well apprehend. Besides, you do not know, what they do give in charity. That which they refuse to you, or your acquaintance, they may bestow, and perhaps much more, on others, who possibly are full as proper objects, whatever you may think. And I doubt not, but many a man is frequently cursed, for denying a trifle to a clamorous public petitioner; who hath been largely and willingly bountiful to private distresses, perhaps but the hour before; and it may be, do him more service by his prudent choice, than his liberal distribution. We ought not indeed to pass over any of the poor, from partiality or penuriousness; but give to every one that asketh (Luke, vi. 30); so far as our circumstances permit us, and the end of giving, will be served by it. But as giving to some would do harm, and we cannot give to all enough to do them good, charity itself forbids us to interpret this precept in the fulness of its liberal extent. Yet God forbid, that any should seek a pretext for relieving few or none, because many are undeserving, and they cannot relieve every one. Such a plea will not excuse them in the opinion of men here; much less in that awful judgment hereafter, when the rich and the poor shall meet together before the Lord, the maker of them all. (Prov. xxii. 2.) But as the wealthy should not contrive to evade almsgiving, so the needy should not be forward to suspect them of it; but resolve to judge nothing before the time, until the Lord come, who will make manifest the counsels of the heart. (1 Cor. iv. 5.)

One thing more, to be observed by you in favour of your condition, is, that God hath not left you to depend solely on the piety and charity of the rich; but provided, that their love of gain, their vanity, or their luxury, shall be made what they do not design them for, the means of doing some good to their inferiors, by employing them; as well as much hat

by setting them an ill example. More good might be done indeed, and all the harm avoided, would they act from the principles they ought. For as the follies and vices of one part of mankind, are far from being the proper method of maintaining the other. But however, it is a remarkable instance of the kindness of Providence, to have ordered things so, that they, who mean you little or no service, shall do you a great deal; and contribute, without thinking of it, to make your condition comfortable, while perhaps they are making themselves wretched, both in this life and that which is to come.

Upon the whole then it appears, that you have no ground of complaint against God; and much less, perhaps than you imagined, against men; that your state hath many comforts belonging to it; and usually not many necessary sufferings, beyond what others feel. But when any of you have the most, only do your duty faithfully and prudently, and you may compose your minds with a full assurance, that at length all shall end well: Your light afflictions, which are but for a moment, shall work for you an eternal weight of glory (2 Cor. iv. 17.) in the next world; and in this, as God hath enabled you to bear them hitherto, he will doubtless enable you to bear them still; nay, perhaps lighten your burthen when you least think of it. For the poor shall not always be forgotten; the patient abiding of the meek shall not perish for ever. (Psal. ix. 18.) The eye of the Lord is upon them that fear him, on them that put their trust in his mercy; to deliver their soul from death, and keep them alive in the time of famine. (Ps. xxiii. 18, 19.) Trust in the Lord, and do good; so shall thou dwell in the land, and verily thou shalt be fed. (Ps. xxxvii. 3.) Some means or other heaven will point out to you, to prevent your falling into the utmost extremities. Providence is your security: the greatest persons on earth have no better. Without a title to God's favour, no one can be happy; and with it, no one need be miserable. For, whether a man be rich, or poor; if ye have a good heart towards the Lord, he shall at all times rejoice with a cheerful countenance. (Theol. ecclus. xxvi. 4.)

MATTH. xi. 5.

—And the poor have the gospel preached to them.

ONE principal mark of true religion is its tendency to make men first good, then happy. Precepts of piety and virtue, unattended with rewards, will always be ineffectual; and promises of rewards, independent upon piety and virtue, must of necessity be false. Christianity therefore comprehends both, and proposes them equally to all mankind; requiring obedience from the greatest, as a condition of God's favour; and offering eternal felicity to the meanest, on performance of their duties. For this reason I have lately set before you the peculiar duties of the upper part of the world, and have since proceeded to those of the lower. The only one of the latter, which I have hitherto mentioned, is, that they be content with their condition; and neither murmur at all against God, who never gives them cause; nor complain of men more than they have cause; nor be dejected in their own minds; but compose and support themselves by attending to the comforts of the state they are in, as well as the inconveniences of it. With this I chose to begin, and to insist on it largely; because, when once the poor are convinced, that they may be happy, they will naturally and cheerfully endeavour to become so: for which end they must learn,

2. To be humble: a virtue closely connected with the former. For as pride is usually the origin of discontent; so discontent in return nourishes pride; till after thinking falsely their present situation too bad for them, men come by degrees to think hardly any sufficiently good. Now all may find great reason for humility, on viewing the imperfections and frailties of human nature in general, and their own in particular: but the poor have additional subjects of mortification to reflect on; they see and feel themselves inferior to most around them, dependent probably on some for their livelihood; and are excluded from the possibility of many improvements and advantages, which others enjoy; still this is no ground for dissatisfaction. For that some are in a better condition, cannot really change them into a worse. It remains, notwithstanding, just what it would be if none were better. And making comparisons only to disgust yourselves, is great folly. But making them, to learn from that inferiority in which you are placed, a suitable way of thinking and behaving, is so needful and so obvious a lesson both of wisdom and duty, that neglecting it is inexcusable.

Those minds must be grievously hardened in the wrong, that can have no impression made on them by such peculiarly strong calls to be modest and submissive. Not will this prove a less unhappy disposition, than it is a faulty one; but, in all likelihood, you will suffer more from the absurd haughtiness of your temper than all the hardships of your outward circumstances put together. Instead of esteeming or pitying you, the world will dislike and scorn you. For the son of Shiloh expresses only what every one in some measure feels, when living such, three sorts of men my soul hateth and I am greatly offended at their life, he puts down in the last place, a poor man that is proud (Leviticus xxx. 2). Pride in those, who should be the furthest from it, is extremely disgusting, even when it is humbly. But usually it leads on to insolent behaviour. Now insolence to superior may produce unspeakable mischiefs to you; but will always produce some and though it be confined to your equals or inferiors, will be the source of perpetual uneasiness as well as guilt. Yet I am afraid it is exceeding common for the lower ranks to use those, who are but a little beneath them, with such contempt and harshness as they seldom or never experience from the highest above them and would not think it tolerable, if they did. But surely then you should be willing to give the treatment, you expect to receive and seeing, as you must, how well condescension becomes your betters; think how ill assuming and overbearing becomes you. But supposing your haughtiness injurious or displeasing to no one else, it will be greatly detrimental to yourself. You have formerly been in good circumstances, perhaps as you are descended from a good family, and therefore you will not bring down your mind to your present condition. But what follows from this? Only that struggling under the yoke makes it gall you the more and you are a thousand times uneasy than you would be; whereas would you but accommodate your spirit to your station, you would soon be sensible, that with men as well as God, he that humbleth himself shall be exalted (Matt. xxiii. 12); you would enjoy, in this world, a peaceful composure of soul and in the next, that blessedness, which is reserved for the meek and lowly.

But of all sorts of pride in the poor, the strangest and most pernicious is that, which tempts not a few of them to imagine, they are of too much consequence to do any thing for their own maintenance. Indeed when they have formerly been of good rank and lived in plenty, especially when then fall from it is not owing to wilful sins or follies, it should be the endeavour of their relations and friends to provide for them, in some degree, suitably to what they once were. But if such as are especially concerned, either cannot or will not do this, there is little room to expect, that others should contribute enough towards it to be effectual. And therefore the unhappy persons whose case it is, unless Providence raised them up some unlocked for support, sink down of course to the level of the common poor: and it cannot be more the duty of the charitable to help them, than it is theirs to help themselves by any sort of honest employment, for which they are qualified. Once Heaven had placed you in a higher sphere, now it hath reduced you to a lower: the occupations of the latter are as much incumbent upon you at present, as those of the former were before, and your attention to them will be as amply rewarded by the Disposer of all things. You must support yourself, either by virtuous diligence, or by vicious courses. The latter nothing can justify; the former, in whatever way you are called to exercise it, will be no reproach, but an honour to you. And the rich and great, far from rejecting and disowning their poor kindred or acquaintance, for condescending to any useful business when necessity requires, ought to encourage and applaud them. For it is an excellent mark of a right and good mind, that they rather chuse to work with quietness, and eat their own bread (2 Thess. iii. 12.), than importune others, or lead themselves into temptation. And indeed the temptations, arising from poverty and distress, are so very dangerous to those who have lived in affluence and credit; that as soon as ever they find difficulties coming upon them (if they have any regard to a good conscience), they must immediately reduce their own expences, lower the appearance and expectations of those who depend on them, and so conduct every thing, as may least expose them to the hazard of acting amiss, and best secure them an honest subsistence. For, whatever a false honour may suggest to the contrary, Better is he that laboureth, and aboundeth in all things, than he that boasteth himself and wanteth bread. (Ecclus. x. 27.) The mention of this matter hath led me insensibly to a

3d Duty of the poor, and a very important one, that of industry; to which humility will greatly incline them, nor will contentment be at all inconsistent with it. For a principal reason why the poor may be justly contented, is, that by diligence they may go on very comfortably and their being well enough satisfied with their present situation is no manner of objection against endeavouring to better it, when opportunity offers. Every one indeed is bound to be industrious, in a way suitable to his rank, and contribute his proportion to the common good, in which he shares. Those of high degree are able to do much good singly; the poor have each of them very little separate power: but, considered as a collective body, it is on their application and labour that the wealth and strength of nations, all the conveniences and elegances of life, indeed the peace and good order of societies depend; for nothing but right employment will keep them out of wrong. These considerations make their diligence of infinite importance to the public; and there are others, besides their interest in the public, that make it of equal importance to themselves. It is true, in point of conscience, the rich are no less obliged to it than you; but in point of worldly necessity, the difference is very wide. Nor yet is it any disadvantage to you on the whole, that in this particular you cannot well avoid acting as you ought. For to how many of your superiors is it the greatest unhappiness, that their circumstances enable them to lead the lives they do!

But, in your situation, indulging idleness and its companions, can last but a very short time; and then will bring after it such dreadful consequences, of distress and reproach, and temptation to every thing bad, (extending not only to you, but to all who belong to you), that you must resolve to follow some honest employment closely. Be it ever so much against your liking at first, you will certainly come in time to be very well pleased with it; every one that hath persevered, hath found it so. And then you will spend the rest of your days in satisfaction and comfort; you will be at peace within, and respected both by your equals and your betters: if you have children, you will look upon them with delight, and they upon you with gratitude; you will make a provision against sickness and accidents; and when you come to old age, you will be able to afford yourself the rest and quiet you want, because you were willing to take pains before; whereas they, who make ease and pleasure the business of their early years, will find shame and sorrow the portion of the remainder. They wickedly neglect the appointed way of supporting themselves; and such as do, will commonly have bitter experience of what it is to crave support from the bounty of others. The life of him, that dependeth on another man's table, saith the son of Sirach, is not to be counted for a life—Begging is sweet in the mouth of the shameful, but in his belly there shall burn a fire. (Ecclus. xl. 29, 30.) Sayings of this nature are not in the least designed against persons, whom Providence had rendered incapable of supplying their own necessities. They have nothing to be ashamed of, but ought to be assisted with tenderness and respect. God hath sent them to us to receive at our hands what is their due; and whoso mocketh such poor, Solomon hath declared, reproacheth their Me-

ker. (Prov. xvii. 5.) But those who would not be industrious when they could, deserve but little relief afterwards; unless deep repentance entitle them to a better share; and they that will not now when they can, deserve none at all. It was Paul's repeated command to the Thessalonians, that if any one would not work, neither should he eat. (2 Thess. iii. 10.) And we should not observe this command, both in the disposal of our own charity, and that of any other with which we are intrusted, either by private benefactors, or by the laws of the land. Overseers of the poor are intrusted by the latter; intrusted to act with humanity and compassion indeed, but with prudence and frugality at the same time. All therefore who in their turns come to serve that office, I hope consider very seriously, that the poor, who are fit for employment, ought, as far as possible, to find it for themselves, or have it found for them; and that when either of these things can at all be done, maintaining them in idleness is only teaching them to be useless and wicked. Indeed the poor themselves should consider, that contriving to live upon alms, when they are able, wholly or in part, to live upon the produce of their own labour, is injuring the community: by doing nothing to promote its welfare; injuring all who contribute to their support, by laying a needless burthen upon them; injuring the rest of the poor, by keeping from them what else they would receive in great plenty. For no one can bestow so much on proper objects, who is misled to bestow on improper ones too. And the frequency of such impositions makes many unwilling to give what else they would; and furnishes others with a specious pretence for withholding what else, with any decency, they could not. Therefore industry, besides its being an indispensable duty of the poor, in itself, is necessary to their practising a further duty, to which I proceed in the 4th place; That is honesty. For to beg, instead of working, is one sort of dishonesty. To undertake any work for another, and not do it diligently, is a second sort; often a very provoking, sometimes a very mischievous one. Yet there is a third still grosser, to which idleness

tempts us; but too powerfully, mentioned in Agur's wise prayer, let the poor and stout. (Prov. xxx. 9.) Now stealth, open or secret, how commonly it ever it be committed, is much too plainly a sin to be in general defended; and therefore I need not prove to you the unlawfulness of it. But there are two cases notwithstanding, in which some of the poor seem to think it scarce any fault at all. When either a very small matter is taken away, or it is from a very rich person, which makes it small to him. But every one hath the same right to the least part of his property that he hath to the greatest. And let any one be ever so wealthy, his wealth is his own; and though unquestionably he ought to give of it to the poor, yet they have no manner of authority to take it without his consent. If they had, it is easy to see into what universal confusion the exercise of that authority would bring the world. But farther: small misdeemeanours of this kind occasion great disquiet; men apprehend themselves unsafe in all about them; know not whom to trust; and the innocent are often suspected and sufferers, for what the guilty thus do. Besides, almost all offenders begin with little faults; and from these they venture gradually on, to worse and worse, till they come to make no scruple of the most capital crimes, and perhaps fall under the sentence due to them. Always remember therefore to beware even of small sins; and carefully observe one rule more, that when any thing is committed to your trust, being dishonest in that, and disposing of any part of it in a manner, which you know you ought not, and are not allowed, is one of the basest kinds of stealing. Wastefulness also, and even mere negligence, approach to the same sin; for by both you injuriously diminish what is not your own. But the most active cause of dishonesty in the poor is, that finding a great deal of time and pains requisite to get but a small matter, they are strongly tempted to shorten their trouble by unfair methods. And possibly you may thus gain some advantages for a while; but very possibly also you may fail, and be discovered and punished even for your first attempt; or if not, every new attempt will expose you anew to the same danger; and it is not one in great numbers that escapes long.

Besides the continual consciousness of your guilt, and fear of being found out and hated and scorned ever after, will be a continual torment to you; nay, if you are only suspected, and cannot fully confute the suspicion, which a guilty person can never do, this alone, in all probability, may be enough to ruin you. For the livelihood of the poor depends almost entirely on their character, and their character chiefly consists in their honesty. That will make amends for considerable defects in other points, but nothing will make amends for want of that. Or could you escape every evil that you justly fear through this whole life, yet remember another is to follow it very soon, in which you must account for all your deeds. And he who hath commanded, that no man defraudor go beyond his brother in any matter, hath declared at the same time, that the Lord is the avenger of all such. (1 Thess. iv. 6.)

A further virtue, which the poor are greatly concerned to practise, much more carefully than many of them do, is that of speaking truth. But this is so near akin to behaving honestly, the reasons for both are so much the same, and they that do nothing amiss have so little temptation to say any thing false, that I shall pass it over at present. The 5th Duty therefore of the poor, which I shall insist on, is that of frugality; without which your honesty will never be secure, and the fruits of your industry will be very foolishly thrown away. Indeed to deny yourselves what you can well afford, and really want, would be cruel and unnatural; suffering the worst inconveniences of poverty without need. But to make your straight circumstances yet straighter, for the sake of idle gratifications, and distress yourselves in necessities, only to indulge in trifles and vanities, delicate food, shewish dress, ensnaring diversions, is every way wrong. You will be hankering after more and more pleasures and amusements, till they quite beggar you; your superiors all the while, whom you affect to imitate, will despise you; your equals will hate and censure you; and your children, for whom at this rate you will provide nothing but a bad example, will have cause, I had almost said, to curse you; whereas, by avoiding unnecessary expences, you will preserve the fruits of your labour intact; be able to make good use of advantages; to stand your ground under losses and disappointments, for they must be expected; to lay up for themselves, if you prove to have occasion; if not, for those that come after you; nay, to give alms out of your little, and exchange it for treasures in heaven. Saving is very different from being covetous; it is the surest foundation for being bountiful. And even the poor should extend bounty to any that are still poorer, whenever they can really spare it. Nature and reason call upon them to do so; agreeably to which the Apostle requires men to work with their own hands, that they may have to give to him that needeth. (Eph. iv. 28.) And as our Saviour hath taught us (Mark, xii. 42), that our charity shall be estimated in proportion to our abilities, the lowest have as much encouragement as the highest to do even in this way, all the good they can. A

6th Virtue, closely connected with frugality, is sobriety. One should think, that they who find themselves perpetually in straits, could have little temptation to be guilty of excesses. But uneasiness at their condition drives some, a false notion of recruiting their spirits invites others, and unmeaning custom seduces yet more, into that destructive vice of drinking; which, after soothing you perhaps with a short-lived gaiety and forgetfulness of sorrow, will greatly augment the dejection of your minds, as well as the difficulties of your affairs; and thus force you almost to a repetition of the same remedy, which will be followed of course by an increase of the same evils, till your fortunes and health are both completely ruined. Your morals too, for the most part, by indulgence in this one respect, will be gradually corrupted in every other, even if you do escape those desperate sallies of wickedness which prove more speedily fatal. Your families at the same time, if you have any, will be abandoned to wretchedness; your children perhaps murdered in their infancy, by giving them the same liquors with which you are more leisurely destroying yourselves; or if they do survive, are pretty sure to inherit, from such parents, nothing but bad habits of body and mind. If therefore you have any sense, either of prudence or humanity, you will surely avoid this treacherous sin; which pernicious arts, and mistaken policy, have placed but too much within the reach of the lowest of the poor: or if you have fallen into it, you will renounce it instantly, and resolutely bear the uneasiness which abstaining from it may give you for a while, (for you will certainly overcome it by perseverance), rather than plunge forwards to your utter undoing here and hereafter. A

7th Duty of the poor, which must be mentioned, is that of chastity; a duty, indeed, of all persons; but so far peculiarly incumbent on them, as the transgression of it brings them to more immediate ruin. In one sex it is followed by total loss of honest employment and reputation; by contempt and scorn, even from the men that have seduced them; by grievous temptations to destroy the fruits of their criminal pleasures, and to become abandoned to common prostitution, and with it to every sin, the consequence of which will be every misery of human life. In the other sex it is almost always accompanied with breach of solemn promises; with shocking hardness of heart, where the utmost affection hath been professed; with heavy expences, that often lead to the grossest dishonesty. And both sexes, in common, it exposes to loathsome and fatal diseases, and to a dreadful sentence of future condemnation; for they, which do such things, the scripture hath declared, shall not inherit the kingdom of God. (Gal. v. 21) Beware then of a sin so peculiarly dangerous; and for that purpose beware of every indiscretion that may entice you to it. I now proceed, in the

8th Place, to another duty of the poor, which one should think might sufficiently recommend itself, good temper amongst each other. This is necessary in every rank, in order to have any real enjoyment of life; and the more necessary in yours, as you have the fewer enjoyments of other sorts. If you receive harsh treatment from those above you, that perhaps you cannot help; but there is no manner of need of your giving it amongst yourselves. You have felt probably what bitter things injurious language and insolent behaviour are; why then will you make use of them? You know by experience the need of tenderness and pity, why will you not shew it to those who have equal need? You and they are fellow-sufferers in the world; surely that should unite you in mutual kindness, not provoke you to increase your evils, by being hard upon one another. And yet, I fear, some of the greatest hardships, both in word and deed, which the lower part of mankind undergo, proceed from persons who are of low rank themselves. And how far they are capable of carrying such outrages, and how sad the effects of them are, Solomon hath expressed by a very strong comparison: A poor man, that oppresseth the poor, is like a sweeping rain, which leaveth no food. (Prov. xxviii. 3.) I have only a

9th, And last duty to recommend, but one peculiarly implied in preaching the gospel to you, a serious and deep reverence for religion. Religion is intended, not only for the direction, but the comfort of all degrees of men; and all have need enough of it, but you the most by far. Others have honours, or pleasures, or wealth, elegant amusements, or curious inquiries, to engage their thoughts; and find some kind of satisfaction in these things, such as it is, and so long as it lasts. But you have nothing, that even seems considerable, to sweeten this world to you, but the expectation of a better. And well may it be for you, that you are reduced to that, as your only choice, which beyond comparison would be your best, if you had ever such plenty. Seek your consolation therefore in what is abundantly capable of giving it you; make the precepts of the gospel your business, and its promises your joy. Christianity is peculiarly formed for your benefit. Its laws are your charter, by which you claim a right to pity and love from your superiors, as members of the same body; and we, its ministers, are your advocates to plead your cause with them; authorized to offer them eternal happiness, for being kind to you; to denounce condemnation against them, if they use you in any one respect, cruelly; and to assure you, at the same time, that the worst treatment they can give you shall turn to your good. Think then how justly St. James hath declared the poor in this world rich in faith (James, ii. 5.); and let the rich and great, if they will, be profane and vicious, and take the consequences; but let no man beguile you of your reward (Col. ii. 18.), either by corrupting your principles, or misleading your practice. Religion hath graciously provided for you the repose and comfort of this sacred day, which else you had never known. Make it not a time of acting contrary to religion, but steadily use the opportunities it gives you, of learning and being reminded of your several duties, which you must be sensible you need; of having the honour to join on equal terms with the highest of your fellow-creatures, in presenting petitions and praises to God in his house, and feeding at his holy table. The remainder of the Sabbath employ, partly in considering your ways (Hag. i. 5. 7.), and improving your hearts, by reading, meditation, and prayer, in private partly in a cheerful but harmless and prudent, social enjoyment of the leisure which heaven hath allowed you. When the days of labour return, recommend yourselves every morning to the blessing of the Almighty, return him thanks every night for his protection, and offer up to him in your hearts, the work of each day, as done in obedience to his will, and in hopes of his reward; for these things you will find a support and refreshment beyond all belief. In your whole communication learn both to avoid and abhor that monstrous custom of oaths and curses, which are intermixed continually in the common discourse of too many of the poor; with great irreverence towards God, who hath expressly forbidden them; to the great horror and grief of all good persons; with great danger of running into frequent perjuries, and all manner of profaneness; and without any pretence of profit or pleasure, to make the least amends for so much sin. I cannot and need not, go through the other obligations of religion at present. Your attendance here, your bibles and other good books at home, will sufficiently inform you of the nature and importance of them: and I beg you not to imagine, that because you are each of you singly of little consequence in the world, God will take little notice of your conduct; but think and act like the Psalmist, I am small, and of no reputation, yet do I not forget thy commandments. (Psal. cxix. 141.) There is nothing beneath God's attention, ~~any~~ more than above it. The meanest things on earth were made and are continually preserved and inspected by him. But indeed the most considerable thing on earth is the behaviour of his rational creatures; and whether that be right or wrong is of infinite moment in his sight; but whether they be high or low, of none at all. He regardeth not the rich more than the poor, for they are all the work of his hands (Job, xxxiv. 19.), and shall all account to him for their deeds. Our blessed Redeemer preached the gospel to the poor, at least as much as to the rich; he laid down his life equally for both; the Holy Spirit offers equally to both the sanctifying influences of his grace; the souls of both are equally capable of, and will equally be consigned to, everlasting happiness or misery. I saw, saith St. John, a throne, and him that sat on it, from whose face the earth and the heavens fled away, and there was found no place for them. And I saw the dead, small and great, stand before God: and the books were opened, and the dead were judged out of those things which were written in the books, according to their works. (Rev. xx. 11, 12.)

This awful scene first imprint strongly on your own minds; then on all you can, especially on those who belong to you. You have little else to give them, but if you give them effectually a practical sense of their duty to God and man, it is an inheritance beyond all treasures. You must see how wicked, and how miserable by their wickedness, multitudes of your own rank are; suffer it not to be the case of those who are dearest to you; but use the little spare time you have (for you will always have some) and the little ability you possess (for God will assist you), to instil into their hearts such early principles of piety and virtue, as may afford you just hopes of their being good and happy by your means in this world, and then following you, to increase your blessedness in the next.

S E R M O N XCII.

By ARCHBISHOP SECKER.

On following an imaginary and worldly Interest to the Neglect of Christianity.

For all seek their own, not the things which are Jesus Christ's.

THESE words contain both an account what the practice of mankind is, and also an intimation what it should be. And therefore, in discoursing upon them, it will be proper,

I. To consider what is meant by seeking our own things.

II. What by seeking the things of Jesus Christ.

III. To explain and prove the assertion, that all seek the former, not the latter.

IV. To shew what we are to learn from it.

I. Seeking our own things, is pursuing our own inclinations and fancies, or imagined worldly interest. And many strange fancies people of all ranks indulge. Some never ask themselves, whether the course which they are taking is likely to be for their good; others never slacken it, though from time to time they strongly suspect it is not. Often they adopt without examination, the opinions of those about them, whom yet they are far from esteeming; and either will not see, that better judges think differently; or do see it, and will not regard it, but follow custom blindfold, even against their own liking. Or it may be, they think a little, but think short; neither to the end, nor to any considerable part, even of the present life: imagine what pleases now, must always please; and what brings no inconvenience yet, will never bring any. Indeed, usually, it is their principal point, to acquire the things which others wish for, though visibly of no real use; and they are vehement for whatever will makethem envied as happy persons, though it produce little else than vexation and guilt. Some will not trust even their own experience against their prepossessions: but force themselves to believe, that the lives which they lead must needs be delightful, though they feel the contrary. Many lose the opportunities, and even the relish, of moderate and rational pleasures, by a wild pursuit of visionary and extravagant ones. Nay, there are some, who not only follow wrong ways, but, as the text hath it, seek them; go purposely out of the plain road, as it were, in search of misery. It were much to be wished, that all these were more studious of their interest, even their temporal interest, than they are: it might be one step towards becoming what they ought. But still the most faithful and assiduous worshippers of the world's great idols, applause, advancement, profit, power, entirely mistake, if they hope that any of these things will either secure them lasting enjoyment, or preserve them from acute misery. A little reflection discovers, that happiness consists in somewhat stable and inward: whence the more thoughtful have learned to seek it in themselves. But, alas! when we inspect ourselves, what a mixture do we find, of ignorance which we cannot enlighten, of weakness which we cannot strengthen, of wrongness which we cannot set right! Besides that all creatures, as such, are essentially insufficient for their own happiness; there is by nature a void within us, which must be filled from above, or we must remain for ever craving and unsatisfied. Let us therefore look upwards, and consider,

II. The things which are Jesus Christ's: the benefits that he hath procured for us, with the knowledge of them that he hath communicated to us. And indeed what have we of value, that is not his! Some have pretended they could investigate all the doctrines, the duties, the rewards of religion completely by their own reason, and form themselves to a suitable disposition by their own strength. But the history of heathenism clearly shews, that no one ever did this; nor probably therefore ever would. The one true God was scarce known. False deities of the worst characters were adored, instead of him, with rites that seldom, if ever, mended their votaries, often corrupted them. The common rules of social life were great means thoroughly understood; as the shocking custom of exposing children to perish, the barbarous combats of gladiators, the promiscuous and unnatural practices of lewdness, publicly allowed, give dreadful proofs. But the internal virtues of the heart were still less regarded; and they who seemed possessed of them, ascribed the merit wholly to themselves: very few said so much as the Pharisee, God, I thank thee, that I am not as other men are: scarce any with the Publican, God be merciful to me, a sinner. (Luke, xviii. 11. 13.) Yet how continually are the best of men guilty of faults. But they had hardly any notion of the universal need of repentance, or any name for humility of soul. Forgiveness of injuries was very unsteadily taught: benevolence to enemies lay yet further out of sight. Courage injuriously exercised, patriotism shewn by invading the rights of their neighbours, and numbers of other splendid sins, passed for heroic excellencies. There was very little hope of future bliss to give men spirit in doing what was right, and less fear of future judgment to deter them from what was wrong. Such were the best instructed nations; and such, or worse, had we been probably now, but for the compassion of Jesus Christ. Indeed without him we should never have known, till too late, how bad our condition was. The real state of mankind, with respect to God, was, in a great measure, unknown to them, till he underwent what he did, at once to lay open to us our danger, and to free us from it on most equitable terms. Even the mysterious parts of what he taught for this purpose lead us to reverence the Divine Wisdom, and think modestly of our own; while the more distinctly intelligible direct us to every thing that is right and fit.

The gospel hath laid the foundation of our duty in that pleasing and thankful veneration of God, which his creating bounty, his providential care, his redeeming mercy, excite: and which tends to inspire us with a deep concern for whatever we have done offensive to him, an earnest desire of obeying his commands, an humble sense that we need his assistance, a firm persuasion that he will grant it to us, a reliance on him for every thing ant, in regard to this world or

the next. This excellent frame of mind must powerfully suppress irregular appetites of sense, immoderate desires of wealth, vain fondness for pomp and pre-eminence, anxious cares about worldly events. And on such love of God Christianity builds its second great commandment, love of our neighbour: a duty, enjoined in a higher degree, and carried to a greater extent, though still a reasonable one, in scripture, than in any other institution of religion. It prescribes the most accurate and tender attention to the obligations which result from the nearer connections in life, the most industrious endeavours to be useful in whatever station we fill, the most affectionate faithfulness to the community of which we are members, tempered with universal goodwill to the rest of mankind: benevolent respect towards those who excel us; readiness to pardon, as far as can be safe, all who have wronged us; esteem of whatever in any person deserves it; sincerely kind wishes to those whom we esteem the least; compassion for the wretched, and relief to our utmost ability, though we straiten ourselves. Nor doth our blessed Redeemer expect us only to pity, as he did, the temporal wants of men; but, as he did also, their spiritual ones unspeakably more; a precept peculiar to the gospel, and comprehending a great variety of important particulars: provision for instructing the young and ignorant; and combining afterwards pious advice with outward relief to the sick and needy; seasonable warnings, and mild reproof, when there is hope of their being regarded; constant circumspection to set a prudent, as well as innocent example; that we lead not others into danger, by what, perhaps, we can do ourselves with safety; but submit to considerable restraints, rather than let our liberty, as the Apostle expresses it, become a stumbling block to them that are weak. (1 Cor. viii. 9.) Studying to observe these rules, for they require and merit study, is seeking the things that are Jesus Christ's. And they are opposed to our own, not as being really contrary even to our present interest: very far from it. Only through the inbred disorder of our hearts, and the general prevalence of evil habits, we are apt to delight in very opposite dispositions: and hence a good life comes to be a self-denying one, which else would be the constant practice of self-love. The ambitious would seek the true honour that cometh from God, (John v. 44.); the selfish would have respect to the heavenly recompence of reward (Heb. xi. 26.); the lovers of pleasure would secure the fulness of joy which is for evermore (Psal. xv. 12.); and the means of being happy here and hereafter would evidently appear to be the same. But now the difficulties of performing our duty are so great, and our failures in it so many, that, amongst the things that are Jesus Christ's, we must seek with peculiar earnestness his grace to strengthen us, and an interest in his merits to procure us acceptance, which thus the weakest and worst of us all may be sure of obtaining.

Yet, great as these blessings are, the Apostle hath said, that all men seek their own, not the things of Jesus Christ. Let us therefore,

III. Examine into the meaning and truth of this melancholy assertion.

It is plainly not to be taken in the utmost extent. For he had given the contrary character of Timothy, just before, as he hath of others elsewhere. But he may be well understood to say, that all absolutely have some share of blame in this respect: and the generality, which in common speech the word all frequently signifies, are highly and dangerously blameable. For who can deny this to be fact? Many are vicious in every way that inclination prompts them to. Many, who regard some parts of virtue, disregard others, perhaps avowedly. The more uniformly regular would do well to ask themselves, Whether it is from a real inward sense of duty, or for the sake of reputation or convenience? They who make a conscience of behaving right in common life, do they make any of paying due honour to God? Our strongest obligations of every kind are to him: yet numbers think highly of their own merit, while they neglect him and, it may be, pique themselves on neglecting him. If we profess ourselves believers in him, do we stately and fervently pray to him, and give him thanks for his daily blessings? Do we live in his fear and love, and the hope of his future mercy? Supposing we sincerely embrace natural religion; have we carefully enquired into the truth of Christianity; unprejudiced by attachment to forbidden pleasures, by the vain fancy, that nothing can be true which we comprehend not fully, by ludicrous or sophistical misrepresentations? And, to guard us against these, have we consulted proper books and persons? If we call ourselves Christians, do we observe conscientiously all the institutions of Christianity; or slight them when any trifle intervenes; and do we observe them otherwise than as mere forms? Do we use them to impress on our souls the importance of the doctrines, the pardon, the grace, the rewards of the gospel? And do we employ our faith of all these things to improve us in every part of a Christian temper? This temper, and our inclinations, too often interfere. Which do we prefer? And where do we lay the foundation of our conduct? We ought not to lay it in attention to our own interests or amusements, joining now and then with them a little appearance, or perhaps a little reality, of religion, provided we can make it agree with them. But the rule is, seek ye first the kingdom of God, and his righteousness. (Mat. vi. 33.) The groundwork of every thing good, is a devout resolution to do our whole duty. Each is to do it suitably to his own station; but all, in whatever station, high or low, are to make it their inviolable concern: for God hath given no man licence to sin. (Ecclus. xv. 20.) Whoever doth not feel this truth as the most important one that belongs to his existence; and govern his conduct by it, in tying as well as ordinary cases, hath not sought the things of Jesus Christ in a due manner. And think then, I intreat you, how few have. A sad reflection! but we must remind our hearers to make it. Else how much pleasanter would it be to congratulate the good on their happy state, than to terrify the wicked; to encourage the modest and timorous, than to confute the presumptuous, and alarm the thoughtless!

But, such being the condition of the world, let us now consider,

IV. What we are to learn from it.

And certainly we ought to learn great mildness towards others, who are faulty;

since, more or less, all are so. Even the first Christian, even the first of the Christian clergy, for of these, it must be owned, the Apostle peculiarly speaks in the text, fell very short of perfection. And ever since, the best have had their defects, and the worst their good qualities. Let us therefore think and hope, as well as with any reason we can, of all. Yet still, they who abandon themselves to wickedness, and especially they who labour to pervert others, either in principles or practice, and to make a bad world worse, be they ever so agreeable, be they ever so useful to us, are to be avoided, and checked with more care, the more danger there is of their doing harm. That we are unable, from various circumstances, to exert this right spirit, may sometimes, perhaps often, be a just plea; but ought never to be made a false pretence. The firm purpose of doing it should always be kept in mind, and executed as soon as possible, with amends for the delay. At the same time, in proportion as the bad give real marks of reformation, they should be diligently encouraged, yet with prudent, and cautious, and gradual kindness. But above all the honest, the virtuous, the conscientious, the pious, ought to be countenanced, brought forward, and cherished, as the salt and the light of the earth (Matth. v. 13, 14.), who preserve society from corruption and dissolution, who shew men the way to present and future happiness. Nor should they be rejected or despised, though sometimes inferior in qualifications of less moment, nay, though, in some respects, hurting, through mistake, their own good cause; of which, however, it is very unjust, though very usual, to condemn or suspect them, without or beyond reason.

But the principal point is, what we are to learn in regard more immediately to ourselves. If the world be so bad, there is great need to ask our hearts, what are we who make a part of it? Conforming to it implicitly is by no means the rule either of Scripture or of reason; yet is it not too much our practice? A little honest home inquiry would soon furnish the true answer. But we turn our eyes from what we have no mind to discern, and try to deceive not only others, but ourselves. Yet to what end? God knows the truth. Men will know it, if they do not; and angels too. We ourselves know it in part all the while; and shall know and lament it to eternity, if we refuse to take the proper notice of it in time.

Examine therefore what the tenour of your conduct is. If it be dissolute or intemperate, the necessity of amending it is glaringly visible. If, though otherwise innocent, you consume your days chiefly in trifles; such waste of precious time, given for other ends, is highly criminal. Besides that, both the supinely indolent, and the busier votaries of idle amusements, expose themselves to various temptations, and set a dangerous example to those around them: the tendency of which as it spreads, must be, to make persons of all ranks, even the most important, and, by consequence, the community composed of them, insignificant, contemptible, and vicious. Further still; though your disposition be to things of more use, and so far commendable, yet if on any occasion you indulge either resentment or malevolence, however calm, towards any of your fellow-creatures; if you are injurious or hard-hearted, from selfishness; or but thoughtlessly inattentive to the rights, the interests, the wants, the feelings, of those whom you ought to regard, you may thus have contracted, in many ways, most heinous degrees of guilt. Nay, supposing you have been, and are, beneficent as well as harmless, but less so than you might; even this defect is a failure of duty. Not that you are to give way to scruples; there is no end of them; but to consider maturely, and consult worthy friends; what you can add to the good which you do already. Possibly ~~it~~ may be more than you imagine. Be it ever so little, do it but according to the best of your judgment, and God will accept it. But, at the same time, be sure to remember, that the rightest demeanor in worldly matters will not suffice; but our chief regard must be to him who made us, and whose therefore we are. From his goodness all that we enjoy proceeds: from his authority over us all our duties flow: and those, which are owing immediately to himself, surely require our principal care. But such duties as natural reason teaches, are far from being the only concern of those to whom he hath prescribed additional ones, founded on the important alterations which our primitive state, as we learn from Scripture, hath undergone. Man is a fallen creature: We are dead, as the Apostle strongly expresses it, and our life is hid with Christ in God. (Col. iii. 3.) Our hope of future happiness lies not in ourselves, but is reposed in the hands of the blessed Jesus, who purchased it with his blood: and where our treasure is, there must our hearts be also. (Matth. vi. 21. Luke, xii. 34.) Without affectionate and habitual movements of the soul towards the Father of Mercy, the Author of Salvation, the Inspirer of Holiness; without a deep sense of past guilt and present imperfection, an humble faith in the merits of our glorified Redeemer, and a firm reliance on the grace of the Divine Comforter, all our virtue, all our piety, will avail us nothing. For, when we have done our best, we are but unprofitable servants. (Luke, xvii. 10.)

You will object perhaps, that indulging contemplations of this nature would engross our whole thoughts and time: the affairs of common life must be utterly neglected for them. But are you indeed at all near the borders of that danger? Or do not such objectors take thorough care to keep far enough out of the reach of it? You are by no means called only to acts of devotion, or only to the more sublime of moral duties. Prudent and moderate concern for our worldly interest is a duty. Every propriety and decency of life is a duty. Even ornamental accomplishments have their value. But from these concessions men conclude, that they may safely pay their main attention to what deserves but the smallest part; and imagine they are abundantly good Christians, almost without any one peculiarly Christian action or sentiment. At best, a few pious formalities, practised now and then, constitute their whole religion: and the rest of their life, and all their heart, is given up to what hath no tincture of religion in it; whereas inward reverence of God, as he is manifested to us in the gospel of Jesus Christ, ought to be our ruling principle; and extend its influence throughout each article, of our business, our conversation, our private thoughts.

Perhaps you will object again, that so very serious a turn of mind as this, will cast a gloom over every thing and one must have some pleasure surely. But learn to be pleased with what you ought; and you will have inexpressibly more pleasure than you possibly can else. In other things you take pains, no small pains, to acquire a taste; often, for what is of no value; sometimes, for what is bad; and perhaps, after all, can succeed no further, than to put on the affectation of liking what you really do not, or get by habit a wretched craving for gratifications, which you cannot but despise and condemn. Employ yourselves better. Esteem what is estimable, and it will exalt instead of debasing you: love what is amiable, and it will reward your affection. Love him above all, who hath first loved you (1 John, iv. 19.); and his service will be delightful: become such as he requires, and you will find satisfaction in every thing. It is a strange mistake, to imagine the burthens of religion insupportable, while we take much heavier upon ourselves from fancy and fashion. Were the gospel to enjoy the fatigues, the expences, the dangers, which on reflection we shall perceive caprice and custom do, that one argument against it would be accounted decisive.

The most serious person in the world may justly be also the cheerfullest. Even penitents, in the midst of their sorrow, at the very beginning of their amendment, enjoy a blessed hope of forgiveness and acceptance, infinitely preferable to the highest pleasures of sin. But persons of confirmed goodness have a peace within their breasts, which passeth all understanding (Phil. iv. 7.) of those who have not experienced it, and all description of those who have. They feel no tormenting remorse, no disquieting dread of God or man. They are never agitated by malice or envy: seldom, and but gently, moved by anger. Pity indeed they often experience; but gratifying it comforts both others and themselves. Their behaviour is friendly, and therefore agreeable: their discourse lively, if nature hath qualified them for it; but at least inoffensive and conciliating. Their hearts are open, in a proper degree, to all the innocent amusements of life, and they long for none of the prohibited ones. Virtuous discretion preserves their health and spirits as much as worldly uncertainties permit, makes their circumstances easy, their families and dependants* orderly and happy. Their judicious beneficence is very useful, their blameless example yet more. Thus they become blessings within the compass of their sphere; and surely reap no little joy from the esteem of others, but unspeakably more from the testimony of their own consciences. The best of them indeed are sensible of many failings: but all consistent with that sincerity, which God, they know, will recompence. They see through the whole course of life, that they are in the only right way; and whatever may happen to them, all will end well. Disappointments, unkindness, ingratitude, losses of friends or of fortune, necessity, pain, sickness, and death, work together for their good (Rom. viii. 28.), and unite to form an infallible plan for increasing their final felicity. Never will society grow gloomy, but inexpressibly the cheerfuller, for being composed of such persons as these; and such ought the religious naturally to be.

Therefore you, who are truly religious, appear in character, and do credit to your cause. Despise with good humour and pity the impotent ridicule of the inconsiderate: let the world see that you are happy, and that your belief in God is the ground of it. Wear no dejected looks, put on no forbidding appearances; be affable, be courteous, be joyful. Avoid improper amusements; guard against fondness for those in which occasionally you may do well to join: but express a decent and modest, a mild and compassionate, not an angry or censorious, disapprobation of the common excesses in them; shew that you can relish life perfectly well without them, by engaging with alacrity in the proper business of your station, improving yourselves, and doing good to others. Never unseasonably magnify in talk, but assiduously demonstrate in fact, the comfort you have in observing the precepts and expecting the rewards of the gospel. Manifest, whenever opportunities present themselves, yet without any ostentation, the benevolent serenity, which Christian faith inspires, your enjoyment both of conversation and solitude in their seasons, your composure under doubts and uncertainties, your fortitude under crosses and afflictions, and your settled persuasion, that you shall ever be enabled to possess your soul in gladness of heart (Luke, xxi. 19. Acts, ii. 46.) and rejoice in the Lord alwa. (Phil. iv. 4.)

Such behaviour will surely convince even the vicious and the prejudiced, if they have any reflection, that to seek their own advantage with success, they must seek the things which are Jesus Christ's. And if they ever intend it, the present time is always the best; but this present time is peculiarly so. Decency prohibits now the usual diversions: apply your vacant hours to a better purpose. The offices of the week throughout express, in the most affecting manner, what your gracious Redeemer hath done and suffered for you: think deliberately in it, what you ought to do for him, indeed for yourselves. Think what you have been, and are, and what the faith you profess requires you to be; consider what fatal consequences will follow, perhaps very soon, if you neglect to amend, and how you shall accomplish this necessary work. Read with reverence the rules and declarations of God's word; read with attention other awakening, yet prudent books, reflecting as you go along; and engage some pious, but judicious friend, to excite, support, direct, and, if there be occasion, restrain you. Form discreetly by their helps needful resolutions; and beg earnestly of God strength to fulfil them: else they will all prove ineffectual. But remember, that the piety of the week, however strict, is not to end with it; and cannot be really Christian, if it doth. You are called to recollection now, that you may practise vigilance all the rest of your days. Temporary, periodical goodness, that is like the morning cloud, and as the early dew goeth away (Hos. vi. 4.), will be of no avail to any one; but they, who, by patient continuance in well-doing, seek for glory, and honour, and immortality, are secure of obtaining eternal life. (Rom. ii. 7.)

SERMON XCIII.

On false Grounds of Self-Complacency.

GAL. vi. 14.

But God forbid that I should glory, save in the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ: by whom the world is crucified unto me, and I unto the world.

WE must have some foundation, real or imagined, for thinking well of ourselves or our condition; or we must be wretched. And innumerable are the methods which men take to procure the esteem of their own minds. Too many glory in their shame (Phil. iii. 19.); are proud of notions and discourses, which misrepresent sacred truths, degrade human nature, and tend to dissolve human society; of gratifying their passions, their appetites, their fancies, whatever mischief it produces; of doing what visibly hurts, and must finally ruin their characters, their fortunes, their healths, their souls. Others value themselves on more plausible, yet insufficient, pretensions; on the lustre of an ancient family, which perhaps they disgrace; on the inheritance or acquisition of wealth which they employ to little or no good purpose; on agreeableness of person, which makes them vain and imprudent the short time it continues, and miserable when it decays; on liveliness of wit, which either provokes enemies, or invites dangerous friends; on depth of knowledge, often falsely so called, and pernicious, often wholly foreign, to their true business; on elegance of taste in smaller matters, while they are contemptibly injudicious in the greatest; on pomp and shew, which give a pleasure as fleeting as it is childish; on making a figure in the idle hurry of amusements, which encroaches on every valuable purpose of life, and wears out the spirits under pretence of raising them; on the favour of the great, by whatever arts attained, and however precarious; or on the seemingly more solid possession of power, which it is hard to abstain from using ill, and extremely hard to use in a due measure well; which disoblige by the exercise of it many more than it can possibly oblige, is accompanied with perpetual fatigue and uneasiness, yet with perpetual envy; causes innumerable vexations while it lasts; and yet commonly grievous regret when it is gone.

If all these be wrong grounds of self-complacency, how few of us have right ones! There are those, however, who profess to build it on something more substantial, on virtue. But, alas! the virtue of great numbers consists almost wholly in specious words, honour, benevolence, good-nature, which are either a mere ornament of their talk, or influence their behaviour only on some occasions, or to some persons. And the more uniformly well inclined towards others are often strangely addicted to blameable indulgence of themselves: or, however, inoffensive otherwise, are lamentably defective in the discipline of the heart, particularly in forming it to that deep humility, which becomes dust and ashes. If we think too highly of ourselves, we shall be fatally misled; and, if we think reasonably, we shall experience the daily mortification of being faulty, more or less, even in those things for which we are applauded. Besides, our virtue itself will frequently oblige us to do what others will dislike, oppose, revenge. Or, though we escape such evils, yet the unavoidable ones of fear, sorrow, languor, pain, sickness, death, are usually more than enough to make our present state a pitiable, rather than a glorious one, if the consciousness of our own rectitude be our whole support under them.

Wiser men, therefore, in their search of comfort, look beyond themselves to God. And, indeed, faith in him, provided it represents him as a righteous governor, observing, distinguishing, and recompensing, unspeakably dignifies our condition, and adds importance to our prospects. But still, our best obedience being only his due, and paid only out of what we have received from him, we could neither boast nor merit, though it were perfect; and what his free goodness would bestow on us even then beyond security from their being suiters on the whole, reason would never ascertain.

moral virtue, will suffice; and in the upper part of both, yet less of religion, if any at all, is needful. Accordingly many, who, from conscience, preserve some forms of it, rather look desirous to have them thought mere forms, and are wonderfully shy of uttering a word to shew the contrary; pass off any mention of their regard to it as slightly as may be, and are content to let others treat it with as much indignity as they will; instead of glorjng in the cross of Christ, ashamed to confess him before men, though he hath passed on that shame so awful a sentence (Matth. x. 32, 33. Mark, viii. 38. Luke, ix. 26. xii. 8, 9.); and perfectly indifferent whether pity hath the support, which they must know it wants, provided they can make an acceptable figure to those around them; a point about which they are as solicitous, as if the Apostle had said, be ye conformed to this world, instead of, be ye not. (Rom. xii. 2.) Perhaps the more seriously educated scruple going at once the utmost lengths of the mode in wrong things: but are gradually familiarized to follow their leaders from one step to another, till they advance imperceptibly to a frightful distance from their first setting out; and it may be at last grow ambitious of being leaders in their turn of a little world of their own, that shall tempt the great one into still worse enormities.

Through the whole of this giddy progress, innumerable attentions and incredibly earnest ones, to most insignificant matters, fill their hearts, and expel or deaden every devout and virtuous feeling. If they find leisure to reflect on their conduct, it is chiefly to invent excuses and palliations: if they still go to church, it is without desire of improving there: nay, if they still pray in private, which probably few of them continue long, it is little more than repeating thoughtlessly a few good words: and thus, by degrees, they come to have no real affection or veneration for their Creator, their Redeemer, their Sanctifier, no penitent sense of their own imperfections or transgressions, no practical or steady persuasion of future recompences; but form their whole manner of talking and judging, as if the present state were all: are extremely eager about their worldly interests and pleasures, but equally unconcerned about the rightness of their dispositions; will on no account be absent from a meeting for business which they have at heart, or a gay assembly to which they are invited, let their health or what will suffer: but neglect the appointed seasons of divine worship, on the poorest pretences, or without any: crowd business, journeys, diversions, into the most sacred seasons, contrary to the excellent ends of their institution, contrary to all law, and all shame; but would think their reputations undone by going to the house of God at any unusual time, or even making with seriousness a momentary acknowledgment to him over their daily food: consult neither scripture nor reason to discover their duty; but make the artfullest use of either, to fence against what they are unwilling to own for such; or if need be, avowedly prefer the opinion and practice of the world to both; disdainful rebels against heaven, but mean spirited slaves to they scarcely know whom.

Yet most of them tolerate, and perhaps approve, some appearances of religion, especially in some persons; but suspect any great reality of it, as a degree of madness: have the utmost terrors of seeing this poor land over-run with enthusiasm and superstition; but not the smallest dread of profaneness and profligateness: are startled at any new declarations of authority against either, but comforted by the hope, that they will prove ineffectual, and all go on as it did; read almost any thing written to depreciate christianity, and relax moral virtue, but almost nothing in favour of them; are very cautious of meddling with treatises of piety, however judiciously composed, for fear of turning their heads, but devour ever so many idle and even lascivious books, without the least apprehension of corrupting their hearts; allow themselves to be much more expensive in the vain-glorious display of private magnificence, or towards the support of entertainments called polite, though neither of good tendency or good taste, than liberal to the truest charities; or, how bountiful soever to the temporal distresses of their brethren, have no compassion on all for their spiritual wants: nay, perhaps, have made formal resolutions of giving nothing to such and such pious uses, against which it is grown customary to inveigh, and hear no answer.

Yet many of them had originally no relish for this turn of thinking and acting: indeed still rather affect to seem, than really are, happy in it; nay, possibly feel tormenting doubts from time to time, how it will end. But these they are taught to consider as mere fit or gloominess, which they must dissipate by every mirthful avocation they can invent, and learn to despise themselves for ever, having been in so strange a state of mind, and so unsuitable to living in good company. Or, if reflexion will, notwithstanding, be troublesome, arguments must be sought for to quiet it. And accordingly they do argue, that men's stations, connections, and spirits require some relaxation, and they must take such as they can get, amongst those with whom it is to be had. But are they moved or rejoiced at this pleaded obligation? Do they stop at the quantity or the kinds that are really needful, or go beyond them at pleasure? Are they growing better or worse all the while? Are they setting good examples or bad? Surely these are material questions. Yet they make a shift either to feel or to acknowledge nothing of their force: but whatever they like to join in, peremptorily insist, that it is harmless, useful, necessary, just what they please: yet reserving a liberty, when once it loses credit, to censure it as absurd and wrong every way, and be full as fond of something else, that deserves it as little, without confessing the least inconsistency.

For, with the world on their side, they come at length, instead of apologizing for themselves, to assume a sovereign authority over others; refute their objections with barely a contemptuous laugh or look, or by fixing on them any name in vogue, that denotes perverseness; attack and persecute the most silent nonconformists to their notions, and haughtily overbear all that stand in their way. Such as worship the same idol with them, be their characters ever so doubtful, must not be suspected: be they ever so notoriously criminal, must not be condemned; or counted unfit for their familiar acquaintance, or even particular friendship, let the consequences, private or public, be what they may. The pert ridiculers of religion and virtue are to be allowed abundance of wit in the silliest and grossest things they utter; and the more moderate, who must be held mild; and of his present distress, because they wrote from a prison, is so of if they run attention to the supporting they are only rage is so affecting; and also, they are to that both he and they almost, it is well and conquer, is so noble, are considerable. Next, his deliberation, when regularly death be eligible, is so calm, objects of deference to live, even in their virtuous makes, and that of the good their conduct by heroic, yet fully engaged on account of it, and triumph in pleasure in its doctrines, its order, makes, its promises, and give any tokens of what the text calls glorying in the cross of Christ, they are to hope from this quarter for a very small share of the charitable candour, which is lavished so profusely on others. Their sincerity, or their understanding, is to be strongly questioned; their good dispositions and actions denied, or passed over in silence, or scornfully undervalued; ridiculous and dangerous singularities to be imputed to them, on the weakest evidence, or none; and if ever they fall into any such, they are to be aggravated beyond truth or credibility; and no plea whatever to be admitted in their favour. So very far are too many from answering the Psalmist's description of the man who shall dwell in God's holy hill, that in his eyes a vile person is contemned, but he honoureth them that fear the Lord, (Psalm. xv. 1, 4.)

Even an infidel, were he to speak honestly, would tell such, that they are no christians. Yet, perhaps, they would be very angry with any one but an infidel for saying so, and in reality are by no means unbelievers. But why then will they not become consistent? If the gospel of Christ deserves any regard at all, it deserves a thorough regard; either it is nothing, or it is the most important of all things. And they who profess it, yet seldom think of it, who are influenced by it, if at all, to scarce more than a little outward shew, and slight and scorn the frame of mind which it was intended to create in them, better had it been for them, unless they amend, never to have known it. (2 Pet. ii. 21.) All sorts of persons are concerned beyond expression to recollect this often; but sorts beyond the rest. If part of the world, w^h ful and most to of being exen^t, remarkable for no his laws; not o the pernicious^r will greatly in And if we others by afflictions o ags on the certⁱ a them the reverse make it our study to acq^ure, or wealth, or power, or ak, partake of amusements and diversions in the poor low degree that for shame we can, or enjoy ourselves in some graver kind of voluptuous indolence; to do any thing, in short, but labour diligently in God's vineyard from first to last for the good of souls; we shall receive a double condemnation. And they who patronize any such of us, will share deeply in our guilt.

It is not rigour that dictates any of these assertions to me. It was not austerity, but the tenderest compassion, that moved St. Paul to say, For many walk, of whom I have told you often, and now tell you even weeping, that they are the enemies of the 'cross of' Christ, who mind earthly things (Phil. iii. 18, 19.); not always designed enemies, but real ones however. Our Saviour hath told us, He that is not with me, is against me. (Matth. xii. 30. Luke xi. 23.) And they that will be with him to effect, must be with him heartily, openly, and uniformly. We may have qualities very amiable, and do actions very laudable in the estimation of men, and yet our hearts be far from right in the sight of God. (Acts, viii. 21.) He requires, as well he may, that we should consider ourselves principally as his creatures, as sinners, as favoured with offers of mercy and of grace, as bound to live soberly, righteously, and godly, looking for the blessed hope of his glorious appearance. (Tit. ii. 12, 13.) However the preference, which the world gives to very different matters, may buoy us up now in overlooking these, it will be no protection to us, when the dead, small and great, shall stand before God. (Rev. xx. 12.) And however insipid or insupportable a life may appear to some, which is to be humbly in regulating their desires, doing duty, and expecting their reward; will find upon trial, that every other same produces miserable disappointments; and this, as much happiness as our present state is capable of. Length of days, easy circumstances, general esteem, domestic tranquillity, national good order and strength, are the smaller advantages that usually attend practising the rules of religion; but the constant ones, the calm peace and joyful prospects of all whose minds are duly affected by the genuine principles of it, these are blessings inexpressibly great.

You are not exhorted to begin a ne course of life, and retain your old inclinations; making yourselves uneasy, without making yourselves better; but to acquire such sentiments, that you may delight in all you do. The vigorous exercise of good sense will contribute not a little to this desirable end; for, indeed, the ways of the world are often flat contradictions to it. But the fundamental rule is, learn a just value for the Cross of Christ, for the pity he hath shewn, the pardon he hath purchased, the felicity he hath provided for you; and you will soon come to love the restraints and observances which he hath appointed, to look with indifference, or sometimes with disgust and abhorrence, on what you have hitherto admired, and find the degree of your satisfactions unspeakably increased, by changing the nature of them from trifling, disgraceful, and noxious, to rational, noble and beneficent. Still difficulties there will be, and to some persons peculiar ones, in breaking settled habits, and dissolving the ties by which you have been long held. But God will give you both courage and prudence, to make it easier than you think. Though you will do what is right with steadiness, yet you will do it without ostentation, and with cheerful good humour; speak mildly of others, and keep on as good terms with all men as you safely can. But, if you are too solicitous to please them, you will gradually slide back, and forget, as thousands have done to their eternal ruin, your former convictions. Therefore, whenever you feel any, suffer them not to die away through inattention, or be choaked by cares and pleasures, or blasted by the breath of scoffers; but impress them on your souls immediately and frequently, form resolutions corresponding to them, and confirm these by reading good books, by the conversation and countenance of good persons, by attendance on God's public ordinances; but especially by fervent private prayer, suited to your spiritual condition. With this, out of weakness you will be made strong (Heb. xi. 34.); and without this, the seemingly firmest human purposes, sink as highly of them as you will, can be effectual. For God resisteth the proud, but giveth grace to the humble. (James, iv. 6. 1 Pet. v. 5.)

SERMON XCIV.

BY ARCHBISHOP SECKER.

 Summary of the Christian's Duty.

PHIL. iv. 8.

Finally, brethren, whatsoever things are true,  whatsoever things are honest, whatsoever things are just, whatsoever things are pure,  whatsoever things are lovely, whatsoever things are of good report; if there be any virtue, and if there be any praise, think on these things.

As the excellent characters of the first believers and teachers of christianity are, in general a strong recommendation of it to mankind; so that of St. Paul in particular shines with distinguished lustre through his whole history; but especially his epistles, the faithful pictures of his soul. Even in this short one to the Philippians, it is surprising to observe, how great a variety of most exalted and engaging virtues he shews. The authority of the apostle is so perfectly tempered with the condescension of the fellow-christian; the expressions of his tenderness for those to whom he writes are so endearing and instructive at the same time; his acknowledgement of their kindnesses to him, so equally full of dignity, humility, and disinterestedness; his mention of his past persecutions is so mild; and of his present danger, (for he wrote from a prison), is so cheerful; his attention to the supporting of their courage is so affecting; and his confidence, that both he and they should persevere and conquer, is so noble and yet so modest; his deliberation, whether life or death be eligible, is so calm; and his preference to live, even in misery, for their sakes, and that of the gospel, is so genuinely heroic, yet fully equalled by the composed and triumphant mention, which he elsewhere makes, of his approaching martyrdom; his zeal for propagating religion is so ardent, yet attended with so deep a concern, that it be indeed true religion; he is so earnest to guard them, both against a superstitious reliance on outward observances, and a licentious abuse of the doctrines of faith and grace; so solicitous to improve them in rational piety, and meek beneficent virtue; so intent to fix their minds on every thing worthy and amiable, and raise them above every thing gloomy or anxious; his warmth in this glorious cause, is so far from being affected or forced; and every expression so evidently flows from a heart, which cannot help overflowing; that, whoever shall read but this one epistle with attention and fairness, under all the disadvantages of a translation made word for word, and broken into short verses, will feel a strong impression on his mind, that the writer of it must have been an uncommonly great and good man; every way deserving of the high rank, which he claims, of a commissioned servant of God, and incapable of claiming it falsely.

But, besides being thus moved with the admirable spirit expressed, and the sublime precepts diffused throughout the whole, it will be still a new subject of esteem and wonder, to see the force and substance of them all collected at last into one brief exhortation; comprehending, in so narrow a space, the entire compass of virtuous dispositions, and right behaviour, as is done in the text; to which he subjoins with conscious boldness, appealing to all which they had learned and received, and heard and seen of him (Phil. iv. 9.), that this had been his own disposition and behaviour; yet humbly considers him as not having already attained or being already perfect, but merely as pressing towards the mark of the prize of the high calling of God (Phil. iii. 13, 14.); and not only uses his own prayers but begs theirs also, that, through the supply of the spirit of Jesus Christ, all things may turn to his salvation. (Phil. i. 19, 20.) We cannot help honouring such a character; but, if we hope to be the better for it, we must also imitate it. And therefore let us examine with this view, that description of it, which I have read to you. Had the several phrases, used in it, been as nearly as possible equivalent, and accumulated only to convey the intended meaning more fully and strongly, this would have been warranted by the example of the great Roman orator, who professes to have done the same thing on a like occasion. But there is a superior accuracy and beauty in the words of the apostle. Each of them singly hath a distinct sense; and joined together they form a connected and complete body of duty, as will appear by examining them separately; which I shall therefore do in the first place; and then, secondly, make a general observation upon the whole.

Truth, always present to the mind of God, is the ground of his commands; and, so far as discerned by us, is the ground of our obedience. On this accordingly the apostle here builds, and lays for the foundation of his whole superstructure, whatsoever things are true; that is, conformable to the clear perceptions of our understandings, the inward feelings of our hearts, the known circumstances of our situation. Setting out thus, he excludes, in the first word, from being any part of christian duty, every thing romantic and visionary, all refinements of false honour, all enthusiasm of a heated fancy. But he enjoins at the same time, whatever is reasonable and right; be the practice or notions of the world as contrary to it as they will; whatever the sovereign principle of conscience dictates, though passions and appetites may draw powerfully another way; whatever the impartial state of any case requires, let vanity or interest make ever so much against it; what we owe to our Maker, no less than what is due to our fellow-creatures; what divine revelation teaches, no less than what human faculties discover; what the future, as well as the present condition of our being demands; for our relations to God are as real, and infinitely more important, than to man; those parts of his will which only scripture makes known, the authority of scripture being proved, are entitled to equal attention with those which reason dictates of itself; and such consequences of our actions, as will follow beyond the grave, are but a single and a short step more distant, than the visible and daily ones that follow them here. These maxims are the solid basis of proper conduct: the whole creation cannot shake them; and every other scheme of life is built upon the sand, and will crush us under its ruins. God himself proceeds invariably according to the reason of things; he must therefore expect man to hold it sacred; and both the honour of his government and the holiness of his nature stand engaged, that, sooner or later, every one shall find his account in observing this rule, but none in transgressing it. For his righteousness is an everlasting righteousness, and his law is the truth. (Isak. li. ix. 14.)

The second head of the apostle's injunction is whatsoever things are honest; or rather, as the marginal translation hath it, reasonable, intitled to respect; for so the original word in the Greek copiously signifies, as indeed the word honest it, if done in the Latin tongue, from whence it is derived into ours.

If pursuant to the former direction, we consider, according to truth, the inward frame of our hearts and minds, we shall perceive, that, as man was created at first in the image of God, so there still remains in our nature, however defaced by the fall, a sense of dignity and worth, which we ought to reverence in ourselves and others. The lowest of men, with reason, think falsehood and dishonesty beneath them; and the highest, if they condescend to use them, lose, by so doing, a much truer greatness than they retain. Worldly advantages leave the possessors of them but just the same men which they would have been without them. Personal accomplishments as often produce wrong conduct, hatred, contempt, and misery, as they do the contrary. At best, neither the one nor the other can give more, than a short-lived, and precarious distinction. But scorn of wickedness, and esteem of our duty, shewn in practice, this is the valuable pre-eminence, which will continue an ornament to us through every condition of life, through every period of our existence: will entitle us to inward veneration, as well as outward regard, and recommend us, not only to fallible beings, but to the unerring Searcher of our hearts, and final Rewarder of our deeds. Whoever therefore would obtain a truly honourable character, must preserve himself above dishonourable actions: and never permit either profit, or pleasure, or favour, or power, titular pre-eminences, or popular opinion, to debase him into doing any thing ill.

Keeping up this kind of superiority to the height carries no pride in it, no temptation to pride. For, though a worthy-minded man knows every thing to be mean, in comparison of right behaviour: yet he must know too, that his own behaviour is very imperfectly right, even in the sight of men, much more of God? and were it completely so, it would still amount to no more than his bounden duty. He will therefore always proceed with great humility, though with great steadiness, in the discharge of his conscience: patiently expecting, what he will certainly find, that many other things, and some of them very bad ones, will greatly outshine, in the eyes of the world, so plain and unflattering a qualification, as this, of uniform uprightness: which yet is indeed beyond all others the respectable one; the only ground of conscious self-approbation, of mutual esteem and trust, of public order and safety.

For however common it is become to treat all pretence of principle, as mere hypocrisy; and both to give with great gaiety, and receive with great complacency, intimations, which one should think could do neither side much credit, as if interest or inclination would induce them, or any one, to do almost any thing; yet such general representations are both false in themselves, and pernicious to human society. The worst of men are not thoroughly bad, without some mixture of good. But nothing can go farther towards making all men so, than treating it as an acknowledged point, that they are so already, and cannot be otherwise. In proportion as this doctrine prevails, no guilt will be out of countenance. Now what the consequences of that must be, is easily discerned; and the prophet hath told us very plainly; Were they ashamed, when they had committed abomination? nay, they were not at all ashamed, neither could they blush: therefore shall they fall.—At the time that I visit them, they shall be cast down, saith the Lord. (Jer. vi. 15.) Undoubtedly the wickedness of mankind is great; and those in high stations have particular opportunities of seeing it in a strong light. But still, they, who feel any good qualities in themselves, cannot justly think there are none in others. And be there ever so little probity in the world, it is our most serious interest to cultivate and increase it. For what comfort, or what safety, can there be in the midst only of the profligate and abandoned! Or how shall either authority or merit support itself, if that inward reverence of duty and worth be worn out of the minds of men, without which all the solemnities of external forms will soon come to lose their influence? But if earthly tranquillity could be preserved by other means, yet heavenly happiness can be enjoyed only by souls exalted to a capacity of it; purged from every thing mean and base, and, by generous and honourable dispositions, made meet to be partakers of the inheritance of the saints in light. (Col. i. 12.)

The third branch of the Apostle's exhortation, whatsoever things are just, is naturally connected with the second. Had we nothing superior in our nature to restrain us, force and fraud would be as allowable between man and man, as between brute and brute. But the consciousness which we have of peculiar dignity, includes the obligation to mutual justice, as part of itself, and yet there was need to mention this part separately; because else, the higher the notion which each entertained of his own value, the more apt he might be to overlook others, especially his inferiors, and trample upon them carelessly. Therefore St. Paul, in the text, immediately subjects the mutual behaviour of all the sons of men to one common measure; and requires, that the highest and the lowest should each treat the other, as each might expect, were circumstances changed, the other should treat him; which single precept observed, would keep the world in quiet: and if it be transgressed, nothing is left to stop at, short of universal confusion. Every one therefore, in every part of social life, should be vigilant against the influence of pride, and passion, and interest; should inquire with diligence, and hear with candour, in order to judge with impartiality; should remember, that nothing is truly justice, but what is equity at the same time; should do frankly and immediately what he knows he ought to do; and so temper his prudence with innocence, as always to prefer harmlessness to worldly wisdom, whenever they interfere. That others will act very differently, is so much the worse for them; but no consideration for us to be moved by, in the least. The whole we have to be concerned for, is to act right ourselves. A wise and good God will take care of the rest.

Next to justice, the Apostle ranks, in the fourth place, a virtue equally flowing from the dignity of human nature, and seldom violated without grievous injustice, that of shunning the pollution of criminal pleasures, and practising whatsoever things are pure. Some kinds of sensual excess, as gluttony and drunkenness, are acknowledged to be contemptible, hateful vices. And however favourably too many look on the free indulgence of another appetite, at least in one sex, yet their opinion cannot alter the nature of things. Irregular gratifications must still remain what they are, dishonourable to our reason, destructive to our happiness. And it is surprising, that they, who have any rightness of mind, can fail either to discern or to reflect, what meanness it is to make these things the business of their being; and associate, for the sake of them, with the profligate and abandoned; what imprudence, to ruin or to hazard their healths, fortunes, or reputations, in such wretched courses; and what mischief, to destroy the virtue and peace of the innocent, and harden the guilty in their crimes; to violate faith and honour, distress families, embitter the nearest and tenderest relations of life, confound descents and inheritances, extend infamy, and perhaps diseases also, to successive generations. Indeed the sins of this kind have not always all these bad effects; but they undeniably produce in general, by innumerable ways, more thorough wickedness, and more exquisite misery, than almost any others. And even those transgressions of purity, that may seem the least hurtful, are so wrong in themselves, and so contrary to the good order, strength, and welfare, of society: they lead on so naturally to worse; they set so dangerous an example, and give so plausible an excuse to others, for going a little and a little farther in the same way (as indeed there is no possible ground to make a sure stand upon, if once we depart from strict virtue); that whoever considers, will be far from thinking, either the precepts, or the threatenings of scripture, on this head, too rigid and severe.

But abstaining from dishonourable, and injurious, and criminally sensual, actions, is by no means sufficient, unless we are careful to do becoming, beneficent, and engaging ones: or, in the apostle's words, whatsoever things are lovely; which class of duties he hath put in the fifth place with great propriety. For the good-nature and agreeableness, required under this head, is not to supply the room of the justice and purity required before; nor can possibly make amends for the want of them: but we must first resolve to be innocent, then study to be amiable. Now the two great branches of amiable conduct are those, on which the gospel hath laid so peculiar a stress; mildness in bearing injuries, and bounty in relieving necessities: one of them expressly made the condition of our being forgiven; the other the foundation of our being rewarded.

But, besides these endearing virtues, the apostle undoubtedly designed to enjoin every other act of a generous and disinterested, a candid and sympathizing heart; every instance of gentleness to the faults, and condescension to the weaknesses, of men; moderation and humility in advantageous circumstances, and patient composedness in low and afflicted ones, every ornamental, as well as more substantial, duty of life; affability of conversation, obliging attentions, kind compliances; whatever will make our common journey through the world mutually comfortable and pleasing, without making it dangerous; and exhibit religion in its native cheerfulness, as a reasonable service paid to an infinitely good being: for all these things are comprehended under the character of lovely; and constitute a much more valuable part of christian practice, than many seem to be aware of. Indeed piety and virtue, however unpolished, deserve high esteem; and it would be a most unhappy mistake, to prefer superficial accomplishments before intrinsic worth. But still, both religion and morals, disguised under a forbidding look, appear so much less to advantage, than when they wear an inviting one; that we wrong our profession as well as ourselves, if we neglect to shew it in as much beauty as a modest simplicity will permit: and thus to adorn the doctrine of God our Saviour in all things. (Tit. ii. 10.)

Nor is it enough to practise what we think right and worthy and becoming, but we ought further to respect, in a proper degree, what the rest of mankind esteem so. And therefore the Apostle adds in the sixth place, whatsoever things are of good report; and places this head after the others; because, if a competition arises, conscience is always to be preferred before common opinion. And indeed numberless are the poor wretches, who have been utterly ruined, by sacrificing at once their virtue and common sense to reigning sins and follies. Not that, in general, the public voice is nearly so favourable to wrong conduct, as some are willing to imagine. Al, who are not guilty of it, we may be sure will disapprove it. Many who are, condemn it even in themselves. Nay, such as encourage others in it, often censure them for it severely notwithstanding. Or, was every bad man true to his own bad cause, yet both their weight, and even their number, is less considerable than they would have it thought. The gay and the loud, the bold and the forward, say the great and the noble, however they fill the eye, are by no means the whole of the world: but there is reason on many accounts to look beyond these; and inquire, what the serious and considerate, what the generality and bulk of mankind, whom it is neither modest nor prudent to despise, will think of our conduct: what hath been the judgment of time past on the like behaviour; what is likely to be the judgment of time to come; when we shall be spoken of without ceremony, and have the characters that we appear to deserve, indelibly fixed on us: a matter about which we cannot really be indifferent though we may affect it.

Nor ought the opinion of mankind only to assist in deterring us from what we know to be wrong; but restrain us from many things, that we possibly imagine very allowable. We may apprehend, perhaps, that such and such liberties have no harm in them. But if others, worthy of regard, apprehend they have; may not we be mistaken as easily as they? And is not the safer side the better? Or were we sure that we judge right, is there no deference owing, in point of decency, to the contrary judgment? especially if it be the general, the established one? Besides, may we not endanger duties of great importance, by destroying wantonly even the slighter outworks that defend them? May not our transgressing what is commonly esteemed sacred, lead some to esteem nothing sacred; and others to suspect that we esteem nothing so? Now this latter effect alone, or any thing that approaches towards it, would surely be very undesirable. And they, who have no concern what they are thought to be, are in danger of having but little concern what they do.

The apostle, having thus recommended every thing that we can discover to be a law of life, and every thing accounted such by the wise and good, may seem now to have gone the utmost length that precept could go. But he had still one thing in reserve for the seventh and last place, to complete and crown the whole. Besides the constant obligations of all men, expressed hitherto; some, indeed most, on one occasion or another, are qualified for actions of distinguished excellence, transcending the common measures of duty. And though none should aim at what is beyond his strength, and all should first ground themselves thoroughly in things necessary before they aspire farther; and ever beware of doing the least evil, to bring about the greatest good; yet, these precautions being observed, if there be any virtue, and if there be any praise; any singular opportunity for exerting superior goodness, and acquiring proportionable honour; to this also the word of God, far from discountenancing an ambition so laudable, excites and encourages in the text. Here then every one is called forth, by the voice of Heaven, to every thing great and good, that shall at any time lie in his power; to serve his Creator, and benefit his fellow-creatures, the most eminently that he can, by all the means that his knowledge and wealth, his example and persuasion, his influence and authority, can furnish out. And blessed is that servant, whom his Lord, when he cometh, shall find so doing. (Matth. xxiv. 46. Luke, xii. 43.)

These then are the things on which the apostle directs us to think: and the general observation which I would make upon them, in the second place, is, that we cannot think of them in earnest, as enjoined by our religion, without honouring it highly, and being strongly moved by it to every part of right temper and right conduct. Such precepts evidently prove, that christianity is not a contrivance to make men, by faith in speculations, and exactness in observances, happy in another world, without being good in the present. Articles of belief, and institutions of worship, are instruments only proper indeed, and appointed ones; and we must never hope to be amended or accepted, unless we take the way to be so which God hath marked out. But neither must we hope, that a formal use of the means will be sufficient, without serious care to attain the end. Now the end of the commandment is charity, love to God and man, out of a pure heart, and of a good conscience, and of faith unfeigned (1 Tim. i. 5); which words express the very same temper with those in the text.

If then these be the things which mankind have need to learn, and God expects; it should be remembered, that they are taught in perfection by the scripture revelation, and the methods of acquiring them too; that neither the one, nor the other, were ever taught without revelation, either generally or statedly; or without gross defects and errors; and that they who reject this way of instruction and worship, have not pretended to substitute any other; but shewn, by neglecting the commands, and transgressing the restraints of natural religion, that their disregard to christianity proceeds from bad motives; and will produce, in proportion as it increases and spreads, the very worst effects. Whoever, therefore, is indeed concerned for true virtue and moral piety, will affectionately esteem those incomparable lessons of each, which the gospel affords him; and whoever hath at all a due sense, how very often he hath violated, on one occasion or another, the dictates of both will rejoice from his heart in those assurances and means of forgiveness for what is past, and assistance in what is to come, with which nothing but the gospel can bless him. For, however thoughtless offenders may flatter themselves, every considerate mind must see and feel, that sin deserves punishment, and repentance is not innocence; that pardon and grace are not debts, but voluntary favours; and God alone can inform his creatures with certainty, on what terms he will bestow them, and to what degree. Now he hath accordingly informed us, that only faith in Christ, working by love, attaineth any thing (Gal. v. 6.), and that shall entitle us to every thing.

But then faith is not mere belief; nor is love mere admiration of the advantages and promises of the gospel; but being moved by these to an uniform practice of its laws is the single evidence which proves their genuineness ; and unhappily is the very attainment of which the generality of men fall short. Some there are who retain the name of christians, and seem to think it their due, though perhaps they scarce remember the time when they performed any one act of christian devotion, at least in private. On public worship it may be, or some part of it, they do attend sometimes, to save appearances, or in hope of entertainment, or from a confused notion of its being, they scarce know why, a duty ; but without the least conception, almost, of any further difference, between having religion, and having none. Others, that make a conscience, such as it is, of part of what they are commanded, have no regard at all to the rest ; but they will be pious without virtue, or virtuous without piety ; or they will chuse, just as they fancy which of the laws of either they will obey — such they will not. Even the more true — and seldom think of aspiring to eminence of goodness ; and they, who in many respects attain high perfection, often fail, most unhappily, of adding the beauty of holiness to the reality of it, by an amiable and obliging deportment and conversation. Thus it comes to pass, that some despise religion as useless ; and others are disgusted with it, as harsh and disagreeable ; that not a few of its professors will find it contribute only to their heavier condemnation ; and many of those who are entitled to reward will obtain a much inferior reward to what they might have done ; and all owing to the neglect of thinking, as they ought, on the important virtues recommended in the text. We give much attention to low and transitory things ; too much, it may be feared, to sinful and forbidden ones. We must know these excellent qualifications to be the worthiest objects of our thoughts ; why should they not also be the most constantly present to them ? But suppose they were, it is of no more use to think with speculative delight on the precepts, than the privileges of the gospel : but we must so consider both them and ourselves, as diligently to examine, and faithfully bring to account (for this the word thinking in strictly denotes in the original) our duty and our practice under each article ; and compute the goodness of our condition, not by the state that we possess, either of the gay, or the solemn trifles, to which alone men commonly attend ; but solely by the result of this momentous inquiry, made with great impartiality, and with earnest prayer for the divine illumination. Nor will thinking on our spiritual state, merely enough to know it, benefit us ; without thinking effectually how to mend and improve it ; by imploring God's pardon for every thing wrong, and ascribing to his grace every thing right in us ; and asking and using his future assistance, to withstand all temptation, and increase in all goodness. These things, therefore, think on and do : and the God of peace shall be with you. (Phil. iv. 9.)

SERMON XCV.

By GEORGE FOTHERGILL, D. D. Principal of St. Edmund's Hall, Oxford.

The Importance of a Religious Principle to personal Virtue and Happiness.

PSALM XXXVII. 31.

The law of his God is in his heart — none of his steps shall slide.

AMONG those unhappy consequences, which disputes about religion are usually found to draw after them, this is none of the least considerable—that, whilst they unsettle the minds of many, and actually overthrow the faith of some, they too generally draw off the attention of others from what always ought to be the principal object of it. It is true, knowledge may, by this means, be increased ; so that most men shall become qualified, at least shall think themselves qualified, to discuss these points with skill and subtilty. But, I fear, we are too apt to rest here ; to consider religion as a matter of notion only and speculation, as calculated for the purposes of intellectual entertainment, rather than of vital improvement in virtue and holiness ; and, if so, our concern about religion ends where it ought only to begin ; whilst we make that the whole business of it, which is, indeed no more than an introduction to it.

Religion has not always been thus treated: in the Psalmist's days particularly we find, it was thought worthy, not only to fill the heads, and to employ the tongues, but to warm the hearts, of its professors. The mouth of the righteous man, it seems, as opportunities offered themselves, was exercised in wisdom, and his tongue would be talking of judgment. (Psal. xxxvii. 30.) So much regard, he well knew, the importance of divine truths demanded from him. But then, (Matt. xii. 34.) out of the abundance of the heart his mouth spake on such occasions. Nor was his discourse only instructive, but his life unblameable, because his sense of religion was hearty and affectionate. The law of his God was in his heart; therefore none of his steps did slide.

And, however the professors of religion may be altered, the nature of things is still the same. The religion, which will ever be of real service in the regulation of our conduct, must still be, as it was then, seated in the heart. Out of the heart are the issues of life, (Prov. iv. 23.): and nothing will be able effectually to give motion and direction to our several powers, which does not first affect this main spring within us. In proportion as religion is or is not the ruling principle in the heart, its influence on men's whole outward behaviour will be powerful and prevailing, or weak only and precarious. When the law of his God is in a man's heart, then, and then only, none of his steps shall slide.

The words contain a short, but just, description of one principal ingredient in the upright man's character, and an engaging recommendation of it from its happy effect upon his conduct. And, in order to consider them as usefully as may be, I shall endeavour, in the plainest manner I can,

I. First, To shew, what is implied in the expression, "The law of his God is in his heart;" and, who is entitled to that character.

II. Secondly, To illustrate the beneficial influence of such a principle, here expressed by its preserving a man's step from sliding. And,

III. Thirdly, to subjoin an useful inference or two, resulting from the foregoing heads.

I. By the law of God, it is obvious to understand, in general, that rule of our actions which is bound upon our consciences by the authority of God, in what way soever the particulars of it come to our knowledge.

The heart is in Scripture variously used to signify the understanding, the memory, or the affections; and, according to any of these acceptations, the law of God may be said to be in the heart; indeed it must be so in each of them, fully to answer the character now before us. And,

1. To have the law of God in the heart, is to have it in the understanding; that is, not only to have a full conviction of the being of God, and proper notions of his attributes, but to be well acquainted, with his will and our own duty in the several branches of it. This is what the Psalmist elsewhere expresses, by having understanding in the way of Godliness, (Psal. ci. 2.); and, how necessary it is to have the law of God in the heart, in this sense of the word, previously to the others, is (I suppose) too evident to need any illustration. A due degree of knowledge in the nature and particulars of God's law is so necessary a preparative to the regular observance of it, that we can scarce take one step right without it. Nay, our very zeal, if not under the guidance of knowledge, instead of holding up our goings, will often be to us an occasion of falling. This point, therefore, must be first secured. And then,

2. We must have the law of God in the heart, as that stands for the thoughts and memory; that is, we must frequently call forth that knowledge, which is in the mind habitually, into its actual view and perception. This is what the Psalmist calls meditating on the law of God, and exercising one's self in it (Psal. i. 2.); and this he, with great reason, represents as being the good man's employment day and night. For, it is certain, vain will the most complete knowledge of God's will be, if not frequently brought to remembrance. Truth will ever be found to influence men's practice in proportion, not as it is known, but as it is attended to, by them. Temptations, when present, will easily overpower such persuasions as are only habitual; and, in fact, more souls are destroyed for want of consideration, than for lack of knowledge. However,

3. The law of God, to have its proper efficacy, must not only be in the understanding and memory; but also in the love and affections; this is to have one's delight in the law of God; and is indeed the most proper sense of having it in the heart. It was thus the Psalmist was himself affected towards it, when, in the overflowing of his zeal, he cried out, Oh, how I love thy law! (Psal. cxix. 97.) And, again, The law of thy mouth is dearer unto me than thousands of gold and silver. (Ibid. 72.) We are informed by some, who profess to have an intimate acquaintance with human nature, that every man has some one favourite pursuit, some ruling passion, to which all others are only subordinate, and so, in case of interference, constantly give way. Now this, in the person I am describing, must be the law of God; that is, a regard to God's authority, a desire of pleasing, and a dread of offending him. God's loving kindness is, to such a man, better than life itself (Psal. lxxiii. 3.); and nothing will be allowed to stand in competition with obedience to his commands.

Upon the whole; The man, that would be entitled to the character in my text, must neglect no opportunities of informing himself aright concerning the divine will and his own duty, which knowledge, when attained, he must not suffer to lie dormant within him, but must call it forth, into actual view, with frequency and seriousness, as a matter, not to be confined to the head, but to engage the heart; to be recollected and reviewed, not for the purposes only of speculation, but as a rule of conduct bound upon his conscience by the Author of his being, and the Disposer of his happiness; until the importance of God's law, and a regard to his authority, becomes a consideration always present with his mind, always uppermost there; a principle ruling in his heart, and effectually diffusing its vital influence over his whole life and conversation.

This, I conceive, is the import of al. expression, the law of his God is in his heart; and such the person entitled to that character; the excellency of which, and the great reason and encouragement we have to aspire after it, may appear, by considering,

II. Secondly, the beneficial influence of such a principle, as here expressed by its preserving a man's step from sliding.

The expression is figurative; and may denote the security and the steadiness of a man's conduct: and, in both respects, the principle of an awful regard to the divine will is highly beneficial. It gives security from error, from sin, from misery; and it gives steadiness and consistency, and by that means self-complacency and dignity to the person possessed of it. All this a religious principle, seated in the heart, procures; generally, I mean, and for the most part, though not universally, or without exception; and that both by the blessing of God, and from its own natural tendency.

And, first, a sincerely devout frame of mind secures to us the above-mentioned advantages, by conciliating the blessing of Almighty God. How necessary the Divine favour is to the right ordering of our steps, every thinking man feels, and every ingenuous man will acknowledge. Accordingly, the book of Psalms (that invaluable treasure of the most exalted strains of rational piety) is every where full of petitions to this purpose. The royal Penman had in himself experienced the inability of man by his own wisdom to direct his steps, or by his own strength to preserve them from falling. Hence we find him continually imploring the Divine direction and support: Order my steps in thy word, and so shall no wickedness have dominion over me! (Psal. cxix. 133.) And, again, Oh, hold thou up my goings in thy paths, that my footsteps slip not! (Psal. xvii. 5.)

Now, if any thing may, by the light of nature, be known of God, or with certainty collected from thence concerning his methods of governing the moral world; of this we may be assured, that he will in a more especial manner favour and regard those of his children, whose xiv.; are warmed with an affectionate for, wn for the honour of his laws, and turned awe of his authority. We are not, however, left to the deductions of our reason in this particular; God himself having, in his holy word, given us many explicit declarations to the same purpose; among which the following is introduced with a solemnity so remarkable, that, as I must not pass by it, so I need not add to it any other: Thus saith the High and Lofty One, that inhabiteth eternity! whose name is Holy! I dwell in the high and holy place; with him also that is of a contrite and humble spirit (Isaiah lvii. 15.); and again, by the same Prophet, To this man will I look, even to him that is poor and of a contrite spirit, and that trembleth at my word! (Isaiah lxvi. 6.)

But, farther; the temper of mind here recommended, is not only by God's promise entitled to receive, but has, in the course of his providence, an aptness to procure, the advantages above hinted at. And this you will now permit me to illustrate, a little more particularly, in regard to each of those advantages, in the order wherein I have already recited them:

1. To begin with that of security from error; and this both in matters wherein our belief, and those in which our practice, is concerned.

Where the principle of a true and rational piety has taken possession of the heart, error in religious matters, especially such as carries men to the lengths of schism, heresy, or infidelity, will not ordinarily find admittance. A man of this frame of mind proceeds in his inquiries with calmness and sedateness, with impartiality and freedom from prejudice, with modesty and humility. His understanding is well prepared for receiving the evidences of religion, or of any fundamental article of it: and his will has no reluctance, no objection, to admitting them. If in his progress he finds (as even a sincere inquirer may find) some things hard to be understood, he will not presently give up what is plain and evident, for the sake of what as yet may seem somewhat doubtful or difficult. Difficulties, he considers, must, from the nature of things, attend our religion, supposing it true; and these therefore he does not consider as proofs as it is no less applicable to errors of a moral is not so. He will, however, by them, approach as more immediately re-according to his abilities, whether the difficulties he meets with may not be surmounted by patience and attention; and, where his own abilities fail him, he will not refuse to call in all proper assistances; particularly those of persons, whom he has cause to presume, and is willing to believe, wiser than himself; and their's most especially, who are by God's own appointment, set apart for this purpose. The truth is, it is from half-thinking, not free-thinking, that dangerous error or infidelity commonly arises; as again, such half-thinking is generally occasioned by the want of an hearty desire to know and to do the will of God. Where the heart is not animated by the law of God, the man will probably exert just thought enough (and a very little thought will be sufficient) to raise a few doubts about our holy religion, without farther troubling himself to pursue them to any rational conclusion, or vouchsafing to seek for any solution of them from others: or, it may be, he has been far enough from home to have seen much hypocrisy or much bigotry under the profession of Christianity; and he will not be persuaded, but that every appearance of it is fairly resolvable into one or other of these principles: nay, if vanity or vicious prejudice strongly predominate in his constitution; he may perhaps be at the pains of working up such difficulties or such abuses in religion into formidable objections against it. But where sincere piety and a sound mind happily unite in conducting the important inquiry, the case is far otherwise: the arguments in favour of every divine institution will have their due weight, and those against it no more than their due weight: and then, we need neither be ashamed of the gospel of Christ: (Rom. i. 16.), nor afraid lest it should fail of approving itself, to such an enquirer, as being the power of God and the wisdom of God (1 Cor. i. 23, 24.); however its doctrines may, to the superficial or the conceited thinker, be a stumbling-block: and its precept to the vicious and debauched liver, foolishness.

And, as this is generally found true of our conceptions in matters of faith, so is it no less applicable to errors of a moral nature. He will, however, by them, approach as more immediately relate to the conduct of life. A sincere resolution to act agreeably to the law of God, is ordinarily one of the most faithful interpreters of it. It holds good in relation to practice, as well as belief, that if any man will do God's will (John, vii. 17.) or is ready and desirous to do it, he shall know of the action or undertaking; whether it be of God or not. He, who has the authority of God always uppermost upon his mind, and who resolves, at all hazards, to submit his actions to it, usually finds his duty lying plainly enough before him. Mistakes about practice generally arise from some perverse inclination, some impetuous desire, some carnal affection not subject to the law of God. (Rom. viii. 7.) These first make men deliberate about questions, which to an honest and good heart would have been no questions at all; and then hurry them on to a determination of the affected debate agreeably to the strength, not of evidence in the thing, but of inclination in themselves. Hence the way of the wicked is said to be as darkness; (Prov. iv. 19.) and the wicked are represented as groping in the dark at noon-day (Job, v. 14.) they perplex themselves in the clearest cases: and, no wonder; since, in this sense also, they love darkness rather than light, because their intentions and desires are evil. (Job, iii. 19.) On the contrary, the upright man sees his duty clearly, because he is willing to perform it conscientiously. The path of the just is as the shining light, which shineth more and more unto a perfect day. (Prov. iv. 18.) But,

• Secondly, An affectionate and awful regard to the authority of God, is a most effectual preservative against sin and wickedness.

This is indeed a point so evident, that it will hardly admit of any illustration. Sin, in the very notion of it, is a transgression of God's law: and, it is certain, all wilful transgression of God's law must proceed, not from a settled disbelief of his providence, at least from a present disregard of the important consequences of it. Accordingly, My heart sheweth me the wickedness of the ungodly (saith the Psalmist), that there is no fear of God before his eyes. (Psal. xxxvi. 1.) Into the want of this principle he justly resolves all the vices and villanies of which men are guilty. And, in fact, where this principle is wanting, no sense of honour, no fear of disgrace, no dread of punishment, will be a sufficient security. But the law of the Lord is perfect, converting the soul; the testimony of the Lord is sure, making wise the simple. (Psal. xix.) The fear of God will preserve a man's innocence, when nothing else can reach him. The darkness is no darkness, can promise no concealment, and is therefore no temptation, to that man, who has always upon his mind a prevailing sense of his presence, to whom darkness and light are both alike. (Psal. cxxxix. 12.) There is no engagement so pressing as not to allow time to ask this short question: How can I do this great wickedness and sin against God? (Gen. xxxix. 9.) And this question, when properly attended to, must needs silence the most inviting solicitation. The enticements of pleasure, and even the dread of the most powerful human resentment, every allurements that can address itself to that part of our nature in which we are most weakly guarded, shall fall before this one consideration, How can I do this great wickedness and sin against God? (Gen. xxxix. 9.)

And, as a sincere principle of piety is a most powerful, so it is usually a most lasting, preservative against sin. Where a filial awe of the Divine Being, an hearty desire of obeying and pleasing him, and a prevailing fear of offending him, is deeply rooted in the soul, such a frame of mind, notwithstanding the depravity of our nature, is seldom completely lost. Overpowered indeed it may be for a time; but it generally, sooner or later, reasserts its dominion; and if, in the mean while, it cannot restrain the man from sin, it however makes his progress in it less easy and agreeable; and gives the overtures of divine grace a more advantageous influence upon the mind. Let Jeroboam (1 Kings, xiii. 4.) receive never so many awakening intimations of God's displeasure; let his right hand be dried up, and the son of his bosom cut off in the flower of his age (1 Kings, xiv.); yet all this shall be lost upon him; for, we read, after this Jeroboam returned not from his evil way (1 Kings, xiii. 33.), but persisted in his impiety and idolatry. But, let David (2 Sam. xii. 13.) receive a seasonable reproof from a prophet, and he shall presently confess and lament his foul offence, and offer unto God the sacrifice of a broken and contrite heart. (Psal. li.) The cause of so remarkably different a reception of the divine chastisements was plainly this : David was, in the prevailing part of his character, a man of piety, one who had the law of his God in his heart : whilst Jeroboam appears to have been an entire stranger to the power of godliness, and only for secular purposes to have made use of the form of it. So true is the observation of Solomon in this sense also : the just man (Prov. xxiv. 16), he who has a right principle, falleth seven times and riseth again ; but the wicked falleth into mischief ; because he falleth without recovery. Which brings me to shew, Thirdly, That an hearty regard to the law of God is the most secure preservative we can have against danger, disappointment, and misery.

I say, the most secure preservative ; because it must not be expected, in the present state of things, that piety itself should be found an infallible security against danger or disappointment, any more than against errors or failings. As there are wicked men, to whom it happeneth according to the work of the righteous ; so there are good men, to whom it happeneth according to the work of the wicked. (Eccles. viii. 14.) And yet, notwithstanding this, there is great reason to believe, the real happiness of this life, though not always the seeming prosperity of it, is distributed among the sons of men with a more equitable hand than careless observers may be apt to imagine. And if, instead of forming our judgments from present appearances, we would remember the end (Eccles. vii. 36.), and take into our estimate the whole of God's dispensations towards particular persons, even in this life, we should more rarely judge or do amiss.

There is a way which seemeth right unto a man, but the end thereof are the ways of death. (Prov. xiv. 12.) We often vainly flatter ourselves, we shall gain some favourite point, or avoid some dreaded mischief, by some more certain and more compendious method than that which the law of God prescribes or allows of ; and possibly for some time all things may look fair and promising. But Infinite Wisdom hath innumerable ways of defeating our best-concerted projects, or even of rendering us, perhaps, still more unhappy by the present seeming success of them. He that getteth riches and not by right (says the Prophet) shall leave them in the midst of his days ; and at his end shall be a fool. (Jer. xvii. 11.) The same is true of every other acquisition. No sooner are we departed from the safe road of our duty, but we have put ourselves out of God's protection, and thrown ourselves at the mercy of every cross accident : hence disappointments and afflictions ; and these falling with double weight upon a mind, conscious of having brought them upon itself, and unsupported by the aids and comforts of religion, those only present helps in trouble. Whereas, so long as we continue in the plain path of God's commandments, we not only secure his favour, but engage the friendship of the valuable part of mankind ; we escape many interferences and rencounters with the passions and the vices of others, to which a deviation from duty would have exposed us : and, should any persons, without provocation given on our part, be ill-disposed towards us, they will scarcely, for their own sakes, venture to harm us so long as we are followers of that which is good. (1 Pet. iii. 13.) But (which is most considerable) if, after all, we should be permitted by Providence to fall into circumstances of seeming distress ; yet disappointments will lose much of their bitterness, and even calamities of their pressure, whilst we are conscious of having secured his loving kindness who knows what is best for us ; and who is both able and willing to make all things work together to us for good. (Rom. viii. 28.)

Such then is the security which a sincere principle of piety ordinarily gives a man : security from error, from sin, from misery. And it is equally conducive to the steadiness and consistency of his conduct ; for, in this sense also, none of his steps shall slide.

It is the Prophet's just observation, that the wicked are as a troubled sea, when it cannot rest. (Isa. lvii. 20.) The various and opposite motives which successively, and not seldom at the same instant of time, agitate a mind destitute of religion, naturally create distraction in deliberating, diffidence in resolving, and inconstancy in acting. A man, in such a situation, is always dissatisfied, and therefore always uneasy; and, because always uneasy, ever unsettled. And accordingly we find him continually changing his measures; and, as the double-minded man in course must be, unstable in all his ways. (Jam. i. 8.) How different the case of that man, who has the law of his God in his heart! He has a plain rule and an honest mind, to direct the application of it. He first ponders well the path of his goings, and then turneth not to the right-hand or to the left. (Prov. iv. 26, 27.) He first takes due care to inform his judgment, and then pursues what that tells him is right, without deviation; as well knowing, what is right at one time must be right for ever in the same circumstances. He is steady without obstinacy; and proceeds with uniformity of conduct, because with singleness of heart, fearing God. (Col. iii. 22.)

The excellency of the principle now before us, in this respect, might easily be pursued through every relation, every station and condition of life. But never is its influence more seasonably exerted than in unquiet and intricate times; at such seasons, the man possessed of it, will not needlessly expose himself to danger; nor, where danger is unavoidable, will he refuse those succours which reason and prudence offer. But, then, he absolutely rejects all expedients inconsistent with God's law: and, after the use of fair and honest means, is not afraid to trust Providence with the issue. In the result, such a man generally extricates himself with more honour and more satisfaction, than any of those projectors who have not God in all their thoughts; and, whilst these latter kindling a fire and compassing themselves with sparks, and for some time vainly walking in the light of their fire and in the sparks that they have kindled, shall lie down in sorrow (Isai. i. 11.); unto the upright there ariseeth light in the darkness (Psal. cxli.

4.)—Light, to direct his steps, to cheer his heart, to clear up his innocence, and to make his just-dealing as the noon-day. (Psal. xxxvii. 6.)

And now, upon a view of the foregoing particulars, we may see the justness of the Psalmist's declaration, Blessed is the man whose strength is in thee! in whose heart are thy ways! (Psal. lxxxiv. 3.) and the great reason each of us hath to implore the divine grace in his language, Oh, knit my heart unto thee, that I may fear thy name. (Psal. lxxxvi. 11.) But I hasten, as was proposed,

III. Thirdly and lastly, To subjoin an inference or two, arising from what has been said.

And, in the first place, you will, from what has appeared, readily infer with me, the great usefulness and importance of a good education of youth.

We have seen, what advantages arise from having the law of God in the understanding, the memory, and the affections. But at no season of life can this great point be so well secured as in tender years. It is then truths of a moral or religious nature find their way most easily into the understanding, make the deepest impression in the memory, and take the most lasting hold of the affections. It is then good principles are most readily acquired; and principles then acquired are least liable to be overpowered or lost.

It is one great misfortune in man's present constitution, that he has not only a law in his members warring against the law in his mind (Rom. vii. 23.), but that this carnal principle has the advantage of first possession. The powers of the mind continue for some years in a kind of non-age, whilst those of sense and appetite are daily advancing to a considerable degree of strength and vigour; by which means these latter have often so far gained the ascendant, as to render it extremely difficult for reason and conscience ever afterwards to dispossess them. Now, an early good education is an excellent remedy against this inconvenience. Places of education are a kind of public repositories, from whence that observation and experience and justness of thought, which the young person has not of his own growth, is applied to his use out of the common stock; and hence also, not only knowledge is dispensed to yet unfurnished minds, but restraint and discipline to appetites yet capable of being regulated by them. Hence, in short, the intellectual faculties receive proper assistance, whilst the sensitive are kept within their due bounds. Should this proceeding be called, instilling of prejudices: I see not any thing so very formidable in the charge. If youth be by nature in some degree prejudiced against virtue and goodness, and would be much more so by custom and example, what method can be better suited to the exigencies of our present condition, than that of seasonably counteracting those prejudices by others of a more salutary tendency, and more agreeable to the genuine and undepraved constitution of our minds; such as are calculated to restore our reason to its just pre-eminence, and to reinstate conscience in that dominion for which it was originally designed? Or, where can be the mighty harm of rescuing those souls from the snare of the devil, who would otherwise be taken captives by him at his will (2 Tim. ii. 26.); and of rendering them vessels unto honour, sanctified and meet for their proper master's use, and prepared unto every good work? (2 Tim. ii. 21.)

Again: As we may from what has been said, observe the advantages of an early good education; so it is obvious to infer farther, what ought to be the principal aim and employment of it.

Wherewithal then should a young man be taught to cleanse his way? Even by ruling himself after God's word. (Psal. cxix. 9.) It is this, we have seen, which alone will be able to conduct us through the several stages of life with security and steadiness: this therefore is the point which ought always to be in the view both of teacher and learner. Other knowledge may undoubtedly be highly ornamental and highly useful, nay, to different persons in different degrees, highly necessary. But, after all, it is the fear of God that must cleanse our way, which must sanctify all our pursuits, and be both the beginning and end of whatever deserves the name of wisdom. Young minds must, therefore, by all means, be seasoned with an holy awe and reverence for him that ought to be feared. If this necessary principle, this good seed (Comp. Matt. xiii. Mark, iv. Luke, viii.) be not sown in the heart now, it will scarcely ever after bring forth fruit unto perfection; it will either fall upon hearts already hardened by an habitual course of sin; or, however, the cares of the world, the delectableness of riches, or the lusts of other things, will be apt to spring up with it and choke it. But if it be sown early in the good ground (2 Kin. xxii. 19.) of a pure and tender heart, it will most probably rise in a plentiful harvest of exemplary virtue and holiness.

We have the force of an early piety remarkably exemplified in the case of Obadiah. He was governor of the house of Ahab (1 Kin. xviii. 3.); a king who had sold himself to work wickedness beyond all that were before him (1 Kin. xvi. 33. and xxi. 25.), and whose wife Jezebel seems to have had nothing so much at heart as the destruction of all the Lord's Prophets. (1 Kin. xviii. 4.) These were trying circumstances. For the first favourite of such a master, and the chief officer in such a court, notwithstanding his precarious situation, and (as it were) in despite of her displeasure on whose favour its continuance must have greatly depended,—to hide the Prophets of the Lord by fifty in a cave, and to feed them with bread and water. This was a proceeding not very reconcilable with the maxims of worldly policy. And yet, we cease to wonder at a conduct so uncommonly brave and generous, after himself has explained the true grounds of it, I, thy servant, fear the Lord from my youth. (1 Kin. xviii. 12.)

Once more: If the advantages of an early religious education are so great, what fruits may justly be expected, both by God and man, from those persons, who happily enjoy this inestimable benefit?

Need I remind you, how eminently many of us are concerned in this reflection? Whilst the far greatest part of mankind about us are continually busied in taking thought for their life what they shall eat and what they shall drink (Matt. vi. 31.), and procuring by the sweat of their faces these necessary accommodations of it, we are, by our very situation, removed from the bodily labour, and in great measure from the distracting cares of this world: we are at full liberty, nay by peculiar encouragements invited, to seek first the kingdom of God and his righteousness (Matt. vi. 33.); whilst not only by his general promise, but by special provisions for the same purpose, all these things are added unto us. But, farther:

Even those of our studies here, which may seem to have no direct tendency to form in us a religious principle, are however of great use, if rightly improved, in supporting and cherishing it. When we turn the eye of the understanding inward upon itself, the Divinity meets us in every thought, and calls upon us to adore that goodness, by which our minds as well as our bodies are fearfully and wonderfully made. If we look abroad, the heavens declare the glory of God, and the firmament sheweth his handy-work. (Psal. xix. 1.) Throughout all our researches into nature, we trace the footsteps of stupendous Wisdom and Majesty, obliging us to cry out with the Psalmist, O Lord, how glorious are thy works! Thy thoughts are very deep? (Psal. xcii. 5, 6.) And, should any among us be so brutish as not to consider this, yet the stated returns of our morning and evening sacrifice, and the laws by which you compel them to come in to the more immediate presence of their Creator and Preserver, their Redeemer and Sanctifier, can hardly fail of striking the minds of the most unthinking, with some degree of awe and veneration for that tremendous Being, who is very greatly to be feared in the council of the saints, and to be had in reverence of all them that are round about him. (Psal. lxxxix. 7.)

Let me add, in justice to these institutions, that lest our devotion should degenerate into superstition, or be overheated into enthusiasm, sound learning is here taught to go hand-in-hand with unaffected piety. Our devotion, not spoiled by vain philosophy, is here regulated by sober reason, and adorned by a due application to every branch of useful knowledge. Our holy religion is indeed all glorious within (Psal. xlv. 13.): but she never appears with more gracefulness or dignity, than when the sciences are (as it is here best provided that they always shall be) the virgins that be her fellows, and that bear her company. (Psal. xlv. 14.)

What remains then, but that having these great and precious privileges (with which many others might be mentioned), we should improve them to the purposes for which they are given us, perfecting holiness in the fear of God. We expect, many of us (I suppose), shortly to be called forth, from these retirements, into a world, where we shall be sure to meet with a great variety of temptations and trials: and I need not now observe to you, how much will probably depend upon the preparation at first made for this most interesting conflict. Let us then lay hold on the opportunity we here enjoy, for taking to us the whole armour of God, that we may be able to stand in the evil day, and having done all to stand. (Eph. iv.)

Upon the whole, then, and to conclude: The principle, which I have all along been inculcating and recommending, by explaining its nature and illustrating its usefulness, is that of an awful and affectionate regard to the law and authority of Almighty God. And that this important principle may have its perfect work upon every one of us; let us always bear in mind, that we are every moment under the inspection of God's all-seeing eye: that there is not a word in our tongue, but he knoweth it altogether; not a thought within our breast, but he understandeth it long before (Psal. xvi. 8.): he at present marks all our steps, so he will hereafter call us to an impartial account, and assign us our portion of everlasting happiness or endless torment, according to the righteous judgment which shall then be passed upon them.—These truths let us remember, not in general only: and historically, as positions to which we yield a merely speculative assent, and which we can upon occasion demonstrate to others; but let us bring them home to our hearts and consciences, as truths of the most serious concern, of the last importance to us.—If thus, like holy David, we set God always before us (Psal. xvi.

8.), like him, too, we shall not be moved. The apprehension of God's presence shall be the guard of our innocence and the support of our steps here; until the enjoyment of his presence shall be our exceeding great reward for evermore hereafter.

SERMON XCVI.

Importance of Religion to Civil Societies.

GENESIS, XX. 11.

And Abraham said, Because I thought, surely the fear of God is not in this place; and they will slay me for my wife's sake.

THAT the general belief and public acknowledgment of those great principles of religion, the being of a God and his providence, are necessary to secure the order and happiness of civil societies, is an opinion confirmed by the united suffrage of the thinking part of mankind in all former ages. Not only the advocates for religion, after having established its truth, generally insist on its importance to men's social interests; but its very enemies have been forced to give us such accounts of its original and propagation, as plainly imply a confession, that the belief of it has always been thought necessary, to deceive mankind into a compliance with the rules of virtue, and a participation of the benefits of society.

This opinion, however, while suffered to keep possession, must needs be a considerable prejudice against all attempts in favour of irreligion. Accordingly, some of those, who, in this age of doubting, have discovered an inclination less favourable to religion, and every thing related to it, have (consistently enough) endeavoured to remove this obstruction. Hence, as it should seem, we have been entertained with calculations of the effects of theism, scepticism, and even atheism, upon moral goodness; and the same persons who have pleaded for subjecting the most sacred truths to the test of railery and ridicule, have also proposed it as a problem, whether an atheist may not possibly be a man of virtue and merit? shewing a willingness at least to answer it in the affirmative. And, should speculations of this kind be thought harmless amusements only of refined and contemplative heads, yet, our own observation, I fear, may but too fully convince us, that something more than amusement has been the consequence of them. Unconcernedness about religious principles, in general, seems to have been for some time succeeding into the place of (what used to be accounted) a just abhorrence of infidelity and atheism. Our late pretenders to free-thinking have, indeed, for the most part, chosen avowedly to attack revealed religion only; and even in such their attempts the interests of the public may perhaps be found by no means slightly concerned. But it is well-known also, that the arguments they have generally employed for that purpose, are calculated to carry their deluded followers still farther. And there is great cause to believe, that those persons, whom such cavils are sufficient to remove from the faith of the gospel, very rarely stop short of a disbelief of, at least an indifference towards, all religion whatsoever.

It is therefore become but too seasonable, and will not, I trust, be thought wholly improper on this public and solemn occasion, to reconsider the subject above mentioned; to inquire, whether the general acknowledgment and influence of religious principles be really of so much importance to secure the morals and good order, and (which I will here suppose to be connected with these) the happiness, of societies, as has been commonly imagined? That, if it should, upon inquiry, appear to be so, we may reflect, before it be too late, what consequences may be justly apprehended, should a disregard for religion and things sacred make any farther advances amongst us.

The reasoning of the Patriarch in the text is, on many accounts, remarkable to the present purpose. Abraham appears, from this history of him (the antiquity of which, at least, our adversaries must give us leave to insist on) to have been one of the most illustrious personages in ancient times. By sojourning in several different countries, he had opportunities of making himself acquainted with the manners and sentiments of several different kinds of people; and this too at a time, when the condition of mankind approached much nearer, than it has since done, to that state of nature, with which some late writers would be thought to be so familiarly conversant. And what was the result of the observations of a person so well qualified to make them with advantage? Why; that the fear of God is the only effectual check upon men's lusts and passions; and that, where any country is supposed destitute of the influences of this principle, there is no immorality, no villainy, no barbarity, which may not justly there be dreaded. This was the conclusion which the Patriarch drew from his acquaintance with mankind. From this he reasoned, and upon this he acted, as an unquestionable truth. And Abraham said, Because I thought, surely the fear of God is not in this place; and they will slay me for my wife's sake.

The fear of God, to which Abraham here supposed the people of Gerar to be strangers, must be understood to be the same principle, by which himself was actuated, and concerning which he had been, in an eminent manner, taught of God. We have, indeed, all the proof that such an affair will admit of, that the religion of all nations, when traced up to its original, was revealed. But it is evident, that the religion of Abraham was directly and immediately such. It will not, then, seem foreign to the import of my text, if occasion be taken from thence to represent to you, not only,

I. First, the importance of religious principles in general to national virtue and happiness; but,

II. Secondly, the excellency of those of revealed religion in particular to this purpose; and then,

III. Thirdly, Some of those useful inferences that most naturally result from the foregoing considerations.

I. First, then: The importance of religion to morality may be illustrated two ways: by inquiring, whether, on the supposition of no religion, there could be, in reason, any proper obligation to moral virtue? Or, whether, on the same supposition, there would be, in fact, any effectual inducement to it?

It will be little to our present purpose, to consider this point in the former view.

Whatever be determined concerning any supposed obliging power of moral considerations, separately from those of religion, yet the order and happiness of societies, I mean, as far as the natural tendency of things is concerned, are immediately affected, not by what men's behaviour ought to be, but by what it is in fact found to be. The most useful method of treating this point, therefore, seems to be to inquire, not how men's obligations, but how their actions, will be influenced by religion, or by the want of it. The inquiry is, by this means, brought from the bar of abstract reasoning to the more obvious and more convincing decision of fact and experience; and from considering, what has been hitherto observed concerning human nature, we shall be best able to judge, what may, at all times hereafter, in the same circumstances, be expected from it.

But here we meet with very different accounts, even among those who seem agreed in slighting the provisions of religion. If we will believe some great pretenders to a deep insight into these matters, man is a being by nature wild, unsociable, suspicious, treacherous, malevolent. Others, perhaps, out of an abhorrence of such a view of human nature, have given us representations of it very different from the foregoing one, and in some respects from those of each other; whilst some of them speak of man as if he were nothing but pure intelligence, solely conducted by truth and rectitude; and others, as if he were all good affection, sufficiently actuated by kind instincts, and a love of virtue, for virtue's sake.

The truth, I conceive, lies between the two opinions, which I will venture to call extremes. Human nature is neither so base and odious, a thing as the one would make us believe; nor will experience justify the flattering accounts given us of it by the other. Every good-natured man feels the injuriousness of the former representation; and we need go no farther than to such solemnities as these for a full confutation of the latter.

Man, considered in the views of mere philosophy (and in that manner only the persons we are here contending with will permit us to consider him), may be allowed to be by nature endowed with such faculties as direct, and such dispositions as incline, him to associate with those of his own species; and to be, as by the former enabled, so by the latter excited, to promote the happiness of such associations, when made. But then it must be remembered, that these faculties, these dispositions, as far as they are natural to man, are faculties and dispositions only. To reduce them to acts, there must be willingness and choice; but to improve them into habits, care and cultivation are farther necessary. And, after all, should our discerning faculties prove liable to be obscured and perverted by powers of a different tendency, and our social affections to be checked and restrained by others of a private nature: it is plain, if we sit down contented with surveying only the bright side of human nature, and from contemplating what such a creature may be, conclude what he generally will be, we shall frame a very partial conception concerning that nature, and may find ourselves much disappointed in our expectations from it.

The suppositions I have been just hinting, are by no means merely imaginary. Let us leave our speculations, and follow man into common life, and we shall soon find each of them but too sadly verified. The first appearance that will offer itself to our view, may probably be that of the most useful faculties weakened, and the most generous affections overpowered, by craving appetites, impetuous lusts, and head-strong passions; and (which is still worse) perverted, and rendered subservient to purposes most prejudicial to public welfare. The avarice and ambition of some, the peevishness and resentfulness of others, the lasciviousness and lusts of still more, meeting with the like propensities in other men, would soon, if permitted to operate according to their natural tendencies, render this world a scene of confusion, distraction, and desolation. Man, when under the dominion of his passions, has ever been observed to be one of the most dangerous, most destructive, of creatures. Even those very powers, which, when rightly applied, give him a just pre-eminence over the whole animal creation, serve only, under such a perverse management, to render him more artful in contriving, and more successful in accomplishing, the most mischievous designs.

What is it then, which, at present, restrains mankind from these ravages, this destruction of each other? This is an inquiry, about which those persons are particularly concerned to give us some satisfaction, who imagine they can sufficiently provide for the government of the moral world (as some of their forefathers pretended to have done with regard to the natural), without taking into their schemes the belief of a God, and a Providence. And a variety of expedients will, no doubt, be assigned for this purpose. Great stress will be laid on the powers of reason; greater, still, on the more active principle of benevolence: and mighty things will, by others, be ascribed to a sense of honour; whilst those, who give us the most disadvantageous accounts of human nature, refer us, for a sufficient security of our persons and properties, to the dread of the civil Magistrate. Let us see, then, what might ordinarily be expected from any or all of these, should we be prevailed on to part with (what we have been used to account the foundation and support of each of them) the fear of God.

Reason, as far as it is a part of our nature, has already been observed to be a faculty only; and must, to make it serve to any good purpose, be carefully cultivated, and regularly employed. Give me leave, then, for once, to suppose this faculty to be thus cultivated, thus employed, without either setting out in its inquiries with a sense of religion, or arriving at the discovery in the progress of them. And what will be the result with regard to societies? Why, we are to expect many curious disquisitions upon the nature of a system; upon the proportion which the parts of such system bear to the whole; and, in short, upon the reasonableness; that each member of a community should refer his aims and pursuits, and even sacrifice his private advantage, to the general good. But, to speak freely, whatever may be said for a member of society's sacrificing his own private interests to those of the public, this trust (I suppose) be understood of such private interests only, as make no part of his ultimate happiness. For sure it must ever be extremely difficult, if not impossible, to persuade any man, at least on the foot of reason, to give up his own final interests for any consideration whatsoever. Whereas, without the supposition of a Deity, every good we are possessed of may be our ultimate good; every interest we can forego may prove our final interest. What a damp then must atheism, or even scepticism, cast upon all generous sentiments! How heavily must all public designs proceed, when the conductors of them have not in all their thoughts that Being, who alone can, in case of present interference, bid self-love and social be finally the same.

But, in truth, we need not stay to inquire, what our rational faculties would direct, on the supposition before us. If the united ties of reason and religion are so unable to confine men possessed with the legion of disorderly affections, as we too often find them to be, how easily would men break the bonds of reason only in sunder! With how little concern would they cast away its cords from them! Indeed, who would, in this case, think it worth while to collect the dictates, or to hearken to the voice, of reason? Men that can be contented to have no hope, to be without God in the world (Eph. ii. 12.) must have anticipated the insensibility they expect for their final portion; or, however, they will, in course, soon abandon the care of the rational, and deliver themselves up to a merely animal, life. Why should a man take much fruitless pains, to increase his sorrow by increasing his knowledge; or to cultivate a faculty, the improvement of which could, at best, serve only to render him more ingenious in disquieting himself in vain?

The truth is briefly this: The faculty of reason, when regularly consulted and faithfully followed, will always lead us to the acknowledgment of a Deity, and own itself to be his gift, who teacheth us more than the beasts of the earth, and maketh us wiser than the fowls of heaven (Job. xxxv. 11.); and, when it does this, it comes most strongly recommended to care and cultivation, our attention and reverence. But if, either out of vicious prejudice exclude, or out of self-sufficiency affect an independence upon, the great principles of religion; the dictates of reason become uncertain and precarious; reason loses its dignity, its authority, and becomes a faculty, in every view, wholly unaccountable.

Benevolence is indeed a principle of a more active nature, and may perhaps be thought capable of supplying the deficiencies of reason with regard to social happiness. Not to enter into any dispute concerning the origin of benevolent affection, let us suppose it to be as natural and as universal, as is sometimes contended. Yet surely we need not prove, that men have other affections, equally natural and universal, and at least equally important for their respective gratifications. And whensoever the gratification of the former should interfere with that of these latter, as it frequently would in reality, and more frequently in appearance, we may appeal to experience to determine for us, what the result would generally be, were men actuated by no farther views, no higher principle. Or (which I would observe here once for all) should some few be disposed to hearken to the still small voice of nature in favour of the public; such a disposition could serve only to render its owners a more easy prey to the force or fraud of an infinitely greater number.

How unfriendly a disbelief of the principles of religion must be to public spirit, in the accounts of reason, has been already intimated: but the influence it would have directly and immediately on men's pursuits, and their very tempers, would probably be much more so. The active part of mankind would naturally put themselves under the conduct of the selfish and overbearing passions; whilst the more sedentary would deliver themselves up to gloom and melancholy, to spleen and sullenness. And how ill must every generous affection thrive in such a soil? We are surprised and shocked at the ingratitude and insolence of a Nabal (see Sam. xxv.) to his benefactor, applying for relief under the humble, and at the same time endearing appellation of his son Daba. But all this is fully accounted for many we read, that he was a man, ever be insensible of the obligation more also into the comforts, of religion; and no wonder, then, if deaf also to all the demands of humanity.

With what different sentiments does a sense of religion inspire us towards our fellow-creatures? That we have all one Father; that our interests are alike in the hands of a most wise, most gracious Being? What calmness must such reflections speak to our breasts: what cheerfulness must that diffuse over our conduct towards those around us? Our gloomy thoughts, our melancholy apprehensions, are all now dispelled. Here is room and encouragement for every generous affection. Conscious of being continually under such a protection, we are no longer anxious about our private concerns; we can allow those of the public a just share in our regards. None of us liveth to himself, and no man dieth unto himself. (Rom. xiv. 7.)

Honour, considered as a principle of action, consists in a sense of the dignity of our nature, and a resolution at all hazards to act up to it. An habit of mind, which, when conducted by reason, and supported by religion, will ever produce excellent fruits, and can hardly be too much encouraged: but, when it takes (as without religion it ever will take) popular and prevailing notions for the standard of what is agreeable to a man's dignity or character; this same habit of mind becomes a most capricious, and may be a most hurtful, principle; nor is there, in fact, any thing so ridiculous, or so destructive of public order, which our men of honour will not easily be reconciled to the commission of, nay, challenge applause for. So precarious will the morals, as well as the faith, of those persons always be found, who receive honour one of another, and not the honour that cometh from God only. (John, v. 44.)

And what is here observed with regard to particular persons, is equally observable of societies. We read of some nations, even in the heathen world, of whom many excellent things are related, as proceeding from a principle of honour and bravery of mind. But, upon enquiry, it will appear, that the beneficial give in this principle, if not the pre-whole of the principle itself, always such a pervers.

kept pace with the regard paid to religion. No sooner did any such nation fall into a dislike to retain God in their knowledge (Rom. i. 28.), but we find them presently given up to a reprobate mind, to do [τα πάντα καὶ νόμιμα] things least agreeable to, most unworthy of, their nature.

The truth is, religion affords the only rational foundation for a sense of honour. If man be supposed, with regard to his whole being (and something like this the atheist, if he thinks at all, must suppose), to come up like a flower, and be cut down again, like a vegetable to blossom and flourish for a little while, and then to decay, wither, and sink into the ground from which he sprung: if he be supposed to come into this world by chance; to sojourn in it for a few years, as in a strange land; continually reminded of his defenceless condition, and not conscious of any superior protection; and, after a dull round of objects, which himself cannot relish, and of employments which he cannot but despise, to drop into nothing, as if he had never been? need I ask, what dignity there is in such a composition as this? No, certainly. We must be excused from expecting any great assistance to morality, any considerable services to the public from the honour of those persons, who own themselves to be of such an extraction, and are able to give us no better account whence they come, or whither they are going.

Civil government was the last expedient above-mentioned for securing mankind against the ill effects of each other's appetites and passions: and an expedient it undoubtedly is most beneficial, indeed in man's present state absolutely necessary, for that purpose. But it is as certain, that civil government always has called in the assistance of religion; and, in the nature of things, always must do so.

I insist not here on the atheist's giving us a satisfactory account of the first formation of civil societies; or on his clearing up the many suppositions he must make previously to that of any constitution of government at all. Let us suppose, with him, (without being too scrupulously inquisitive after the time, place, manner, motives, &c.), that a great majority, as the governed in every society must be, not insisting on their natural equality, have agreed to subject themselves to do, or at most a few, of their brethren. We ask, then, What shall secure, to the governed, the beneficial exercise of the power they have conveyed; and, to the governors, the firmness and continuance of the conveyance?—What shall engage the several members of the community to contribute their respective shares to the public weal? And, in short, what shall render government, in every respect, a real and general blessing?

We have seen, how insufficient the faculty of reason, and the principles of benevolence or honour, will always, of themselves, be in particular persons, to withstand the force of appetite and passion; and, we may well suppose, the addition of power will hardly diminish the force of those appetites and passions, which it gives an opportunity of gratifying. Exaltation and dominion have been always observed to be of an intoxicating nature. And, though government, under the most disadvantageous circumstances; may seem preferable to anarchy, yet governors, conscious of being armed with power, and not conscious of any superior being, from whom they derive, and to whom they are accountable for it, might render a nation sufficiently miserable: nor is there much room to hope, that they who fear not God, would, in such a situation, regard man.

Let us, however, suppose the governing part of the society, from whatever principle, heartily disposed to promote its welfare and prosperity; yet how shall they be secure of being supported in their authority? Or, without such security, how shall they proceed with a proper vigour in accomplishing the good ends of it? If a number of men be supposed to have devolved so much power, upon one or a few of their equals, as is requisite for their protection and the promotion of their interests; we need not doubt, but they will think themselves at liberty, at least, to resume that power, whensoever they do not, or (which will be a much more common case) whensoever they imagine they do not, reap the advantages expected from it. And, whilst every little disappointment, every trivial grievance, every wanton desire of change, shall, by those who will be at once parties and judges in this case, be improved into a sufficient reason for insurrection and rebellion; how precarious must be the tenure by which any prince can hold his authority! How weak the hands of a good prince, in exerting it to any beneficial purpose! How vain must it be to expect, that those persons, who fear not God, should, on any steady principle, honour the king?

But supposing the relative obligations of governors and governed regularly adjusted, and all the security given of a mutual concurrence for the public good, that can be well imagined, still it remains to be considered, how the good ends of government itself should be pursued and accomplished? I would, on this occasion particularly, specify two of these ends; that of determining differences which shall arise about property; and that of guarding the members of the community against mutual invasions, by properly applying penal sanctions. Now, the dispensers of justice must, in many, if not all, cases of both kinds, determine upon such evidence as can be had only from the testimony of others: and yet, what security can they have of the veracity of such testimony, but upon a presumption, that the persons who give it are under the awe of a Being, from whom no secrets are hid? Without this presumption, courts of judicature cannot take one step with any satisfaction or assurance: an oath can give no security, can have no sense in it; and all judicial processes must become idle pomp, and trifling with solemnity.

Add to all this, that many practices, of a tendency very prejudicial to public welfare, are yet of such a nature, as exposes them not to the censure of human laws: the greatest crimes may often be transacted so secretly as to escape the knowledge, and the greatest criminals may sometimes be so numerous, or so powerful, as to defy the resentment of the magistrate. In all these cases, and many others, civil government must ever be unable to punish, and therefore also insufficient to restrain.

In short, without religion, it is hard to say what foundation there could be for any such mutual confidence among men, as is necessary to the support of government, the very being of society. Without supposing each other under the influence of this principle, every man might too justly be in perpetual fear of every other, who should be either stronger or more subtle than himself; so long as the one could think himself possessed of any thing, which the other might think it worth while to invade; or so long as the other could be supposed to have either lust or appetite, revenge, or even wantonness, to be gratified by infesting him. The apprehension that every one, who should meet him would slay him (Gen. iv. 14.), must in this state of things be the melancholy portion of every son of Adam; and all mankind might join in the complaint, My punishment is greater than I can bear! (Gen. iv. 13.)

But the Lord is king, the earth may be glad thereof! (Psal. xcvi. 1.) When we take into our account the general acknowledgment of a God, a providence, a future state; the face of the moral world is changed; society becomes practicable, and government a blessing. Where religious principles prevail, good kings may reign with security to themselves, and benefit to their people. Subordinate magistrates will know themselves to be under the strongest obligation, the most powerful engagement, to decree justice: and may proceed in doing so with cheerfulness, whilst those who give them information, or evidence, or verdict, are presumed to give it in truth and righteousness, as seeing him who is invisible. The peaceable and inoffensive subject will have all the security with regard to his person and property, that either a sense of an Almighty protection in his own breast, or the supposed awe of an Almighty vengeance in the breasts of other men, can possibly give him. Whilst those, who are disposed to be contentious and injurious, must, to come at the properties of others, break loose from all the ties of interest as well as conscience: they must, by giving disturbance to society, expose themselves not only to the wrath of the magistrate, but to a more inevitable, more dreadful, indignation: they must give up their own most valuable interests, before they can allow themselves to invade those of other men; and become, in the strictest sense, fools, in order to be knaves.

Upon the whole; the remedies we have been considering are certainly, in conjunction with the fear of God, of no small benefit to society. But, should we once set aside the supports and enforcements of religion, to should soon experience the insufficiency of all other preservatives of public order and happiness, and find reason to lament our having parted with the only effectual restraint upon those lusts and passions, from whence come wars and fightings, confusion, and every evil work. A restraint of universal extent, and only not irresistible efficacy, the influence whereof reaches to every relation, every office of life; which, like the great object of it, is about our bed and about our path; which follows us into the closest recesses, and meets us in every thought: a restraint, to the powerfulness of which the libertine and the atheist loudly bear testimony; the former, by making it his avowed quarrel with religion, and the latter, his boasted triumph upon a pretended conquest over it; but a restraint, to which we must have leave to glory in our professed subjection, as well knowing, that it debars us of no liberty but such as is destructive of public as well as private happiness; that it maintains the just authority of those parts only (both in the political system without us, and the moral one within us) which are fitted to govern; and requires the subordination of those only which are fitted to obey; and a restraint therefore, which we consider not as the invader, but as the guardian, of both social and personal freedom.

After all, I must not dissemble a material exception to what has been offered. The effects of a religious principle will, in course, depend much on the notions men entertain concerning the object of it. Thus, if the nature of the Deity be uncertain, or his will unknown, a morality consisting in an imitation of that nature, and an obedience to that will, must become imperfect and precarious in proportion. But, should the Deity be conceived to be a capricious and weak Being, much more, an example and patron of treachery, debauchery, cruelty, &c.; such a corrupt religion (though in some respects preferable to no religion at all) must have an influence but little favourable to the morals of its professors, or the interest of society.

How far the religion of the Gentile world is affected by this exception, those among ourselves who appear solicitous to reduce us to it, might do well to consider. In the mean time (blessed be God!) we Christians are prepared to give a full answer to it. And, for this purpose, I proceed to represent to you,

II. Secondly, The excellency of revealed religion in particular, for securing and promoting national virtue and happiness.

Not that I here presume to do justice to a subject so extensive; nor will any laboured illustration of it, I hope, be thought necessary: only, in reference to the foregoing suggestion, I cannot but observe, that our holy religion constantly sets forth the God, whom we fear, at once in the most amiable, and the most awful light: in his own nature, as a pure spirit (John, iv. 24.), every where present (Psal. cxxxix. 1—12.), having all things naked and open to his view (Heb. iv. 13.); glorious in holiness (Exod. xv. 11.) infinitely removed from all imperfection, all possibility of being so much as tempted with evil (Jam. i. 13.): in the exercise of his power, as gracious and merciful, slow to anger, and of great kindness (Joel, ii. 13.); yet as by no means willing to clear the guilty (Exod. xxxiv. 7.): in his providence over states and kingdoms, as making their prosperity or adversity more visibly correspond with their piety or impiety; and towards all mankind in their private capacity, as having appointed a day, in which he will judge the world in righteousness (Acts, xvii. 31.): a day, in which he will completely rectify all the seeming irregularities in his present distributions; and render to every man his final allotment of everlasting happiness, or eternal misery according to his deeds (Rom. ii. 6.) The truth is, every reason already given for the importance of religion in general to societies, has been an anticipation of the proof of the excellency of that religion, which alone, with any certainty, represents its adorable object as uniformly and unchangeably holy, and just, and good.

And, as revelation has furnished us with such excellent accounts of the Divine Nature, so has it made us, not less usefully, acquainted with our own. That the principles of our composition are at variance with each other, has been already supposed, and is too manifest from experience; but in the sacred writings alone we read the first occasion of this war between the law in our members and the law of our minds (Rom. vii. 23, 24.); which the natural man could no more account for, than he could deliver himself from it. And, as we here learn the true source, so here we are directed to the proper cure, of our degeneracy. Here every part of our nature that deserves to be strengthened, receives assistance, direction, and encouragement; at the same time that every corrupt and pernicious tendency is brought under all the discipline and restraint, that can be proper for, or indeed consistent with, our rational nature.

Is reason a faculty fitted to contribute any thing towards national virtue and happiness? But where do we find the native pre-eminence, the divine original, of this faculty so fully discovered; where its views so enlarged; where its genuine dictates recommended by so high an authority, or enforced by such powerful sanctions, as in the revelation vouchsafed us of his will, who is greater than our heart, and knoweth all things? (1 John, iii. 20.) Is benevolence a principle in any degree beneficial to civil societies? Let the Deist tell us, where every affection of the generous kind is so described in its properties, so exalted in its principle, so extended in its influence, so incited by examples, so animated by rewards, as in that holy commandment, that divine institution, the end of which is charity? (1 Tim. i. 5.) Is a sense of honour productive of any good effects to the public? the same revelation (Gen. i. 26, 27.) presents us with the most rational foundation for this principle, the only satisfactory account of the original dignity of our nature; and, when that dignity was in great measure lost, here, and here only, we learn, what extraordinary methods have been, and still are, taken by every person in the ever-blessed Trinity, for advancing each part of our composition to yet greater dignity than that from which we fell. And, lastly, Is civil government an expedient necessary to preserve the order and happiness of mankind? But never was its origin explained; never its powers guarded from abuse on one hand, and from insult on the other; never its several good ends provided for, in so summary, so certain, and so authoritative a way, as by revelation; which informs us, without any tedious deduction, that the powers that be, are ordained of God; that rulers are the ministers of God for good; and that we must needs be subject to them, not only for wrath but also for conscience sake. (Rom. xiii. 1, 4, 5.)

But still more eminently does the excellency of our religion, and its usefulness to societies, display itself, in removing the chief cause of social as well as personal disorder; not by an idle attempt to extirpate our affections, but by first purifying and exalting them, and then placing before them objects most worthy of their pursuit. Are societies disturbed and the foundations of the political world put out of course, by men's intruding into the province, and impertinently censuring the conduct, of their superiors? Christianity calls home men's misapplied concern, bidding them study to be quiet and to do their own business. (1 Thess. iv. 11.) Are men's endeavours for the benefit of others and the service of the public, checked and restrained by an attention to private interest? Christianity alone has effectually, and against all casualties, reconciled these interfering tendencies: it has placed our kindness to others at once on the most generous and most rational foundation; teaching us to desire no present returns for our good offices, yet assuring us of an abundant recompence at the resurrection of the just. Are revengefulness and litigiousness productive of any ills to societies? This wisdom which is from above, is first pure, then peaceable, gentle, and easy to be entreated: it banishes that love of the world, and that pride of life, which make our competitions degenerate into quarrels; which give keenness to our resentments, and continuance to our enmity: it forbids not a due care for our temporal interests, nor debars us of any fair methods of recovering them when invaded; but, by extending our prospect into a far better country, and engaging our hopes and our hearts upon the treasures of that place, it scarce leaves room for a temptation to fall out with our brethren by the way; to enter into any great warmth, or to cherish any lasting hatred, on the account of any thing in this world.

From such an institution what assistance and encouragement must not morality receive; how friendly must it needs be, in its natural tendency, to the interests of civil societies? What could a lover of mankind more ardently wish for, than that such a religion should be everywhere received, every where obeyed?—But I hasten to suggest to you,

III. Thirdly and lastly, Some of those inferences which seem naturally to result from the foregoing considerations. And,

First, From what has been said it is obvious to infer, that magistrates and all that are intrusted with the care of public order and happiness, are, for that very end, highly concerned to support and encourage religion.

And here, by religion I understand, not only the internal belief of a God, and a providence, together with such affections of love, reverence, trust, &c. as that belief tends naturally to produce; but also those outward expressions of both in acts of social worship, by which I will presume a society of reasonable creatures, sensible of many common wants to be supplied, many common calamities to be averted, many common benefits to be acknowledged, would conclude it necessary to apply to their common Creator and Governor. That religion in the former sense, however it may be in its principle a personal matter, will ever in its effects greatly affect societies, has already appeared. But I would here observe farther, that even personal religion never did, never will, generally or considerably prevail, where some public profession of it is not regularly kept up; where the members of a community are not frequently called together to recognize the authority of the Supreme Being, and to confirm their awful sense of his power, majesty, and goodness; by devout expressions of it: nor indeed can there well be a foundation for mutual trust and confidence among the members of a society, without some visible worship of Almighty God; by attending whereupon they may give each other satisfaction of their being under the influence of the same common principle. In short, both the internal principle and the external profession of religion are necessary, not only as branches of our duty to God, but to secure the natural good ends of religion to civil societies. For the promotion and support of each, therefore, every prudent as well as pious magistracy will think itself concerned to make a competent provision.

I must not stop here. It has been already intimated, how much the morals of a people may, and must suffer, from a corrupt religion, from unworthy notions or impure worship, of the Deity. Every reason, therefore, which can be given for the magistrate's supporting and encouraging any religion, will plead for his distinguished favour to such a religion, and such only, as is in its representations of the Divine Being, and of the methods of applying to him, pure and holy; and in its precepts and general tendency at once beneficial to the social and personal interests of mankind. How fully the Christian religion comes recommended to favour under each of these characters, even separately from that far superior title to reverence, which its divine original gives it, I need not now stay to illustrate. Let me only add, that, if among the several denominations of Christians, there be one, which has preserved the due medium, in its discipline, between tyranny and persecution on one hand, and licentiousness and anarchy on the other; in its doctrines, between such claims of infallibility as preclude all private judgment, and such latitude as would render a revelation insignificant for the purpose of a rule of faith; in its worship, between superstitious and idolatrous pomp, and a neglect of decency and order: if, in its professed principles, it be best fitted to promote public peace and happiness, and, in its external polity, best adapted to the form of the civil constitution; and if, over and above all these, it be in other respects most conformable to the original standard, and to the usages of the best and purest ages of Christianity: such a society of Christians (we trust) will ever recommend itself to a wise and religious prince, as worthy of his first, and always his chief care. And we acknowledge it, with humble gratitude to Almighty God, and with all due thankfulness to those whom he hath set over us, that we, of the church of England, can with pleasure make the application.—But,

Secondly: We may farther infer, that all attempts to remove the influences of religion, or to set men loose from a sense of its sacred obligations, may be considered as so many attempts against public order and happiness, and be justly resented as such by the guardians of it.

I would not here be understood as desiring by this inference to subject all those to the magistrate's resentment, who may not, by the foregoing one, be recommended to his special favour. The subject before us leads me not to consider the case of a conscientious separation from the communion favoured by public wisdom; nor yet of such an opposition to the terms of that communion, as is consistent with public peace, and the inviolable regard due to religion in general, and to so excellent a religion as the Christian in particular. Thus much, indeed, is certain; that a wise government, jealous of all advances towards irreligion, will ever have a watchful eye upon all such disputes as, either on account of the matters debated, or the manner of debating them, appear to have a tendency that way. The case, however, which I have principally in view, is that of opposition, not to particular forms of church communion or establishments, under the acknowledgment of the same divine revelation; but to all church-communion, all establishments, all revealed religion; and yet, more especially, that of attempting to rob a nation of all sense of any religion, or (which amounts to the same thing) to deprive them of a religion, the good effects of which they have long experienced, without leaving them any determinate one to supply its place. This is an attempt directly and immediately affecting the public welfare, and incapable of alleviation from any plea, either of conscience or charity; and is an attempt, therefore, against which every government is concerned to express a perfect hatred, and to count the authors (what indeed they are) its own worst enemies. (Psalm. cxxxix. 22.)

The resentment here pleaded for will (no doubt) be called persecution, by those who are forward to deserve, but unwilling to suffer it. Let it, however, be called persecution for unrighteousness, for blasphemy, for avowed atheism; and for such persecution (if a defence of every thing sacred must be so called) no good man need be ashamed to plead. No man complains of the execution of the laws against robbers; perjured persons, murderers, &c. And, whether they who break one of these commandments, or they who teach men so—who remove from them the only effectual restraint from the worst of villanies, by instructing them to be under no apprehension of guilt, nor in cases of secrecy of any after-punishment, are more heinously criminal in themselves, or more extensively injurious to the public, can surely be no difficult matter to determine. But,

Thirdly: I beg leave to infer, that those persons, who have voluntarily dedicated themselves to the office of explaining and inculcating the great principles of religion, and have devoted their time and their labours to a continual attendance on this service, may reasonably expect to be considered, regarded, and supported, as useful members of the community.

Men may declaim plausibly upon the self-sufficiency of that reason which is common to all; it may be said, that the doctrines and duties of natural religion, and, in a country where the Scriptures are in every body's hands, those of revealed religion also, must be clearly discoverable by reason. And this kind of flattery will always be most greedily swallowed by those who are least entitled to it. But (to consider this matter impartially) by what reason are these things so clearly discoverable? Not, surely, by the reason of children, either in age or in understanding; but, by reason regularly cultivated, faithfully consulted, and as faithfully followed. And of how small a part of mankind such reason as this will ordinarily be the portion, let experience determine. In fact, information and instruction are necessary to give mankind, in general, a proper acquaintance with those truths, which are of the utmost consequence to them. And even after the good seed of the word is sown, and has taken root, the cares of this world, the numerous concerns about which the greatest part of mankind ever have suffered, ever will suffer, their time and their thoughts to be almost wholly engaged, would soon choak it and render it unfruitful; were not the same watchful care employed in a continual cultivation of it. To speak freely; that a considerable part of our species does not degenerate into barbarians and savages, is in great measure owing to some such stated returns of attendance on the public worship of Almighty God, and of hearing his word explained and enforced, as we of this nation (happy, if we could but be made sensible of our happiness) enjoy. By the labours of a standing order of preachers (a privilege unknown to the Gentile world) the bread from heaven falls, as it were, among our tents, even round about our habitation. And, if we take into the account the more familiar methods of instructing the young and ignorant, advising the dissident, reproving the froward, encouraging the well-disposed, speaking satisfaction to the scrupulous, relief to the desponding, and peace to the departing soul; these are offices, which (it is hoped) will not fail to conciliate the friendship of every lover of mankind, to an order of men so usefully employed; if not on account of their divine institution, at least for their work's sake.

There is one consideration farther, which I take leave to mention under this article, and at this time. We have heard much of late of the spreading of popery in this kingdom; and it is a report, which cannot be received without concern by any lover of his country or his holy religion. But to what can this appearance be more probably ascribed, than to those suspicions and jealousies, which the more unlearned part of the laity have been taught to entertain for their proper pastors, the parochial clergy? He must be a stranger among us, who knows not, what extravagant writings have of late years been published, and with what assiduity they have been dispersed; reproaching not only some scandals to the order, but the whole order in general; as mercenary and designing, as aiming at nothing but dominion and wealth, and as prosecuting an interest, not only distinct from, but opposite to, that of the rest of mankind. As to the justness of these general and undistinguishing accusations, the world must judge between us. But, methinks, patriots so watchful should consider, when ~~the~~ such repeated invectives the people are worked up into a dislike and hatred of those, to whom not only the laws of Christ, but the laws of the land, direct them to apply in cases of doubt and difficulty; how almost unavoidably they must either throw off all regard for religion, or fall an easy and willing prey to those, who lie in wait to deceive; to those bold undertakers, especially, who are always at hand, ready to offer them a safe conduct, and to recommend their own delusive attempts with an appearance of great disinterestedness, and extraordinary sanctity. What numbers, especially among the unlearned and unstable, have been in this manner reconciled to the Romish communion, it is not perhaps easy to say. But thus much, I presume, we may collect (if any thing can be collected) from the experience of past times; that if ever popery is effectually kept out of this kingdom, this must be done, not by throwing down the fences of our present happy establishment, nor by alienating the affections of the people from those who are appointed to guard them from delusion (methods which must ever give the Romanists, as indeed they ever have given them, the advantages they most wish for against us), but by a steady adherence to that ecclesiastical constitution, which has always been the glory, and has, on many occasions, proved itself to be the bulwark of the reformation.

In short; if the interests of societies be at all concerned in the prevalence of religion in general, or the happiness of this nation in that of reformed religion in particular; it is as certain, that the credit and beneficial effects of both these are closely connected with the reputation and influence of the persons that are appointed to teach them. A consideration, which must ever plead for a suitable regard and support to those teachers; as it is undoubtedly a most powerful engagement upon persons, in a situation of so great consequence, to take heed unto themselves. (1 Tim. iv. 16.) But to return:

The inference before us is manifestly extended, in the reason of it, to places set apart for training up the youth and growing hopes of the nation in the useful, the necessary, principles of virtue and religion. This indeed seems on all hands so well understood, as to need no illustration. The reproaches of them that reproach our excellent religion constantly fall on these societies, so happily formed for making early and successful impressions in favour of it; and as they are honoured with the same enemies, so (blessed be God) they can boast the same friends. The protection with which we are favoured with regard to our ancient privileges, and the encouragement given to our public works, are such honourable testimonies in our favour, as we acknowledge in all places with all thankfulness. May these illustrious seminaries always enjoy the friendship of the public; as I trust, they will ever continue to deserve it, by making the cultivation of learning and loyalty, of honour and virtue, and (for the sake of every thing amiable and praise-worthy) of the fear of God, their constant care.

Lastly, and to conclude: Let us all, as we would approve ourselves not only faithful servants of God, but hearty friends to our country, give all diligence, first to fix in our own minds, and then, as our stations and influence shall enable us, to propagate in the minds of others, a just sense of the truth as well as importance of our most holy religion.

Hitherto you have heard our religion recommended as of importance to the order and happiness of civil societies; and we hope, in this view, it appears entitled to protection and patronage from all that are in authority. But I must not conclude without observing, that we can go much farther in our recommendation of it. We solicit not the favour of the great, or the protection of the powerful, from any distrust of our cause. The advocates for our faith have produced many convincing proofs, I doubt not to call them demonstrations, of its truth and certainty; such demonstrations as the nature of the subject will admit of, and such as are incomparably superior to those we scruple not to reason and act upon in any other part of conduct. And, if our religion be true (as most unquestionably it is), we are infinitely concerned to remember, that the consequences of our receiving and obeying it, how important soever they may be to us in our social capacity, are, with regard to our personal capacity, inconceivably more so; they will follow us into that world, where civil societies shall have no being; and will determine our condition in a state endless and unchangeable.

May we all then, from a rational conviction of the truth, and a constant sense of the obligations, of our holy religion, carefully and conscientiously discharge our respective duties in our several stations, as to the Lord and not to men. So shall the work of our country prosper in our hands, and we shall derive upon it the blessedness of a people who have the Lord for their God. (Psal. cxliv. 14.) And when all these associations, to which we here stand related, shall be dissolved; when every one of us shall give an account of himself to God (Rom. xiv. 12.) stript of all these marks of distinction which the ends of government now make necessary; such a diligent improvement, and religious application of our talents, to the glory of our Creator and the good of mankind, shall, through the merits of our Redeemer, secure to each of us that gracious sentence from our merciful Judge,—Well done, thou good and faithful servant: thou hast been faithful over a few things, I will make thee ruler over many things, enter thou into the joy of thy Lord. (Matt. xxv. 21.)

SERMON XCVII.

By the Rev. JOHN JORTIN, D.D.

On the Lord's Prayer.

LUKE xi. 1.

And it came to pass that as he was praying in a certain place, when he ceased, one of his disciples said unto him, Lord, teach us to pray, as John also taught his disciples. And he said unto them, when ye pray, say, Our Father, &c.

In the history of our Saviour's life, it may be observed, that ~~no~~ reasonable request was ever made to him, which he did not grant; and no prudent question, which he did not answer and resolve. Of all the requests which are recorded in the New Testament, this in the text may be accounted one of the most just and judicious; Lord, teach us to pray. The imperfection of the best, and the ignorance of the wisest is such, that if left so themselves, they would have doubts concerning the things to be asked, and the effects to be expected from their petitions. Therefore this disciple is greatly to be commended, who neglected not the opportunity of obtaining instruction in so important a point from the mouth of divine wisdom itself.

We learn from the gospel of St. Matthew, that our Saviour, before he delivered this form of prayer, discoursed to his disciples concerning the duty of private prayer, and exhorted them to avoid some faults relating to it. The Jewish hypocrites said their prayers in the streets and places of concourse, to be seen of men, to get the character of devout persons, and to promote their own worldly interests. The gentiles multiplied petitions for things temporal, without any devotion, without a due reverence and submission to the divine will. These indecent follies he strictly forbids: he reminds them, that God knoweth the things of which they have need, before they ask him: that they ought not to lay their wants before him in a superfluous abundance of words, nor hope to extort his favour by such absurd methods. Then he proceeds to give them a form of prayer.

It hath been observed by commentators, that this form is taken out of the Jewish liturgies; that our Lord collected it thence, and put it together, and added nothing of his own, except these words, as we forgive them that trespass against us; that therefore he was far from affecting novelty, and rejecting any thing that was good, because it was in common use.

If these Jewish forms of prayer are indeed as old as they are said to be, which is doubtful, another observation might be also made, namely, that our Lord, when he had recited this prayer to his disciples, knowing that there was only one expression in it which might seem new to them, makes a particular remark upon it, saying immediately; for if ye forgive men their trespasses, your heavenly Father will also forgive you: but if ye forgive not men their trespasses, neither will your Father forgive your trespasses.

When our Lord gave this prayer to his disciples, it was not his intention that they should use no other than this in their private devotions, much less, that they should neglect the public worship of God, and the stated prayers of the church, to which, as it appears from the New Testament, both he and his disciples conformed. But the Jewish doctors had used to draw up a form of private prayer for themselves and for their disciples; and John the Baptist, as St. Luke occasionally informs us, had given one to his followers; and conformably to this custom of teachers, our Lord, at the request of his disciples, gave them this, to add to their petitions; for it is not to be supposed, that when they prayed to God, they always confined themselves to the Lord's prayer; and indeed our Saviour afterwards gave his disciples new directions concerning prayer, bidding them ask in his name.

But since our Lord ordered his disciples to make use of this form of words, as these expressions imply; so therefore pray ye; and when ye pray, say; and since it is to be concluded that they complied with his precept, and repeated this prayer at certain times, the silence of the scriptures being no proof to the contrary; and since the church hath made use of it from very antient times; and since this prayer is most excellent, as every christian must acknowledge; upon these accounts, and for the sake of him who gave it, it becomes us to insert it in our more solemn addresses, and also to account it a pattern and model for all our prayers, to ask for such things as are contained in it, and to make no petitions which are not consistent with it.

Some persons, who have been fond of extemporary prayers, have carried their aversion from stated forms so far as to slight even the Lord's prayer, and to shun the use of it. They have objected to us, the repetition of it in our liturgy; a repetition which, to say the plain truth, is too frequent. But that was not the fault of the compilers of the liturgy; it is to be ascribed to our joining together different services, which were originally intended to be used at different times, or hours.

The Lord's prayer begins with an address to God, as to our heavenly Father; and with three petitions, or rather pious wishes, that his name may be hallowed, that his kingdom may come, and that his will may be done on earth as it is in heaven.

God is called Father, as he is our creator, and thereby the Father of all things in the universe, particularly of all intellectual beings, and of all men. Their Father he is, both because he made them, and because they in some measure resemble him. He is also Father, as he is the preserver of all, upholding and supporting them by his power and providence. He is also our Father, in a more excellent sense, by vocation and adoption, having called us to him by Jesus Christ, through faith in whom we become children of God, and are his family on earth, as the angels are his family in heaven.

By calling God, Father, we are reminded of his paternal readiness to hear our reasonable requests, to grant us the things which are good, though we may not have a right apprehension of them, and to withhold from us the things which are hurtful, if by mistake we should wish for them. Not only, if we ask ~~us~~ bread, he will not give us ~~us~~ bread; but if we ignorantly ask ~~us~~ which is in reality he will give us bread.

By calling him Father, we are reminded of that reverence for him, that fear of offending him, that desire of pleasing him, that zeal for his honour, that endeavour to resemble him, and that submission to his dispensations, which, as his children, we ought to entertain.

By calling him our Father, that is, our common parent, we learn what affection we ought to bear to our brethren, that is, to all men, who, as well as we, are his children by creation or adoption.

It is added, who art in heaven; an appellation of God frequently used by the Jews. Not as if God were there only, or so particularly there, as not to be equally every where in essence, in power, and in knowledge; but because his presence there is more gloriously manifested. By the same expression is also signified in scripture his perfect knowledge of every thing, his excellent majesty, his supreme, irresistible power, and his dominion over all.

Thus these first words, which are a preface to the prayer, are proper to produce in us worthy notions of God, and to raise our hope and reliance, our veneration and love.

By the name of God, which we wish may be hallowed, is meant the divine majesty, God himself, as he is known to us by his perfections. We may be said to hallow the name of God, that is, to sanctify or to glorify God, when we entertain in our hearts a right opinion of him, particularly of his moral perfections, as they are called, that is, of his perfect goodness, and justice, and purity, and mercy; and have a lively and lasting sense of them upon our minds, which produces a suitable behaviour towards him.

We sanctify him, when we declare this our belief, and acknowledge these perfections of God by speaking of him upon all proper occasions in such a manner as becomes us, and by offering up prayers and praises to him. We sanctify him, when our actions correspond with such thoughts and such expressions, and we obediently keep his commandments.

The kingdom of God may be taken in two senses:

1. A special and general dominion, which was created for his pleasure, which is preserved by his providence, and which depends upon him for its continuance.

This cannot be the kingdom of God mentioned in the Lord's prayer, the coming of which we should desire, for it hath been present, from the beginning, in all times and in all places, and cannot be enlarged or diminished by the behaviour of any of his creatures. We cannot therefore pray or wish for its coming: we can indeed and we ought to rejoice that it is always present, that the Lord reigneth, and that his kingdom is over all, and that we are not exposed to the cruel tyranny of chance or fate, or of imperfect and wicked beings, but that all things are governed by an almighty and most gracious God.

Secondly, the kingdom of God means his government over rational creatures, to whom he gives laws, and who obey him, not by constraint, but freely and by choice. This kingdom may be resisted, and is daily resisted, by evil spirits, and by wicked men. And as this kingdom may be opposed, so it may be increased by the conversion of the disobedient from sin to righteousness.

As our Lord came into the world to destroy the works of the devil, and to promote virtue and obedience to God, the religion of Christ and the state of the gospel is in the scripture frequently called the kingdom of God; and this is what is chiefly meant by it in the Lord's prayer. By praying, therefore, that God's kingdom may come, we express a desire that the gospel of Christ may spread and prevail over the world, may be every-where embraced and practised.

Thirdly, the kingdom of God in a more eminent and proper sense means that state to come, when sin and death shall be abolished, and the saints shall reign with God in glory and happiness for ever; that kingdom which they shall inherit who are subjects to the present kingdom of Christ, and obey his laws. The kingdom of God in the New Testament usually means both these kingdoms, for they are in some manner one and the same kingdom, and an entrance and continuance in the first leads us to an inheritance in the latter.

By praying then that God's kingdom may come, we pray also and wish for that happy time when we shall have no more to do with this vain and wicked world; when the glorious kingdom of God shall come; new heavens and a new earth, the seat of everlasting peace and righteousness.

By the will of God is not meant what he purposes and resolves to do; for that he will do in heaven and on earth, whether his creatures approve of it or no. But the will of God, in this place, means his desire of being obeyed by rational and free beings, in whose power he leaves it to comply or not. This will of God is done in heaven by the holy angels, who are his ministers to do his pleasure, and who perform their duty to him readily and cheerfully. When we pray therefore that God's will may be done on earth as it is in heaven, we wish that all men, imitating the blessed spirits above, may sincerely and carefully serve their Creator.

It is to be observed, that in the Lord's prayer we in the first place wish that the name of God may be hallowed, that his kingdom may come, and that his will may be done on earth as it is in heaven; in all which there is nothing that relates directly, immediately, and particularly to our own persons. Hereby we are taught each of us to know and acknowledge ourselves to be what we are, a small and inconsiderable part of the creation; to place things in their true order, and to regulate our desires according to the dictates of reason. The honour and glory of Almighty God, who is the Creator, Father, and Preserver of all, is to be preferred to every thing else; therefore it is to be first sought and desired by us: the obedient behaviour of all his creatures, by which his honour is promoted and their happiness is secured and increased, stands next; and our own interest, though it be included in the good of the whole, of which we are a part, is not yet distinctly mentioned. But after we have prayed that God may be honoured by the obedience of all his creatures, we are permitted to offer up some petitions relating more immediately to ourselves, though not to ourselves alone; and they are, that God would give us our daily bread, that he would forgive us our trespasses, that he would not lead us into temptation; and that he would deliver us from evil.

By bread is meant, not what disorderly fancy, and foolish custom, and pride, and luxury; and vanity may have made in a manner necessary to many of us; but those things which are really necessary for the support of human nature, those good things of this life, which God created for our use, and to be received with thanksgiving, those things which our heavenly Father knoweth to be needful for us, and which he hath promised to them who seek first the kingdom of God and the righteousness thereof. This is the bread which we are permitted to ask of God, and we must ask that he would give it us this day, or day by day, that is, not all at once such a quantity of things necessary as may last us our whole life, not treasures laid up for many years, but a constant and moderate provision dealt out to us in proportion to our exigencies, and sufficient to supply our necessities during this life.

This is a petition which it behoves us to put up constantly to God, how flourishing soever our circumstances may be, remembering the fickle state of worldly things, and the folly of placing our confidence in any creature, and the insufficiency of abundance, and power, and friends, and health, and diligence, and prudence, and the brightest abilities, without God's blessing, which is promised to those, who, whilst they are honestly industrious in their callings, rely entirely upon his paternal care and support.

The general sense then of the petition is plain; but the words, daily bread, are not so clear, and perhaps might be better rendered, to-morrow's bread: Give us this day bread for the morrow. This may, at first sight, seem to contradict the precept of our Saviour, wherein he bids us take no care for the morrow. But, first, the care which he condemns, is an anxious care, accompanied with a distrust of Providence; secondly, petitions, of their own nature, look forwards, and are for something to come; and thirdly, we only ask for bread from this day to the morrow, that is, bread for four and twenty hours, which is in reality only one day's bread.

By praying that God would forgive us our trespasses, we are reminded that we all of us offend him more or less, and in many things fall short of our duty; that yet we are sinners by our own fault, and must not charge our transgressions upon a fatal necessity, or a natural impossibility of doing better; that therefore our sins justly deserve punishment, unless God be pleased mercifully to remit that punishment; that he is placable and ready to be appeased upon our repentance; that we should daily desire his forgiveness; that our devotions should be founded on humility; and that when we pray to God for spiritual or temporal blessings, we ought at the same time to have a due sense of our own unworthiness, and meekly to acknowledge it.

Our Lord hath also taught us not to expect forgiveness, unless we forgive those who trespass against us; and this he hath repeated several times, lest we should deceive ourselves in a point so important. He obliges us to affirm before God, who knoweth our hearts, that we are in charity with all men, as often as we ask mercy from him; so that if we are not in this temper, we are reduced to the hard necessity and condition either of not offering up our prayers to God, or of indirectly asking him to punish us.

We must forgive those who trespass against us. And if we really forgive them, we must be free from designs and desires of revenging ourselves upon them; we must wish that they may repent and return to a better mind; we must be ready to do them such good offices as humanity and charity require, howsoever they be disposed towards us; and we must shew them still more favour, if they humbly own their fault, and amend, and seek to be reconciled.

Great is the encouragement which our Lord hath given us to practise this patient and compassionate virtue. If he forgive men, says he, their trespasses, your heavenly Father will also forgive you. This promise, however, is not to be so extensively understood, as if this act of obedience alone could secure to us the favour of God, though we should neglect the rest of our duty. Thus much indeed may be justly hoped and fairly concluded, that he who hath received considerable injuries, and from his heart forgives them, will probably by the good disposition of his own mind, and by the blessing and assistance of God, perform whatsoever is necessary to his improvement and salvation.

The next petition is, that God would not lead us into temptation; in which if we attend to the bare sound, and reflect not upon the sense of it, we may fall into unworthy notions of God's providence.

It is often said upon this subject, that temptations are of two sorts; first, trials of our obedience, intended for our benefit; secondly, enticements to sin, which seduce us from our duty. But this seems not to set the matter in a true light; the distinction is scarcely just. All temptations are of the same sort: they are difficulties which arise in certain circumstances and situations, when reason and duty require one thing, and inclination and passion suggest another. As to the event indeed, sometimes the man overcomes the temptation, and sometimes the temptation overcomes the man.

Concerning this expression, Lead us not into temptation, it is to be observed, that to be led into temptation, and to enter into temptation, in the language of the scriptures, signify to be overcome by it. When therefore we pray to God that he would not lead us into temptation, we desire that he would not place us in circumstances, wherein we shall be overcome by the temptation.

But as this may seem to make God the author and the cause of our sins, it must be always remembered that he cannot lead us into temptation by putting evil inclinations in us, or by inciting or enticing us to sin, or by laying us under a necessity of committing it, or by giving evil spirits any power over our will. Let no man say, when he is tempted, I am tempted of God; for God cannot be tempted with evil, neither tempteth he any man. But in the language of the scripture, whatsoever God permits to be done, or to come to pass, that he is sometimes said to do. He may then, according to this way of speech, be said to lead us into temptation, when, because we have abused his long suffering and his kind offers of assistance, or because we rashly seek danger through presumption and self-conceit, or because our hearts are dead to things spiritual, he leaves us to ourselves, and withdraws that assistance which he would have continued to us, if we had asked him for it in a due manner, and done our part in working out our salvation. When such is our case, and we have forced God to forsake us, we shall as surely be overcome by temptation, as if God himself had led us into it, and subjected us to its influence. Therefore when we pray that God would not lead us into temptation, we beseech him that he would not suffer us, for the punishment of our sins, to be deprived of his aid, and to fall into circumstances which will prove destructive to us.

We pray that God would not lead us into temptation: we pray also that he would deliver us from evil, that is, from the evil of sin, which is the consequence of yielding to temptation: or, deliver us from evil, may mean, deliver us from the evil-one, from Satan. As the holy Spirit of God is ever willing to succour those who desire to be led by him, and to do the will of God, and as the angels are sent to minister to the righteous, and delight in the employment; so the scripture represents the evil-one as no less industrious to tempt, and to entice men to sin. However, all that Satan can do is only to tempt: he hath no power over our persons or our wills, nor can his allurements hurt, unless we by our own choice yield to them; so that the treachery of our own corrupt hearts is more dangerous than he, or any enemy from without.

The Lord's Prayer is closed with an acknowledgment of God, that his is the kingdom and the power and the glory for ever and ever.

This doxology, or praise given to God, is not to be found in St. Luke's gospel, and it seems not to have been originally in the Lord's Prayer, as given us by St. Matthew. It is left out in our common prayer-book, in some places of the morning and evening services. It was used in the primitive church, and in ancient times, in their liturgy, when the Lord's Prayer was repeated, and at the conclusion of it, and thence it came to be annexed to it afterwards. However, as it is entirely agreeable to the holy scriptures, both in words and in sense, we need not scruple to make use of it. It may be thus applied to the foregoing words:

We pray, O God, that thy kingdom may come, that thy name may be hallowed, and that thy will may be done on earth; for thine is the kingdom, to thee belongeth dominion, and it is the indispensable duty of all men to honour thee, and their happiness consists in obeying thy holy laws. We pray to thee for daily bread, for the necessities of life, for temporal blessings to be derived from thee the fountain of good, for the remission of sins through thy mercy, and for preservation from them for the time to come, through thy mighty protection; for thine is the power thus to supply our wants, and to keep us from all evil, and to pardon offences. For all these things we pray to thee; for if we do thus our duty to thee by hallowing thy name, and owning thy kingdom, and acting according to thy will, and if thou vouchsafe to pardon and protect us, thine will be the glory for ever and ever. Amen.

SERMON XCVIII.

By DOCTOR JORTIN.

On Industry.

2 THESS. iii. 8, 9.

Neither did we eat any man's bread for nought; but wrought with labour and trouble night and day, that we might not be chargeable to any of you: not because we have not power, but to make ourselves an example unto you to follow.

St. Paul found it expedient on many accounts to recommend industry in their worldly callings to the first christians. They who in those times received the gospel by their own free and deliberate choice, upon serious examination, having arrived first to years of discretion, who were convinced of its truth by the signs and wonders wrought to confirm it, who had been bred in Jewish superstition, or in pagan ignorance, and who were thus suddenly removed from darkness into light, and from doubt and diffidence into full assurance; they, I say, had these considerable advantages over us, that they usually felt a more lively sense of the evidence and the importance of christianity, had brighter examples of goodness amongst them for their imitation, were more affected by the glorious promises of eternal happiness which were set before them, and looked with more indifference upon a world from which they had little to expect, besides scorn and reproach and malice and persecution.

But if their faith was accompanied with greater degrees of fervour than are commonly found amongst us, yet some inconveniences might arise even from that zeal. Piety, when it is not guided and governed by prudence, may degenerate till at last it becomes wild extravagance. A contempt for this world, and for all its concerns, may be carried too far; and St. Paul seems to have feared lest some should run into this extreme, and neglect to provide for themselves and their families, through a fanatical notion that a christian could have no leisure for such low occupations; and lest others, influenced by laziness, or by worse motives, should imitate them in this supine negligence.

For the apostles, and they who like them were then appointed to preach the gospel, had seldom leisure to labour in their worldly callings, and had a particular assurance from Christ that he would provide for them. This might mislead other christians to rely indiscreetly on the divine Providence, and to think that these promises were equally extended to them.

There seems besides to have been at that time a current opinion that the second coming of Christ, and the end of all earthly things, was at hand, which might have a bad effect upon some injudicious persons; and produce too much indolence and carelessness in worldly affairs.

The eminent liberality also of the first believers might prove a temptation to dishonest, sluggish, and insincere men (for such there have been in the church at all times) to indulge a lazy temper, and to live at the expence of those christian societies into which they had entered themselves.

Some of those heretics of the most ancient times, who are recorded in ecclesiastical history, were in all probability induced by no other motive outwardly to profess christianity, than by hopes of a share in the public collections; and accordingly, whensoever distress and persecution arose, and they had a near prospect of more danger than profit, they could easily secure themselves by deserting the church, and renouncing the faith.

Thus, unless proper care were taken to prevent this evil, the church, instead of being a society of honest, frugal, and diligent persons, able to maintain themselves and those who were proper objects of their charity, would have become a mere nest of drones.

St. Paul, therefore, as a pious and a prudent teacher, recommended industry to the christian world, not only by precept, but by example.

He himself on more than one account had a claim to a maintenance from the public.

As a preacher of the gospel and an apostle of Christ, he had a right by custom, by equity, and by the laws of God, to receive a subsistence from those whom he instructed, as he proves in his first Epistle to the Corinthians.

As he was the apostle of the gentiles, the care of many churches lay upon him, he had a much larger province than any of the apostles, he was obliged to labour more abundantly in the gospel than they, and therefore less able to spare time in labouring for a maintenance.

Add to this, that a small sum was sufficient for one man, and for a man who desired nothing besides food and raiment.

Yet he sometimes chose to waive even this privilege. I have used, says he, none of these things, neither have I written these things, that it should be so done unto me; for it were better for me to die, than that any man should make my glorying void. He chose rather to feed himself by his own toil and industry, by labouring night and day, because he would not eat any man's bread for nought. I have coveted, says he, no man's silver or gold, or apparel. Yea, you yourselves know that these hands have ministered to my necessities, and to them that were with me. I have shewed you all things, how that so labouring ye ought to support the weak.

Such a person might boldly and earnestly press the observance of a duty which himself had so remarkably fulfilled; and indeed he lays a great stress upon it, and represents it as more important than some usually imagine it to be. If any one should neglect to provide for his own family, we should perhaps call him a careless, an indolent, an imprudent man: but St. Paul says, If any provide not for his own, and specially for those of his own household, he hath denied the faith, and is worse than an infidel.

Study, says he, to be quiet, and to do your own business, and to work with your own hands, as we commanded you.

And again; When we were with you, this we commanded you, that if any would not work, neither should he eat.

Again; Let him that stole, steal no more; but rather let him labour, working with his hands, that he may have to give to him that needeth.

And in the text; Neither did we eat any man's bread for nought; but wrought with labour and travel night and day, that we might not be chargeable to any of you: not because we have not the power, but to make ourselves an example unto you to follow us.

We may consider this example of St. Paul as a precept, first of industry in our worldly callings; secondly of industry in our religious concerns. Each of these duties I shall now endeavour to recommend, beginning with industry in our worldly callings.

I. If we hope to acquire what is necessary for our subsistence, to preserve it when we possess it, to provide for those who depend upon us, and to avoid gross and scandalous ignorance, labour of the body, or of the mind, or of both, must be undergone. I shall now endeavour to prove the truth of this assertion: it is generally known and acknowledged; and few have denied it. We read in ancient history of a sect of Christians, who from those words of our Lord, Labour not for the meat that perisheth, concluded that they ought not to do any work to get their bread. We may suppose that this sect did not last long, that these sluggards were soon starved out of the world, or rather that cold and hunger sharpened their wits, and taught them to be better interpreters of scripture. It may seem strange, and hardly credible to some persons, that there should have arisen such a sect as this: but daily and woful experience shews us that there is nothing so strange, nothing so senseless, which some men will not throw out, and which others will not swallow.

Industry in our worldly callings is necessary, because it is impossible to neglect it and to be obedient servants of God, as it may appear several ways.

Naked came we into this world, and destitute of all things which support and preserve life; naked also as to our minds, which at first are a mere blank, and have no knowledge. But the soul and the body are made and designed by their Creator, the one to improve in understanding, the other to increase in strength, and to be employed by the soul in a manner which may conduce to the welfare of both. Thus God by the voice of nature teacheth us that he designed us to be improvable and industrious beings.

To these deductions of reason the scriptures agree in many places. They tell us that God put the first man into the garden of Eden, to cultivate and embellish it. Afterwards, upon his transgression, it was told him that his work should be increased, and that in the sweat of his face he should eat his bread. Great travel is created for every man, says the author of Ecclesiasticus, and a heavy yoke is upon the sons of Adam, from the day that they go out of their mother's womb, till the day that they return to the mother of all things. This is very true; and yet so many advantages both to body and mind arise from labour, that it may be made a question whether the toil which God enjoined to Adam after his fall, and to his posterity, was a punishment or a favour. Certain it is that labour, if it was brought into the world by transgression, is one of the best preservatives against it; if it was the child of sin, it is the parent of virtue.

Again; God who hath made us incapable of subsisting by ourselves, and obliged to our fellow creatures in part, for the things which we possess, teaches us by the voice of reason that we also in return ought to promote the welfare of others. Before we come to years of discretion, we have contracted a debt of gratitude to those who have educated us, and to the nation to which we belong. We cannot refuse to discharge it without great injustice, nor can we discharge it without industry in our callings.

The gospel strictly commands us to do good, to assist, to instruct, to direct, and to relieve. It commands us therefore that the idle person hath neither power nor inclination to perform. Laziness is always attended with ignorance, and usually produces poverty; and it is not to be expected that he who is so negligent of his own body and mind, should be serviceable to others, and should love his neighbour more than himself.

Add to this, that in general whosoever is slothful in business, in his worldly concerns, will probably be a slothful christian too; for the same temper which disposes to the one, disposes to the other; and the same difficulties which deter a man from labouring to live creditably, will discourage him from striving to live religiously. It is the nature of idleness to hate to take pains, and of goodness to be active; and therefore there is little reason to hope that they should meet and dwell together.

Idleness is the parent of vice. He who hath some end, some innocent and honest end to pursue, and is constantly busy in contriving and executing what tends to it, and hath accustomed himself not only to labour but to delight in his calling, keeps beyond the reach of many temptations, or if they find him out, will often send them away, because he is not at leisure; but numberless are the temptations to which the sluggard is exposed, and by which he is continually assaulted.

His understanding is furnished with nothing good and useful, it pursues nothing steadily; it hath contracted an aversion from serious study and meditation: his imagination will therefore be restless, and rove in quest of one folly or other, for entertainment; for the soul is busy whether we will or no, it cannot cease from thought, design, and action, of one sort or other, either useful or frivolous, either good or bad; and when it is not directed to that which is profitable, and tied down to some particular work, will grow wicked for want of employment. A vacant mind is a proper habitation for a devil: it is the house, which he cometh and findeth empty; then goeth he and taketh with himself seven other spirits more wicked than himself, and they enter in and dwell there.

An idle person usually loaths his own company, for which indeed he is not much to be blamed. He cannot endure to converse with himself or with his betters. This drives him to contract unprofitable friendships, or rather acquaintances, for seldom is there friendship where there is no virtue. He seeks out those who are like himself, and whose time is a burden to them: he becomes a companion of mean and debauched persons; their bad qualities he soon imitates, and makes no small progress in vice, which is the only thing that he is disposed to learn.

An idle person, unless favoured by an extraordinary concurrence of circumstances, falls into want, and thence into wickedness; for he who through laziness becomes poor, is usually prepared for any mischief. When he is reduced to straits, then follows, What shall I do? I cannot dig; to beg I am ashamed. But nature craves, and his wants are importunate: something he must do, and it must be something which is not laborious, and only requires lying, or forswearing, or cheating, or robbing, or some other vice.

Thus it appears that industry in our worldly affairs is a duty which God requires from us, that there is a closer connection between it and religion than we usually imagine, that it is impossible to live an idle life and a good life, and that he is really serving God, who is busy in his calling.

Another motive to diligence and industry is, that of all bad dispositions laziness is perhaps the most deceitful, and the most vexatious, and that in all honest labour there is much satisfaction. The love of ease and pleasure produces idleness; yet such is the nature of things, that idleness produceth neither ease nor pleasure, but the reverse. All men valuc the conveniences of life: the idle person takes the surest way to penury. All men love respect and reputation: the idle person is ever contemptible, because he is ever unserviceable and ignorant, an useless burden of the earth, salt that hath lost its savour, fit for nothing else than to be cast out and trodden under foot. All wish to have faithful friends upon whose good offices they may depend: the idle person very seldom finds such, and if he has them, he often loses them, because he hath no amiable qualities which may recommend him to them, and secure their esteem. All desire peace at home, and the love of those to whom they are nearly related: the idle person takes no care of his family, and can expect no affection there. All would unbend their minds sometimes, and rest a little from their labours: but the lazy person, who would perpetually amuse himself, is disappointed in that also, and tired and cloyed even with his diversions; for pleasure is no pleasure when it becomes the sole employment, and must be interrupted often and long by serious affairs, to become acceptable and entertaining.

The desire of the sluggard killeth him. He hath desires as strong as the most active and industrious ever feel, and indeed stronger, because he follows no business, an attention to which would drive out of his mind vain and foolish wishes. He desires wealth and pleasure, and honour and power, and the favour and esteem of the world. He desires that these things would come and seek him out, and offer themselves to him, without any endeavour exerted on his part to obtain them; and these desires are usually disappointed, and leave him to the vexation which arises from inconsistent affections. Then follow dissatisfaction, dislike of his condition, envy and hatred of those who surpass him in good qualities, and are in high esteem, of those whose labours are recompensed with success, and of those who, deservedly or undeservedly, possess the things which he covets.

These are vexations from which industry in our callings will secure us. It hath a tendency to preserve health of body and serenity of mind: it repays us with something that is grateful and useful.

In all prudent labour of the hands or the head some acquisition is made; we maintain ourselves, and are not burthensome to others; we get skill, dexterity, and experience, and so learn to do our work with less toil and trouble; we improve our understanding, and find out truths which more than reward the pains of seeking them.

By industry we obtain credit and reputation. Every one is willing to employ a diligent person, and whatsoever his condition be, he cannot be contemptible.

By industry we shut out many implacable enemies to our repose, many fretting desires, and sorrowful reflections, and turbulent passions, and violent temptations.

By industry we become beneficial to others, able to assist our friends, to relieve the poor, to instruct the ignorant, and to provide more especially for those whom God hath committed to our care.

Thus much concerning industry in our worldly callings.

II. Let us now pass on to diligence in religious affairs, in working out our salvation, to which we have the most pressing motives.

The shortness and uncertainty of life warns us not to neglect it; for since upon our present behaviour depends our future state; since the days of man are few, few according to the course of nature, and often made fewer by a thousand unforeseen accidents, it behoves us to lose no time, but to set about our duty instantly, to-day whilst it is called to-day.

The reward set before us excites us to it. We think it reasonable to labour for conveniences which are temporal, that is, uncertain and transitory; and this industry is commendable. Much more should we exert our utmost care and diligence in securing to ourselves the unchangeable felicity of God, the society of saints and angels, and an endless happiness which shall be mixed with no sorrows and disappointments.

Gratitude moves us to it; to serve him, with all our power who hath done much for us, with whose benefits we are enclosed and surrounded, which way ever we cast our eyes and our thoughts.

The punishment allotted to the idle and wicked servant calls us to it, to think no labour too great by which we may avoid the wrath to come. Infamy and reproach, and want and dependence appear in terrible forms to us, and to escape them we are willing, if we have any spirit, to labour incessantly, and to submit to the hardest toil. Fools and blind, if we perceive not that these are nothing, compared to the woe which must be the future portion of those who will not serve God here in this state of probation.

Our present interest invites us to it, to be most industrious in pursuing the welfare of our soul, which will procure us peace of mind, and the blessing of God even upon our worldly undertakings; whilst a neglect of our duty to him will be attended with fear and remorse, and give us an uneasiness which outward circumstances, however flourishing, will not be able to compose.

Such motives we have to religious industry. Every Christian will certainly allow them to have sufficient weight and force, and acknowledge that eternal life is desirable, and that it is an indispensable duty to serve God. But the illusion is this: We are inclined to think this duty so easy to be performed, that a very little diligence and caution will be sufficient.

Let us then consider what kind of expressions the sacred writers use, when they speak of our Christian duty. They exhort us to be rich and fruitful in every good work, to be ready to every good work, to be zealous of good works, to abound always in the work of the Lord, to pursue and work good towards all men, to exercise ourselves in godliness, and in the labour of charity, to work out our salvation with fear and trembling, to give diligence to make our calling and election sure, to continue patiently in well-doing, to see that we may obtain a prize, and to press towards the mark, to watch continually and be upon our guard, to give all diligence to add one virtue to another, to walk circumspectly, to watch incessantly, to pray, to gird up the loins of our mind, to strive that we may enter in at the strait gate, to wrestle against principalities and powers, to take the kingdom of heaven by violence, to fight that we may receive a crown, and to war a good warfare, and to endure hardship as faithful soldiers of Jesus Christ.

Thus the Scriptures tell us plainly, that without some labour we cannot be good. The difficulties with which the first Christians struggled were many and great; and difficulties of one kind or other will ever be arising. We are assaulted by importunate temptations; we often feel a propensity to go aside from our duty, and we are surrounded with bad examples, with multitudes who pursue their own destruction. When we reflect upon these things, we may perhaps be led into the other extreme, and suspect that the ways of righteousness must needs be disagreeable, and that the passage through them is tedious and painful.

But the Scriptures say that the ways of religion are ways of pleasantness; and the word of God is true, and consistent with itself. That obedience is a labour, and that it is a pleasure, are equally certain. That these things are reconcilable will appear, if we consider that in all honourable and profitable employments, in all arts, in all studies, the beginnings are difficult, and the difficulties must be mastered by obstinate application. But many things contribute to lessen those difficulties daily, or to make men less sensible of them; as, a sprightly resolution, present profit, the hope of still greater advantages, experience and practice, and long custom, which is a second nature. Thus some, whom idle bystanders judge to lead a wretched and laborious life, are really most contented and pleased with their condition; for a man is just as miserable as he thinks himself, and if he delights in industry, industry to him is a diversion, and idleness is a toil.

So also is it in our religious concerns. The duty of a Christian is a laborious thing, especially to those who have bad dispositions to conquer, or particular difficulties to encounter; but when we do any thing good with labour, the labour passeth away, and the good remains: when we do any thing evil with pleasure, the pleasure passeth away, and the evil remains; and then custom making our obedience habitual, an even temper, peace of mind, and many other present advantages springing from it, the hope not only of escaping future evil, but of obtaining everlasting life, and the divine assistance vouchsafed to us as far as it is needful, will by degrees make our inclinations join with our reason, and our duty become our delight.

SERMON XCIX.

By DOCTOR JORTIN.

On Contentment.

PHILIPP. iv. 11.

I have learned in whatsoever state I am therewith to be content.

IF content ariseth from pleasure, and discontent from pain, and if the mind be exposed to receive impressions of pleasure and pain from the things which surround it, it seems to follow that content cannot be taught or learned, and that it depends not so much upon us, as upon the circumstances in which we are placed. But if there be pleasures which the mind can secure to itself, and if God hath made us capable of acquiring blessings which outward objects can neither give nor take away, the art of being contented may be learned, and this happy temper may be acquired.

There are many reasons for which we ought to be contented, and there are certain means, by the use of which we may learn to acquiesce in our condition, which I shall lay before you, after a few observations upon the nature of contentment.

1. There is no occasion to say much in its praise, and to persuade men that it deserves to be sought, and that they will find their account in it. Every one is desirous of it, and agrees in setting a just value upon it.

2. Some there are who possess all the necessities of life, and want no external helps to happiness, and yet are not satisfied, because their desires are extravagant and boundless. It would be a vain attempt to endeavour to teach such persons contentment, who have so many things to learn, and so many to unlearn, before they can hear reason upon this head.

3. It is not necessary that he who is contented in his state, should prefer that state to any other, or should never use any endeavours to mend his condition. A person may be contented, who has not some of the conveniences of life, and who is seeking to acquire them: but then he will not be uneasy without them, or afflicted and dejected if he should meet with disappointments in his pursuits. If he can obtain them, they will be welcome to him; if he cannot, he will not be much disturbed about it.

4. Contentment, even in a prosperous situation, is a commendable quality, since it depends much upon goodness of heart, and a right temper of mind, and without them is not attainable in any condition: yet it must be confessed that when there is an affluence of all accommodations, it is no extraordinary accomplishment to be satisfied; so that this virtue is better tried, and appears to more advantage when we are deprived of the things which are generally valued, and might be innocently enjoyed. This is the contentment on which we propose to discourse. St. Paul says in the text, that he had learned to be contented in all states. And what state was his? The history of the Acts of the Apostles and his own Epistles will inform us, that it was a state which to the greater part of men would be very unacceptable and very irksome.

5. Contentment, as it is a virtue, may be said to belong chiefly to a condition which is not the easiest, nor yet the hardest and most wretched. In sore calamities and extreme misery, there is another virtue very nearly related to contentment, which seems to take place; namely, a patient resignation to the will of God, which hath in it every thing that is to be found in contentment, except cheerfulness.

6. Lastly, If every thing happens to us at present according to our desires, if God hath liberally poured down upon us temporal blessings, if we have friends, and health, and honour, and riches, and youth, yet we should study to acquire that most useful and excellent art of being contented in every state, and of preserving an even temper of mind under any change of circumstances; for we know not how soon we may have occasion to practise this virtue, and we may be almost certain that such occasions will arise in the course of life, and in a state where nothing is of a fixed and permanent nature. Friends may die, and friendships may be dissolved, health may be soon and suddenly and irretrievably lost, promises may be broken, and kindnesses repaid with ingratitude, riches may make themselves wings, and take their flight, the favour of the world is uncertain, reputation is not always secured by innocence and desert, our best days steal silently and insensibly away, and others less agreeable succeed them.

I proceed now to offer some reasons for which we should be contented in our state, though it be exposed to inconveniences.

I. If we are uneasy, impatient, angry, vexed, envious, querulous, and dejected, because we have not this or that which we think suitable for us, we act most absurdly, we add to our misery, we afflict ourselves to no purpose, we are our own enemies. If all sin be folly, if every bad disposition be irrational, discontent is so in a more eminent manner.

A greater stress should not be laid upon this argument than it will bear, and therefore we must acknowledge that, considered by itself, and not seconded by other motives, it will hardly prove strong enough to calm a dissatisfied mind. And yet it hath its use, which is this: Since discontent is confessedly a very troublesome evil, which makes our condition worse than it would else be, the consideration of this should dispose us to use our utmost endeavours to overcome it, and patiently to listen to those arguments which may convince us of the wisdom and profitableness of the contrary temper.

II. Another motive to contentedness may be drawn from observations made upon the state of mankind, upon the evils and calamities with which this world at all times abounds. We cannot entertain a more foolish hope than to expect to be distinguished by a constant course of happiness from that cloud of sufferers which surrounds us. We complain of our own hard lot, we repine at this or that inconvenience, whilst there are thousands, whose state is so far worse than ours, that they would think themselves happy if they might exchange their condition for that which we think so insupportable. We imagine, it may be, that we have many causes of discontent: we should look abroad a little, and see how it fares with the rest of mankind; and when we have done this, if we return home again and enter into ourselves, and consider our condition, we shall find that perhaps it is not so bad as it might have been, and that there is nothing uncommon in it.

This is an argument which heathen authors have very frequently used, and which they seem to have accounted one of the best. But it may be thought liable to a few objections.

First, it may be said that evils are not the less felt by us because we know that others also suffer them; and that the consideration of the calamities abounding in all times and places, of which every one must expect a share, is rather a motive to us to be willing to leave the world, than to be contented in it.

The objection is not material. To say that our evils are not alleviated from the consideration that they are common to mankind, is to cavil, and to contradict matter of fact, and the testimony of multitudes. And to the observation that reflections upon the troubles of life will rather incline us to dislike the world than to be contented in it; to that it may be replied, a moderate contempt of the world and contentment are not far asunder: repining and discontent arise from a violent affection for things here below; and a coldness towards them enables us to bear the diminution, the absence, or the loss of them the more calmly.

There remains another and a stronger objection, namely, that it is a spiteful and malicious comfort which is drawn from the sufferings of others, and a proof that we take pleasure in them, and would see none happier than ourselves.

The proper answer to it seems to be this: Evils of any sort are then most irksome to us when they come unexpected, and surprise us unprepared to bear them. We then think our condition particularly hard, and ourselves singled out, as it were, by Providence to suffer more than others; and we persuade ourselves that any one would be as uneasy as we are. But observations upon the course of things will teach us to arm ourselves against disappointments, and not expect a settled prosperity; they will inform us of greater afflictions than in all probability we have known, and of many persons who have shewed an evenness of temper, and a calmness of mind, under circumstances as undesirable as ours, and who have made them light by bearing them decently. Such reflections surely may be made without any malignity, any satisfaction arising directly from the misfortunes or miseries of others. When we read or hear of great and good persons, adorned with useful and amiable accomplishments, overlooked and neglected by the world, exposed to poverty, losses, slights, censures, or other inconveniences, proceeding with patient serenity and mild composure, neither envying the fortunate, nor fawning upon the worthless, nor bemoaning themselves, nor repining, nor complaining; in contemplating these characters, we find instruction and relief, and pleasure too, a pleasure accompanied with no malevolence, but with the sincerest esteem for such persons. There is indeed such greatness and dignity in suffering virtue, that it can hardly excite our pity, which seems to give place to admiration and applause. Our Saviour, speaking of good men tried with adversity, and maintaining their patience and integrity, represents them rather as objects of reverence than of compassion, annexes blessedness to their condition, and pronounces them happy upon the whole.

III. Another motive to allay our discontent may be suggested to us from considering the bad disposition of so many persons, who having those things of which we are deprived, yet are by no means contented. They want something which they have not, or they are afraid of losing that which they have. We think them no better than fools. But have we not reason to fear that if we were in their situation, we should be just such fools as they? A person who is resigned and contented in an inconvenient state, may reasonably enough presume that a better state would not spoil him; but the same discontent which makes his present condition so irksome to him, would probably follow and accompany him even in the midst of plenty and prosperity.

IV. Another cause for contentment may be drawn from such a consideration of divine Providence, as the light of reason will suggest. God is our common Father, the best and greatest of beings: he is not an unconcerned spectator of causes and effects; he is not ignorant of our condition; he is not envious and cruel; he takes no pleasure in our disappointments and sorrows; he places us in a state which he knows to be convenient for us, though we perhaps cannot at present discern it to be so. Let us therefore humbly, and, if we can, cheerfully commit ourselves to his care, and be contented to act the part allotted to us. To will what God wills, to like what he orders, is a duty which was discerned by several persons even in the pagan world, and recommended by some of them in an excellent manner.

V. Another reason for contentment is taken from a consideration of the advantages and of the good things which fall to our share. Every dissatisfied person is ungrateful. What he has not he knows too well, and calls to mind too often; and of what he has he seems to be quite ignorant. Several blessings which deserve daily return of thanksgiving are lost upon him, blessings which relate to his mind, or body, or possessions, or friends, or family.

VI. It should also be considered that there are many advantages which often arise out of those very inconveniences which we dislike, and that there are many evils and bad consequences which frequently attend a more flourishing condition.

We may instance in poverty, that is, in a middle state between indigence and wealth. A person in that state hath perhaps few friends, but they are usually sincere; he hath few enemies, and those usually inconsiderable. Envy and calumny commonly spare him and overlook him, as one beneath their notice; his wants call him to labour, to industry, to temperance, and these are the best means of preserving the health of his body and of his mind. Thus might we survey and examine many of the hardships and misfortunes of which men complain, and point out something profitable which often accompanies them and lessens their weight.

But wealth and power and prosperity, though harmless in themselves, are to many persons very pernicious; to a weak mind and a bad temper they prove fatal blessings and dangerous companions. They come like proud and magnificent guests, and bring with them a long train of troublesome attendants, of follies, and cares, and disorders; they teach men to forget their great concern, to contract an immoderate fondness for the amusements and allurements of the world; and by raising their passions and weakening their reason, they make them unable to bear even common and trifling disappointments.

VII. I have shewed that we ought to accept of the state in which Providence hath thought fit to place us: and the reasons hitherto used have been those which our own abilities enable us to discover. But there are yet stronger motives to contentment, which revelation more particularly suggests to us. Contentment is best learned in the school of Christ: there St. Paul learned it; I have learned, says he, in whatsoever state I am, therewith to be content. I know both how to be abased, and how to abound: every where and in all things I am instructed both to be full and to be hungry, both to abound and to suffer need. I can do all things through Christ who strengtheneth me.

Another reason then for contentment may be drawn from considering God's love and care for us, as set forth in the gospel. He is there represented as the Father of mercies, and the God of all consolation; we are there taught that he loved us before we loved him, and so loved the world, that he gave his only Son to mankind, and with him and by him remission of sins and assurance of happiness; that he who conferred upon us so inestimable a benefit, will certainly refuse us nothing expedient for us; that he who gave us his Son, will freely give us all things; that he is our Father, who loves us better than any parent ever loved any child; that we may cast our cares upon him, because he careth for us, and will never forsake those who serve him; that when evil of any kind befalls us, God permits and designs it for our profit, either to wean us from this world, or to try our love to him, and to exercise our virtue, or to correct us for some failings, or because too much prosperity might be dangerous and fatal to us; that all things shall work together for our good, and that we shall receive from him an hundred fold now, in this present time, that is, many solid advantages, which are beyond comparison more valuable than those upon which the world sets so great an esteem.

VIII. Another motive to contentment ariseth from reflexions upon our own defects and unworthiness. If upon a review of our lives, our conscience bears witness against us that we have been guilty of many transgressions, and this is the case of many a discontented person, all dissatisfaction under our present condition must be most unreasonable and ungrateful. How can we think it hard that God should not grant us all our desires, when we have not given him what he requires from us? Instead of yielding to sullen discontent, we should be very thankful that we have opportunities in our hand of reconciling ourselves to him by amendment. Why should a living man complain? Life, considered only in itself, is perhaps of no high value; but to one who hath mispent his past days, and been negligent in his duty, every hour of it is an inestimable treasure, because rightly employed it may conduce to his eternal welfare. Whosoever hath still his peace to make with God, and time still allowed him to do it, should esteem himself most happy, and think of the case of those sinners whose sun is set, from whose eyes the things belonging to their peace are now hid, and who are gone to receive the recompense of their evil deeds. How gladly would they return, and take up with a life which he thinks destitute of all comfort!

IX. The last motive to contentment which I shall mention, arises from the consideration of the reward which is set before us.

It is a most certain and evident truth, that if any person firmly believed a future state of happiness, and could entertain an humble and modest hope that he should have some share in it, he would more easily rest satisfied with his condition for the few days of his pilgrimage here below. The expectation of undisturbed peace and rest from all trouble, the hope of living for ever with God and with good beings, and of making a continual progress in wisdom and knowledge, in virtue and in every amiable disposition, would compose the mind, and raise it above care and disquiet. Temporal inconveniences would then seem little and inconsiderable, and the common objects of men's hopes and fears, of their desires and uneasiness, would appear as a shadow which in a moment is and is not. Whilst the inhabitants of this world are busied in various employments with eager diligence and assiduity, as if they had no views reaching beyond this life, or as if they were to dwell here for ever; whilst some of them heap up riches, others seek applause and respect, others labour to advance themselves, others are wholly taken up with pleasures and amusements, others grieve because they are disappointed, and their labours are unrewarded, and the world frowns upon them; the swift and silent flight of days carries them all to the hour when these things cease, or when they have no further use. The children of God, like the children of this world, have their appointed time to employ; like them they pass their days in a place where there is no settled habitation, no certain possession; like them they meet with vicissitudes of ease and pain, of prosperity and adversity; like them they are carried away by the revolutions of days and years to their last end: but to Christians this last end is the dawning to an everlasting day, the entrance into peace and happiness, and the beginning of a life which alone deserves the name of life.

These are motives which reason and revelation offer, to make us contented in our several states. If they have no good effect, the fault is rather in us than in them; and indeed it is easier to convince the understanding, than to reform the heart and compose the passions. The true method therefore to acquire contentment is to be good, or, if we have offended, to repent and amend: else we may seek it late and early, but we shall not find it. It doth not use to make its abode in wicked minds. It is probable that such persons will not possess it even when they are in a state of prosperity, because guilt is commonly an uneasy thing; but it is most certain that they will not enjoy it when evil of any sort overtakes them; for that is the time when their conscience will give them the most disturbance.

As a careful observance of our duty in general is the best method of acquiring contentment, so there are particular acts of religion which have a more immediate connection with it: such is supplication to God, that he would raise our minds above the world, and scatter those clouds of sadness that overshadow them, and lift up the light of his countenance upon us, and strengthen us against all events, to which humble and earnest addresses, favourable promises of support are made in the Scriptures; such is humility, and a sense of our defects; and such is gratitude for benefits received.

To these we should by all means add industry in our affairs and callings. If you observe the dissatisfied part of mankind, you shall find no small number of them to be indolent and unoccupied. Idleness breeds in them discontent; and discontent increases their aversion from business; and then every thing displeases them. But industry is innocent, pleasant, and profitable; drives out despondence and melancholy by diverting the thoughts, and fixing them on other objects, and by ever presenting to the mind something new, and something useful.

To industry should also be joined a sober and sparing use of those things which are not absolutely requisite to our being, or to our well being; a decent moderation in food, in raiment, in furniture, in equipage, in diversions and amusements. For here again, if you consider the discontented tribe, you shall find that one great cause of their uneasiness arises from their coveting, not the necessities, no, nor yet the convencess, but the superfluities of life; it arises from those artificial and imaginary wants, which are not of God's producing, which the world, the flesh, and the devil, have contrived together to create, which human nature knows not, and which reason and Scripture allow not. All such extravagant cravings bring forth as many moral evils and pernicious effects. Of this wicked and widespread disease the remedy is always at hand, and that remedy is temperance.

And here the present season, and the exhortations of the church, admonish me to recommend to you temperance, and abstinence, abstinence exercised with discretion; and not to dismiss you without some hints upon this subject.

There is, as we may not improperly call it, a perpetual fast, to which we are obliged, as rational creatures and as Christians, namely, a fast from all intemperate affections, turbulent passions, and irregular practices. But there is also an abstinence at particular times from the lawful pleasures of life; and the fitness of such a conduct may easily be proved upon the principles of human reason and common sense. I explain myself by a few instances: your own thoughts may suggest more.

A person in health and good circumstances hath food of various kinds at command. But such is the instability of human affairs, that he may be reduced to a morsel of bread. It is expedient therefore for him, at certain times, to take up with such spare and plain diet, as sufficeth to remove pain, and to satisfy the cravings of the body. He will be better able to shift for himself upon any turn of fortune. I need not add that such abstinence will conduce to preserve his health. No one, I presume, will deny it.

Such a person, it may be, hath various diversions and entertainments at command, and may repair to them as often as he thinks fit. But many accidents may deprive him at a stroke of all these beloved amusements, which are the epidemical disease and infatuation of the present age. Let him learn then how to live without them, by shunning them more frequently, whilst they are in his reach.

Such a person may usually have a variety of company abroad and at home.

But various events may reduce him to solitude. Let him then learn beforehand to bear solitude at certain times, to converse with useful books, with his God, and with his own soul, and think himself in good company.

Whosoever practises such abstinence upon the principles above mentioned, may be said to keep a moral and philosophical fast; but if what he thus saves in his expences, he gives to the needy and deserving, then, and not till then, he converts his rational into a truly religious and Christian fast.

SERMON C.

By DOCTOR JORTIN.

On Humility.

PET. i. 5.

—Be clothed with humility.

In my remarks upon the subject of humility, I shall follow the usual method of discoursing upon moral virtues.

I. I will consider the nature and the effects of humility:

II. I will represent the motives and inducements to the practice of it.

I. I will consider its nature and effects, and represent it in these three views:

As it relates to our own private thoughts, and is confined to ourselves:

As it respects our duty to God:

As it influences our conduct towards our neighbour.

Humility, as it relates to our own private thoughts and judgment, requires that we should entertain no better an opinion of ourselves than we deserve. To judge too hardly and severely of ourselves, and to fancy that we are guilty of faults from which we are free, cannot be acts of humility, because there can be no virtue in mistake and ignorance. Only, as we have all a propensity to extenuate our defects, and to over-rate our good deeds, it is safest to err on the other side, to correct this bent by forcing the mind somewhat po-wards the contrary way, and frequently to review our failings, and the many causes which we have of rejecting all arrogant and conceited thoughts.

Our Maker hath conferred upon us several gifts which we cannot possibly value too much, as long as we acknowledge them to come from him, and endeavour to make a right use of them. It shews ingratitude and ill-nature to lessen and undervalue the benefits which we receive from our friends; and to behave in this manner towards God, is still more blameable. In forming, therefore a mean and despicable opinion of ourselves in particular, and of human nature in general, there may be not only no sound judgment, no modesty, no goodness of any sort, but error, ignorance, malevolence, and depravity of heart.

Some of the unbelieving and irreligious tribe have said, that a persuasion of the soul's immortality and of future rewards arose from the presumption and vanity of man, who being proud and high-minded, fancies himself a more considerable and important animal than he really is; whilst they, throwing aside these prejudices, and aspiring to no such dignity, meekly acknowledge themselves to be brethren to the brutes, and expect after a few days to perish with them. This is humility; but it is so only in a bad sense, in the sense which the Romans used to fix upon the word, intending to express by it a sordid and mean spirit.

Others have affirmed, that man never performs any good action, that all his seeming virtues are real vices, because self-love and a regard to his own interest is at the bottom of them, and conducts him in every step that he takes.

They who entertain such injurious notions of human nature, forfeit all claim to the approbation and esteem of others. Charity itself, which thinketh no evil, cannot judge favourably of those who would transform every thing into vice, and banish all virtue from the earth.

Others, who are much better persons than the former, think that it is God who does all, in and for the righteous, in an arbitrary and irresistible manner, giving to some and refusing to others that assistance without which every one must perish. And this notion is, as they pretend, the very character of humility; whilst they really, though I will not say designedly, detract from the goodness, and justice, and wisdom of God, and confound the notions of virtue and vice.

Lastly, there are some who have too mean an opinion of their own abilities, and by fancying themselves to be useless, become so, and dare not attempt many things in which they are capable of succeeding, and which they ought to perform. This behaviour arises more from indolence or melancholy than from humility.

Humility then, as it relates to the judgment which we form concerning ourselves, is a due sense of our imperfections; of those which are common to human nature, and of those which are more peculiarly our own.

The imperfections common to human nature are these:

Mortality, which came into the world by sin, and all the bad consequences attending it, a body weak and frail; and exposed to various disorders and diseases, which, as it is united to the soul, hath a great influence upon its operations, and often proves an impediment to its progress towards wisdom and goodness.

A stronger propensity to evil than to good, which all persons at certain times and on certain occasions have experienced, and guilt, from some degrees of which none was ever free.

An understanding liable to be frequently deceived, and a knowledge which at the best is much confined.

The infirmities peculiar to ourselves are those defects, either in goodness, or in knowledge, or in wisdom, by which we are inferior to other persons.

To be sensible of these weaknesses and faults, is humility, as it relates to ourselves; to lessen or overlook them, is pride.

Let us now consider the effects which humility produces towards God.

Here it is also necessary to distinguish between true and false humility. That God is most just and holy, and that we are sinners, that the gospel contains a perfect rule of righteousness, and that the best of us in many things transgress this rule: these are truths of which we ought to have a serious and a constant sense.

But there are here also extremes which should be avoided; for we may form too abject and too bad an opinion of ourselves, or we may represent God as a most strict and severe and inexorable master, or we may imagine that a perfection which we are not able to acquire, is enjoined to us as necessary to salvation, or we may fear that repentance and amendment shall avail us nothing; or we may make religion to consist principally in a set of trifling and difficult rules, from which if we swerve, our mistaken conscience will condemn us. Such notions as these have in a greater or a lesser degree possessed many minds, and hence hath arisen a slavish dread and horror of God, and a devotion overrun with superstition and uncommanded austerities. This is not humility, but ignorance; abject fear and religious melancholy.

True and rational humility, as it influences our behaviour towards our Maker, produces a religious awe, and banishes presumption, and carelessness, and vain-glory. The humble person, considering the perfections of God, and comparing them with his own imperfections, approaches him with reverence, and acknowledges himself unworthy of his favour, and unable, without his assistance, to perform his duty, to obtain either temporal conveniences or eternal life. He trusts not to his own heart, or wisdom, or strength. He frequently recollects and confesses his omissions and transgressions, and uses them as motives to greater industry and watchfulness. He receives temporal good from the hands of God with gratitude; and temporal evil with resignation, as a correction which he deserves, as a trial of his obedience, and as intended for his benefit.

The effects which humility produces in our behaviour towards men, are now to be considered; and here also the same distinction is to be repeated which was made before, namely, that there is a deceitful and false humility, which ought to be avoided. Thus some speak contemptibly of themselves, and pretend that they are ignorant of things in which they are well-skilled, and acknowledge themselves inferior to those whom they surpass; some pay a servile deference to the opinions and directions of others, and dare not use that reason and understanding which God has given them; some shun the conversation of their equals, and chuse companions of the lowest sort; and all these persons either fancy themselves to be humble, or would be accounted so by the world. Yet in such a conduct there may be no humility and modesty, but hypocrisy, or affectation, or bigotry, or a meanness of spirit mixed with pride and vanity.

Between an unmanly contempt and disregard of ourselves, with an abject fear and blind reverence of others, which is one extreme, and a proud, conceited, overbearing insolence, which is the other extreme, true humility proceeds always uniform and decent.

The humble person never assumes what belongs not to him; he desires to possess no more power, and to receive no more respect and compliance from others than is suitable to his own character and condition, and appointed by the laws and customs of society.

He is not a rigid exacter of the things to which he has an undoubted right; he can overlook and excuse many faults: he is not greatly disturbed and provoked at those slights and affronts which put vain and haughty persons out of all patience.

He is easy and quiet in his station, though he may deserve a better; not inclined to trouble the world with complaints and solicitations.

He can behold the success, much more the abilities and virtues, of others with the same even temper, and is not disposed to hate, or slander, or envy them upon that account.

The good and useful qualities with which he is endued, he employs in a prudent and unaffected manner, neither concealing them when they ought to appear, nor putting them forth for the sake of applause.

He is obedient to his superiors in things just and lawful, rendering tribute to whom tribute is due, custom to whom custom, fear to whom fear, honour to whom honour.

He is dutiful to his parents, teachers, and masters, courteous towards his equals, condescending towards his inferiors, merciful and placable towards his enemies, gentle and patient towards those who are in error, or overtaken in a fault.

He is candid in his judgment, and more inclined, when there is any room for it, to think and speak favourably than hardily.

He exercises power, if it be committed to him, with justice and impartiality, tempered with as much forbearance and lenity as is consistent with the public good.

II. The nature of humility has been considered. Let us now, secondly, consider the motives to the practice of it.

1. Humility is a virtue so excellent, that the Scriptures have in some sort ascribed it even to God himself.

Humility is a right opinion and estimate of ourselves, producing a suitable behaviour towards others. But as in ourselves we find much imperfection, a dependence always upon God, and often upon men, and no good quality which we can call entirely our own, and for which we are not indebted to our Maker; hence it is that humility consists principally in a due sense of our defects, our transgressions, our wants, and the obligations which we have received. Therefore such humility cannot be in God, in Him who possesses all perfections. But there is a part of humility, as it relates to our behaviour towards men, called condescension; and this is sometimes represented in Scripture as a disposition not unworthy of the Divine Nature. The Lord is high above all, his glory is above the heavens; yet he humbleth himself to behold the things that are in heaven and earth. Again: Though the Lord be high, yet hath he respect unto the lowly. Again; Lord, what is man, that thou art mindful of him; and the son of man, that thou visitest him? that is, that thou condescendest to take notice and care of him. This condescension is ascribed to God, not as if it were an occupation below him, or unworthy of his power and wisdom; but because a like behaviour in men towards their inferiors is called condescension. And in us it is called condescension, because we descend, not from our dignity, but from that false and foolish superiority and state which vain and conceited persons usurp and maintain.

2. The example of our Saviour is an example of every virtue, particularly of humility. He himself calls upon us to observe and imitate it, to come and learn of him to be meek, lowly in heart, patient, calm, and condescending.

His humility appears in most of the actions and circumstances of his life; in his birth, by which he became the child of a parent not less poor than virtuous; in the obscurity which he chose till he entered into his ministry; in his care to conceal his dignity, upon most occasions; in his submission to the ceremonial law, to the civil government, to wicked magistrates, to extreme want, and to extreme sufferings, in continually promoting, not his own glory, but the glory and honour of his Father; in his behaviour towards those who sought him, and towards those whom he himself took the pains to seek and to save, towards the ignorant and the mistaken, the sorrowful and penitent, the sick and needy, towards his friends and followers, and towards his accusers, betrayers, slanderers, persecutors, and murderers.

3. In the behaviour of the angels, as it is revealed to us in the Scriptures, we find that part of humility called condescension, or a willing and cheerful submission to any offices by which the good of others may be promoted. We are there taught that they have been, and that they always are ready at God's appointment, to guide, to direct, to succour, to comfort, to instruct, to assist, to relieve, to protect and deliver good men. Thus are they ministering spirits; and in the intercourse between us and them, the labour and the attendance is theirs, the profit is ours; we are ministered unto, and they minister. Hence we must learn to think it no disgrace to be, as our Lord says he was, the servants of all; to be occupied in procuring the ease, the improvement, the welfare, and the happiness of our brethren, and to account no acts base and mean, which produce so noble and excellent effects. In truth, we cannot be more creditably employed; nor can the holy angels better shew the excellence of their nature, than in thus stooping.

ing to our necessities; for it is more blessed, and more honourable too, to give than to receive. They bestow upon us substantial benefits, and we can return them nothing besides reverence and gratitude. Whosoever best imitates these holy spirits in humility and condescension towards his inferiors, approaches nearest to them in dignity; and whilst he abases himself, his actions exalt him.

4. It is affirmed in many places of Scripture, that humility secures to us the favour of God, and will bring down his blessing upon ourselves and our undertakings.

He that humbleth himself shall be exalted: with the lowly is wisdom: before honour is humility: honour shall uphold the humble in spirit: God shall save the humble: he giveth grace to the lowly, and exalteth the humble and meek: whosoever shall humble himself as a little child, the same is greatest in the kingdom of heaven: thus saith the high and lofty One that inhabiteth eternity: I dwell in the high and holy place; with him also that is of a contrite and humble spirit, to this man will I look, even to him that is poor, and of a contrite spirit, and trembleth at my word: them that are meek will God guide in judgment, and such as are gentle, them will he teach his way: he hath hidden the most valuable knowledge (that is, religious knowledge) from the wise and prudent, and hath revealed it unto babes.

From these passages we may observe that humility is highly acceptable to God; in general, because it is a virtue; in particular, because it disposes men to receive with modest submission the great truths of religion, to be willing to receive instruction, to yield to reason, and when there is sufficient evidence that a doctrine or precept is from God, to believe and observe it.

5. Humility usually gains the esteem and love of men, and consequently the conveniences, at least the necessities of life. Every one who has even slightly observed what passes in the world, must see and know this. Since all love themselves, they will probably approve and favour those who never provoke, insult, deride, or injure them, who shew them respect and civility, and do them good offices. The humble person therefore takes the surest way to recommend himself to those with whom he is joined in society, to increase the number of his well-wishers and friends, and to escape or defeat the assaults of detraction, envy, and malice. This amiable quality will stand by him, will be a protector and benefactor to him in all stations, and through all his days, particularly when he first enters into business and appears in public. Then the want of this one virtue is enough to ruin the person who stands so much in need of assistance, instruction, and recommendation. He who is young and unexperienced, proud and insolent, will scarcely be able to improve either his mind or his fortunes, and if he falls, will fall unpitied.

6. Such are the present advantages which humility usually secures to us from God and from men; usually, I say, but not constantly; because it is possible that an humble person may be neglected by the world, and that God may not interpose in his behalf, and may defer his reward to the next life. Therefore the most certain present recompense of humility is that which arises from its own nature, and with which it repays the mind that entertains it; and a very valuable recompense it would be, though it were the only one allotted to this virtue.

An humble person neither hates nor envies any one; therefore he is free from those very turbulent and uneasy vices which are always a punishment to themselves.

He is not discomposed by the slights or censures of others. If he has undesignedly given some occasion for them he amends the fault: if he deserves them not, he regards them as little.

He is contented with his condition, if it be tolerable: and therefore he finds satisfaction in all that is good, and overlooks and in some measure escapes all that is inconvenient in it.

He has a due sense of his unworthiness and defects, by which he is taught to bear calamities with patience and submission, and thereby to soften their harsh nature, and to allay their violence.

He is free from pride and ambition; therefore he never sacrifices his integrity, his honour, and his peace of mind, those substantial blessings, to the splendid trifles which are the objects of pride and ambition. He desires not to obtain them at all,

much less to obtain them in the common way, by sordid flattery, by sinful compliances, by dissimulation, by lying and slandering, by deceiving and over-reaching, by violence and oppression, by loss of time, by useless occupations, by dangerous attempts, by profusion and extravagance, by methods which have been pernicious to the fortunes, to the body, and to the mind of multitudes.

7. Lastly, from the account which we have given of humility, we may draw this conclusion, that it is not, as the insolent and haughty are inclined to imagine, an unmanly and sordid disposition? It is true that the word humility is used by Latin writers in a bad sense for meanness of spirit; but the pagans were not ignorant of this virtue, and have recommended it; only they gave it another name. Christianity indeed hath taught us juster notions of humility than they commonly entertained; for they usually considered humility, which they called Modesty, or Moderation, as a social virtue, as it influenced our behaviour towards ourselves and towards men; but humility towards God few of them seem to have sufficiently apprehended. It is indeed a virtue so remote from meanness of spirit, that it is no bad sign of a great and exalted mind. An humble person is one who is neither puffed up with approbation and applause, nor greatly provoked or disturbed by censure and ill-usage, who envies none placed above him, and despises none below him, who dares examine his own conduct, and condemn whatsoever is faulty in it, who is gentle to others and severe to himself, who desires to obtain no more than he deserves, who can quit even that also, if his duty requires it, who is contented to act the part which Providence allots to him, who is free from irregular self-love, that is, from one of the most insinuating and prevailing weaknesses of mankind, which may not improperly be called the inner garment of the soul, the first which it puts on, and the last which it puts off. If this be not, it will be hard to say what is greatness of mind.

On the contrary, if we would know what meanness of spirit is, and how it acts, let us look for it amongst the proud and insolent, and we shall not lose our labour. A proud man is one who is glad to receive homage and flattery, though it be offered to him by the most ignorant or worthless, and cannot bear contempt even from them; who therefore is the servant or slave of all, not in a good sense, but because his happiness depends upon their opinion and behaviour; who has no heart to own his obligations to God and man, whose life and conduct is one continual lie, who assumes good qualities which he has not, and is blind to his own faults; who desires to possess what he should not, and what he often cannot obtain; and who is much dissatisfied when he is disappointed. These are the persons who despise humility, and by despising recommend it.

S E R M O N C I.

On our Duty to God, our Neighbour, and ourselves: and first on our Duty to God.

TITUS ii. 11, 12.

The grace of God that bringeth salvation hath appeared to all men, teaching us, that, denying ungodliness and worldly lusts, we should live soberly, righteously, and godly, in this present world.

THE gospel of Jesus Christ, saith St. Paul, is revealed to us, and the design of it is, to teach and enable us to behave ourselves here in such a manner that we may obtain eternal life. Thus the words of the text contain in them a compendious representation of the whole duty of man, namely, faith and good works.

What relates to faith is rather intimated than expressed; but it is very plainly intimated, for since this perfect rule of life is discovered by the gospel, doubtless we must receive the gospel, and assent to it, and this is faith.

As to practice, we must live soberly, righteously, and godly. Sobriety contains our duty to ourselves, righteousness, our duty to our neighbour, and godliness our duty to God; and these duties are closely connected, and often coincide with one another and with Christian faith.

I shall at present consider that part of our duty which relates more directly to God, and is called godliness, though the word godliness or piety often stands for all religion in general.

In the first place, then, Christianity commands us to believe that there is one God, the Creator and Father of all. This is the foundation of religion; faith in God is the ground and support of all goodness, and may itself in some sense be accounted a virtue, since it ariseth from sober consideration, from a regard to truth and goodness, and must be kept alive by the same means; and since a vicious and debauched mind is strongly disposed to doubt whether there be an invisible Creator and Lord of all, and to wish that there were none.

A belief in God is faith, and not sight, because the object of it is He who is not to be perceived by our senses, or comprehended by our imagination; but it is a faith founded upon reason, and supported by convincing arguments, of which the most plain and familiar are the frame and order and disposition of the visible world, the general consent of mankind, and the general usefulness of the doctrine itself, which is adapted to do us good, and which cannot possibly do us any harm.

Moreover, the Christian religion teacheth us to entertain just and honourable notions of God's perfections, both those which we commonly call natural perfections, such as eternity and infinite power; and those which we call moral perfections, as holiness, justice, goodness, and mercy. The Scriptures frequently remind us of both, as being proper to excite in us a fear and a love of God.

They cannot be said to entertain right conceptions of the Deity who extol his power, and his absolute and uncontrollable dominion over his creatures; but represent him at the same time as ruling in a way which, in any other being, we should call arbitrary and cruel. This can never be reconciled with the common notions of holiness, justice, and goodness; nor with the Scriptures, which represent God as love itself, who is good to all, and whose tender mercies are over all his works. It was long ago observed, that there never was any opinion, how absurd soever, which was not maintained by some or other of the ancient philosophers; but yet there are not to be found even amongst them any such hateful sentiments concerning God's transactions with men. To suppose that God hath doomed his creatures to eternal misery for being in a state of sin, which they cannot avoid, and out of which he will not help them, this, I say, is such a manifest contradiction to the divine perfections, that no men could possibly have entertained it, if they had not misunderstood some texts of Scripture, and taken it for a doctrine of revealed religion.

They who entertain just thoughts of God, and declare them upon all proper occasions, may be said to hallow or sanctify his name, which that all persons may do, we are taught by our Saviour to wish in our daily prayers. In this the Gentiles failed greatly, who ascribed to their deities human vices, and honoured them with impure and cruel rites. The Jews were not entirely free from fault in this respect, being much inclined to represent God as caring only for their nation, and regardless of the Gentiles; and indeed all Christians have not sufficiently avoided the same errors.

These things are of the more importance, because they who judge amiss concerning the perfections and the government of God, are much inclined to imitate all the defects which they ascribe to him.

It is a great violation of our duty to God, to interpose his holy name in things of no consequence, or, which is far worse, in confirmation of things which are false. Therefore our Lord hath not only forbidden perjury, but oaths upon trivial occasions; even those oaths, in which care was taken to avoid mentioning the name of God. Whosoever understands how sacred the divine Majesty is, and how many and how great benefits we have received, and have room to hope and expect from our Creator, cannot think of him without the deepest reverence, and will never name him in a rash and ludicrous manner, nor call upon him to be witness to a falsehood. This wicked behaviour was frequent amongst both Jews and Gentiles, and is no less frequent amongst persons who call themselves Christians; but it hath been detested and condemned by all serious and wise men in all times and places.

With this reverence towards God is joined a love to him. If we have any sense of his goodness and favour towards us his unworthy creatures, we cannot refuse him our love. This love consists, first, in a grateful sense of his benefits; secondly, in a desire of pleasing him, which shall be strong and active enough to overcome all contrary desires, so that our heart shall not be divided between God and any object which God condemns. This duty Moses enjoined, and our Saviour enforced, and represented as the first and great commandment.

Other love towards God than this the Scriptures know not: they never recommend those warm transports and that bold familiarity which some zealots affect; nor that refined and mysterious devotion which another sort of visionaries require, who say that we must love God for himself alone, and without any regard to the benefits we receive from him; for, first, the love of God is reason and not passion, reverence and not presumption; secondly, it is gratitude, and we love him because he first loved us.

The love of God cannot lie concealed in the breast, but will shine forth, and shew itself by good works, particularly by a love of mankind, as the Scriptures assure us. Without this behaviour, in vain do we profess to love God, who requires of us real proofs, and not idle words.

There is a worship which is due to God alone. Worship, or adoration, when it means a religious duty paid to God, is of two kinds. There is a worship of the body, and there is a worship of the mind. By the worship of the body, which hath been various in various times and places, is to be understood an humble posture, by which persons intend to acknowledge the supreme dominion of him to whom this reverence is paid. By the worship or adoration of the mind, is meant that submissive disposition, by which we own and profess, that He whom we adore is endued with all perfections, and that we depend wholly upon him, and from him expect all our happiness. Therefore God, as he is the Creator, the Lord, the Protector, and the Father of all, ordered himself alone to be adored in this manner, both in body and spirit; which our Saviour hath also confirmed, when he said to Satan, It is written, Thou shalt worship the Lord thy God, and him only shalt thou serve; him only, in opposition to false gods; for, as St. Paul says, though there be that are called gods, whether in heaven or in earth; as there be gods many and lords many, yet to us there is but one God, the Father, of whom are all things, and we to him; and one Lord Jesus Christ, by whom are all things, and we by him. And our Saviour saith, that the Father hath committed all judgment to the Son, that all men may honour the Son as they honour the Father.

The Gentiles notoriously transgressed this commandment, worshipping any thing, and every thing; as if it were lawful for mortal men to confer divine honours upon this or that object, as flattery or fancy should direct; than which nothing more absurd could easily be imagined, nor more injurious to the majesty of God.

The law and the gospel teach us, that in God alone our confidence should be placed, because he alone can and will do all things for us, and will never deceive our reasonable hopes, whilst in created beings there is neither that all-commanding power, nor that invariable will of doing good, nor that never-failing constancy in performing promises. So that reliance or trust is no inconsiderable part of our duty towards God. It relates in some degree to the things of this life, which God promiseth to his servants, so far as he judgeth fit, and conducing to their true interest. But it principally hath in view the endless happiness of the next world, which we should account to be our chief good.

And because our Lord hath given us clearer promises of life eternal than had been revealed before, and confirmed them by many proofs, and by his own glorious resurrection and ascension, the reliance which we place in God should be proportionably stronger and steadier. This reliance is a part of Christian faith, and is connected with obedience; and hence we may see that faith is deservedly extolled by the sacred writers, since it contains in itself, or in its genuine effects, the whole duty of man.

Since in many things we all offend, since we ought to deplore our omissions and commissions, and to wish that we may perform a better service for the future; since we are continually contending with temptations, by which if we be finally overcome, we have no longer a claim to the promises of the gospel, God hath commanded us to address ourselves to him for the pardon and the succour of which we stand in need. He wanteth not our prayers, to be informed of our weaknesses and necessities, or to be intreated and importuned as a difficult master, who will sell his favours upon no other terms. Nothing moved him to create us but his own nature overflowing with beneficence. He hath granted us many blessings, which we had no notion of requesting; as redemption by Christ, the knowledge of the gospel, and all the benefits which arise from these, and are connected with them. He hath imposed upon us the duty of prayer purely for our own sakes, and to make us better and happier. For when we pray to him, we call to mind our past follies and offences, and at the same time his infinite goodness, which forgives them upon our repentance, and we become sensible that we depend upon him in all respects, whence naturally arise gratitude towards so kind a benefactor, and earnest desires to obey and please him. Hence also will this consideration present itself to us, that if the compassionate and placable nature of God be so amiable, and in our sight the brightest and the fairest of all the divine perfections, we ought to imitate it in our behaviour towards others, and be merciful even as he is merciful, and, like him, forgive those who trespass against us.

Three things are requisite to make our prayers acceptable to God :

First, We must ask of God the things which are really and invariably good; such as the knowledge of moral and religious truth, the remission of sins, the divine assistance, and eternal life, all which are intimately united, and neither can or ought to be separated. For other good things we are permitted to ask; but this exception is always to be made or understood, that God would supply our wants, and satisfy our natural and innocent desires, in such a measure and manner as shall seem best to him, who knoweth better than we what is expedient for us.

Secondly, We must make our requests to God with acquiescence and humility. We must not prescribe to him what he should grant us; nor ever repine and murmur, if temporal blessings be withheld from us.

Thirdly, We must be fully sensible that we can have no certain access to him, no security of his favour, unless we endeavour to conform our behaviour to his precepts; for it is not reasonable that he should comply with the requests of those who refuse to comply with his holy will. Thus much our Saviour intimates, when he directs us to ask in his name. To ask in the name of Christ is the same thing as to profess before God that we are indeed the disciples and the servants of his Son, and upon that account to beg and to hope that he will extend his goodness towards us. But no person can have any pretence to make use of the name of Christ, who pays no regard to the conditions which Christ requires of his followers.

And because the love of our neighbour is not less our duty than the love of God, therefore we are taught to extend our prayers beyond our own private necessities; and whatsoever blessings we would gladly receive ourselves, we should also wish for all mankind.

Vehemence and earnestness is commendable in our prayers; but it is then only commendable when we ask for life eternal, and for the means conducing to it. A strong desire and a warm importunity to be delivered from temporal calamities, or to be enriched with temporal blessings, is a temper to which religion hath made no favourable promises. St. Paul earnestly besought the Lord that he might be delivered from the angel of Satan who buffeted him. But this request was not granted, because it was more to his true advantage to labour under that inconvenience, whatsoever it was, than to be freed from it. And he, as a wise and good man, acquiesced in the divine will.

Although the Jews were furnished both with precepts and with examples of prayer in the books of Moses and of the Prophets, yet was this duty neither completely taught, nor perfectly understood; because the express and literal promises in the law were temporal; so that they seldom seem to have asked for any thing higher; but only, as to things spiritual, to have requested in general for the favour of God. And yet the good men, who lived under that dispensation, were certainly not without hopes of a better state beyond the grave, and trusted in God that he would in some manner provide for them hereafter, according to his wisdom and goodness. We do not find in the books of the Old Testament every thing that is requisite to set the nature of prayer in a true light and to the best advantage; and we must make some suitable abatements and allowances on account of the more imperfect knowledge of those times. However, we find in those sacred writings many excellent examples of piety, of humility, of religious trust and confidence in God. The wiser Pagans have also made some good observations concerning prayer; and particularly they have remarked, that men ought not rashly to ask of the Deity whatsoever their childish and irregular and ignorant desires lead them to wish. They have recommended this short form of prayer, which certainly is modest and judicious; Grant us, O Lord, the things which are good for us, whether we ask, or ask not, for them; and the things which would be hurtful, withhold from us, though we should ask for them. But, besides that the wiser Pagans had some false notions concerning the Deity, the common sort observed no rules of decency and prudence in their prayers. So that Christianity in this, as in many other respects, greatly surpassed the religion of the wisest Pagans and Jews.

With our prayers to God are to be joined praises and thanksgivings to him for his glorious works, and for all the great and lasting benefits which with a liberal hand he pours down upon men. The Psalms of David, and indeed all the books of the holy Scriptures, are full of exhortations to celebrate the power and wisdom and clemency of God. The thing is of itself most reasonable, and whilst we perform it sincerely and heartily, we daily find the good effects of it.

For, besides the perpetual exercise of gratitude, the oftener we consider in our minds and distinctly examine the benefits and the works of God, the more easily we are induced to obey him; and the more effectually deterred from a vicious life. And this is one great reason why God requires from us these acts of piety towards him. No benefit and profit can accrue to him from our praises and thanks; nor would he be the less happy, though we passed over all his favours in stupid silence. Therefore it is for our own sakes that God demands this easy tribute from us. He is indeed said in Scripture to have made and done all for his own glory and praise; but the profit and the benefit of honouring him redound upon us. True it is that God is pleased with our piety, and our dutiful returns, because they are suitable both to his nature and to our own. He hath made all things for his own honour; this was one end: but another end was, that he might exercise his unspeakable goodness towards all objects capable of receiving it.

The writers of the gospels teach us to obey the divine precepts, not as slaves who fear a passionate, unreasonable, and rigid master, but as children who cheerfully comply with the directions and advice of a kind parent, which they know to be intended for their good.

But though the gospel in this respect surpasseth the Jewish dispensation, and treats us as sons, and brings us into a state of liberty, we must not imagine that the service which it demands is something slight and superficial, and requiring no pains and application; for it orders us to put off inordinate desires and evil affections, and, if it should ever prove necessary, to lay down and lose all, rather than to part with our religion, and offend God. Such an obedience is indeed difficult to those who are inclined to a slothful security, and love the world immoderately, and are not deeply affected with the rewards and punishments of the next state: but it may be practised by those who can govern themselves, and who have a lively sense of the great advantages present and future which are secured by piety; and by such it is more easily observed than a heavy multitude of rites and ceremonies.

This Christian obedience is described in the New Testament by different words and expressions. Sometimes it is called, to love God, sometimes to fear and reverence him. We may be said to love God, when we think honourably of him, gratefully acknowledge his goodness, and prefer his commands to all other considerations. The fear of God is a fear lest, by an improper behaviour, we should shew ourselves unthankful to our best benefactor; it is a fear lest we should incur his displeasure, not only because he can deprive us of happiness, and inflict punishments upon us, but principally because he is so good to us, and imposes nothing upon us which it is not our interest to perform.

Christ also required of his followers to shew openly their faith and love and reverence towards God, to confess their Saviour before men, upon all proper occasions, to excite others to the same disposition and behaviour, and to meet together for the exercise of religious duties. He also declared, that whosoever his servants should be assembled together in his name, he would be spiritually with them. He also promised that his church should never be destroyed, that it should last till the consummation of all things; which promise he hath hitherto fulfilled for more than seventeen hundred years. As to the order and method that should be observed in such assemblies, he gave no particular precepts, but left it to his apostles. Religious government, like civil government, is absolutely necessary in some form or other; but all forms of government are in their own nature indifferent, and so Christian nations have a right to appoint that which suits them best, remembering the direction of the apostle, Let all things be done decently and in order.

And because men are more affected with actions than with words, and all religions had their ceremonies, it was fit that Christians should have something of this kind. Therefore Christ appointed two religious rites, but very easy, very plain, and simple, and most remote from vain pomp, or superstition, by which Christians should profess their belief in him, acknowledge themselves his servants, keep his benefits in remembrance, and declare their friendship for each other. One was Baptism, which was no new thing to the Jews, for it had been practised by them, and also by John the Baptist; nor was it less known to the Gentiles. By this ceremony of initiation, Christians declared themselves servants of God, and of Christ, and of the Holy Ghost; were reminded that they must cleanse themselves from iniquity, and live a more pure and holy life; and that as they descended into the water and rose up from it, so they must die to sin and rise again to righteousness. The other was the Lord's Supper, which he instituted in memory of his death, and which shews, that they who eat together of the same bread, and drink of the same cup, should account each other as brethren who belong to one family. At the same time Christians profess that they continue in that covenant which Christ ratified by his blood, and that they will endeavour to obey his precepts, and to follow his example. These are ceremonies easy to be performed, and as easy to be understood, if we will content ourselves with the account which the writers of the New Testament have given of them.

From all that hath been said it appears that the end and design of religion was not to afflict and oppress us, but to make us happy. God can take no pleasure in the miseries and sorrows of men: he created us to do us good, not to do us harm. He gave us freedom of action, without which we could neither practise nor understand virtue; but the consequence of freedom is, that we are changeable, and capable of transgressing. Therefore he hath also given us laws, instructions, motives, encouragements, and assistances. It must be confessed, that no man, except our Saviour, ever performed the whole of his duty so perfectly, that he could claim rewards from God on that account. But God requireth not of his servants this sublime holiness; he requires of them that they should preserve themselves from obstinate impenitence and from vicious habits, and when they have transgressed, that they should repent and amend. Great reason have they therefore to return him continual thanks, and to acknowledge his infinite mercy,

If God, without any apparent cause for it, had required of men costly gifts and sacrifices, which might have reduced them to poverty; and the observation of difficult and unimproving ceremonies, these indeed would have been hard laws: but the Christian religion imposeth nothing like this upon us. If the Gentiles believed that such things were required from them, they fell into such errors through their own fault, through the mean conceptions which they entertained concerning the Deity. If the Jews were in some measure burdened with laws of this nature, the reason was, because they had corrupted themselves, and fallen into many of the errors of the Gentiles, so that God, as a lawgiver, was obliged, if we may use that expression, to give them precepts suitable, not so much to his own nature, and to the dictates of reason, as to their carnal minds and stubborn temper. And yet he, by his prophets, instructed them in the superior excellence of morality, and invited them to repentance, with favourable promises of pardon and acceptance, and unfolded to them the spiritual part of religion at intervals and by degrees, as they were capable of receiving it. So that in this also they had great reason to praise and celebrate his long-suffering and goodness.

Thus much may suffice concerning our duty to God, as far as it may be distinguished from our duty to our neighbour and to ourselves.

SERMON CII.

The same Text continued;—or, secondly on our Duty to our Neighbour.

TITUS, ii. 11, 12.

The grace of God that bringeth salvation hath appeared to all men, teaching us, that, denying ungodliness and worldly lusts, we should live soberly, righteously, and godly, in this present world.

We are here exhorted by the apostle to live soberly, righteously, and godly.

Sobriety comprehends our duty to ourselves, righteousness our duty to our neighbour, and godliness our duty to God.

I proceed now to consider that part of our duty which relates to our neighbour, and which is here called, living righteously or justly. Righteousness frequently means all religion in general; but as it stands in the text distinguished from godliness and sobriety, it means our duty to our neighbour, which in other places of the New Testament is called brotherly love or charity.

1. Under these names of righteousness, of love, and of charity, the gospel comprehends all those kind offices which we ought to perform towards others. This friendly behaviour is called love, because if we love a person, first, we never envy him, or hurt him knowingly and wilfully; but, secondly, wish him all happiness, and assist him as far as we are able; under which two heads is comprehended our duty to our neighbour. This our Saviour commands, when he explains and improves that precept of the law, Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself. The same thing he expresses in other words, thus: Whatsoever ye would that men should do unto you, do ye so unto them. The same precept is to be found in the book of Tobit, in a form of prohibition; Do that to no man which thou hatest. The meaning is, Whatsoever we should certainly and reasonably expect from another, if we were in his circumstances, and he in ours, that we ought to do to him; and whatsoever we should account ill usage, if we suffered it, that we ought not to do. Concerning this charity, or brotherly affection, St. Paul hath discoursed in his first epistle to the Corinthians, and hath given it the preference even to faith and to hope. A virtue so reasonable could not be unknown to the Pagans; their wise men have also recommended it, though they call it by other names, and have not extended it so far as our Saviour hath.

2. Mutual justice and equity are required from us. Justice is that virtue by which we give to every man what is his due by the law of nature, and by the laws of civil society, and abstain from all injury either in word or in deed, in omission or in commission. Thus far justice proceeds: equity goes still farther; for there are many things which our country requires not of us, and for neglecting which none can call us before the magistrate, which yet an equitable person cannot omit without condemning himself. These sort of duties depend upon a great variety of circumstances, of facts, of persons, of times, and places, which may be such, that it would be unreasonable to act according to strict right, though the laws would give us leave to do it.

3. The gospel requires that we should be charitable towards all persons, as far as we are able, and they are deserving, by shewing them favour and countenance, by using our interest in their behalf, by giving them our help, and by relieving their wants, especially when they are reduced to straits, and unable to provide for themselves.

It is not possible to fix the exact bounds and limits of such liberality, especially in countries like this, where the laws of the land have made a stated and a large provision for the poor; so that this public charity is at the same time the private charity of every person who willingly discharges his part and proportion. What is to be done beyond this, must in a great measure be left to every one's discretion. To do more than this, is certainly the duty of several persons; and the truest objects of such charity are often they who neither ask it nor receive it from the public. Our Saviour, in the gospel of St. Luke, commands us to give alms of such things as we have, that is, according to our present circumstances, and proportionably to our fortunes; which being a general direction, and not descending to particulars, we have no right, that I can discern, to burden the consciences of others with fixed rules about it. Only we are to exhort them to take care that they fall not short of our Saviour's intention. The ancient Christians remarkably fulfilled these precepts, which was no small credit to them and their religion, and greatly conduced to recommend the gospel to the world, and to further its progress.

4. The gospel requires of us, in a singular manner, humanity and meekness. Humanity teacheth us to temper all our words and actions towards our neighbour with civility and goodness, and to abstain carefully from all severe and harsh expressions, all cross and rude behaviour. Meekness restrains our anger, and keeps it in due bounds, so that we neither fly out into an unseemly passion at the faults of others, nor into railing and reviling, nor harbour malice and revenge in our hearts. We are all of us offended at insolence, contempt, anger, and ill usage; we are pleased when we meet with a contrary behaviour; and consequently this dislike and this approbation should be a rule to us in our conduct towards others. Therefore Christ condemns anger and its effects, and shews that he gives a more excellent precept than is contained in the Mosaic law; for, having observed that the law forbade murder, Thou shalt not kill; he adds, but I say unto you, that whosoever is angry with his brother without a cause, shall be in danger of the judgement. This is to be understood of unjust and immoderate anger, which is joined with a desire of revenge, or with a proud and ill-grounded scorn of our neighbour: for we may be angry, when the cause is just, when we keep our anger within due bounds, when it hath no other aim than self-preservation, when it is accompanied with a design of reforming the offender, and not of doing him an injury, and when it excludes not a readiness to forgive him, and to be reconciled to him upon his amendment. Be ye angry, and sin not, says St. Paul; and let not the sun go down upon your wrath;—but let all bitterness, and clamour, and evil-speaking, be put away from you, with all malice. Christ himself was filled with anger and indignation against some of the Jews; but at the same time he was ready to be reconciled to them, and to receive them favourably, if they would have returned to their duty, and his last words were a prayer to God to forgive them.

By meekness and humanity contentions and quarrels are avoided, with all their pernicious consequences, and the friendship, good will, and esteem of the world is usually secured. But care is to be taken, that, instead of these virtues, we fall not into those vices which have a resemblance of them, and lie concealed under that fair and false appearance: such is a feigned civility and complaisance, which often covers a base and perfidious heart; flattery, which is as ready to commend or excuse vice, as to praise what is praise-worthy; and a mean compliance which approves, or seems to approve, the worst of actions. These are as hurtful as meekness and humanity are useful to society.

These virtues St. Paul hath in view, when in his epistle to the Romans he exhorts Christians, in honour to prefer one another, to shew respect and civility to others, without waiting to see whether they will shew as much to us. And St. Peter's direction is, Honour all men. If therefore rudeness and inhumanity, and harshness of behaviour, be found in Christians, and in Christians who pretend to great holiness and zeal and piety, this is not to be laid to the charge of Christianity, or of those who first preached it; but it is the fault of those who understand not, or are not willing to understand, the plain precepts of the gospel.

5. To these virtues is fitly joined the love of peace and concord, both in things relating to this world, and in things relating to religion, whether they be matters of belief, or rites and ceremonies and discipline. But as all virtues have a natural union, and can never disagree, without ceasing to be what they are, the love of peace must always be joined with the love of truth and righteousness; and concord is to be so pursued, that we injure not the duty which we owe to God and to ourselves. The regard due to peace requires of every person, that he seek not only his own particular profit and convenience, but the advantage of others, and the common good of society; and by such methods public peace is settled and preserved.

But because every person hath his own private possessions, without which he cannot support himself and his family, it is impossible for us to live in concord with those who endeavour to wrong and defraud us; we must at least avoide them as a person, as an enemy with whom they are to can hold no intercourse: and likewise if any one by threats and violence would force us to act contrary to truth and virtue, even the sincerest lover of peace must renounce all society with such a tyrant, lest he should give up those things which in their own nature are most excellent and most useful to mankind, and which God hath expressly commanded us never to forsake. If it be possible, says the apostle, as far as in you lieth, live peaceable with all men: as far as reason and religion permit, be at peace with others, and let not matters of small consequence, or those faults and defects from which none is entirely free, interrupt and destroy that union.

Christians are members of two societies; as they are men, they belong to the country in which they are born or settled; and as they are Christians, they belong to the church of Christ. But as this church universal, or catholic church, is dispersed over the earth, and cannot assemble together, it was even from ancient times divided into particular and national churches. Every Christian then should be desirous and willing to join himself to his own national church, if he can do it with a safe conscience; and in this affair, he should not give way to small and endless scruples, nor expect that every thing should be conducted exactly as he could wish: for perfection dwelleth not here below, and wise men must either bear with some things which they do not approve and cannot mend, or they must form a religion for themselves and serve God all alone, which is by no means agreeable with mutual edification and with the social nature of Christianity.

But when things are come to such a pass in any nation, that Christians are required to reject and abjure evident truths, to approve monstrous absurdities and flagrant contradictions, to sacrifice reason and common sense to a thing most improperly called faith, and to pay a blind and slavish obedience to the doctrines, and to the false doctrines of men, as a church cannot be accounted a religious society, nor is it lawful to the communion with her. For these and it still weighty reasons, our ancestors know not th

The apostles, at first, did not separate themselves from the Jews, though they differed greatly from them, as long as they were permitted in the synagogues to profess their belief in Christ, to preach his doctrine, and to reject every thing contrary to it; but when this liberty was no longer granted to them, they held their own assemblies apart, and forsook the synagogue. After this, some dissension arose in the Christian congregations which were formed of converted Jews and Gentiles; for the Jews stuck obstinately to their old rites and ceremonies, and the Gentiles refused to observe them. But because in other respects the gospel was obeyed by both, and neither were compelled to do any thing that they held to be unlawful, this difference of opinion was to be mutually tolerated, as St. Paul declares. As for himself, to the weak he became weak, that he might gain the weak: he was made all things to all men, that he might by all means save some. The meaning is, that he thought it a part of Christian prudence to comply with his brethren in matters indifferent, and to gratify them in all things consistent with Christianity.

6. For the same causes Christ commands us to pass over injuries, whether they affect our goods, our reputation, or our body, if they are such as may be borne without great detriment, and permits us not on such occasions to avenge ourselves, or to have recourse to the laws and to the civil magistrate for redress. The law of Moses laid no great restraint upon the Jews in this respect; and somewhat more of forbearance is required from us than was from them. Ye have heard, says our Lord, that it hath been said, An eye for an eye,—but I say unto you, Resist not evil. The best commentators have shewed that these and the like precepts, if rightly understood, are in themselves very fit and very profitable to society: for whilst we connive at a small offence or injury, we put a stop to much hatred and strife and various disorders, which there would be no end, if we would put up with any affront or meekness, it often comes to pass that hath done the wrong is softened and reclaimed by Christian lenity. But in greater injuries, nothing hinders a man from seeking the assistance of the laws and of the magistrate, or if that cannot be done, from acting in his own defence; for indeed without such a permission no civil society could subsist, and all good men would in a manner be bound hand and foot, and delivered up to the vilest of mankind.

There have been some few of exalted minds amongst the gentiles who disapproved and condemned revenge. But our Saviour hath carried the duty farther, and hath told us, that we must love our enemies, and return good for evil, and pray for those who use us spitefully, and imitate our heavenly Father, who is kind even to the unthankful and to the wicked.

Many of the Jews and gentiles accounted revenge to be lawful, and derided Christian patience as a practice absurd and contrary to human nature. Yet what the gospel requires of this kind, if we mistake it not, is very commendable. If we had been commanded to show particular friendship to wicked men who revile and injure us, to account them worthy and honest persons, to furnish them with power and opportunity to hurt us, and not to be upon our guard against them, these indeed would have been hard sayings. But it is not so; we are commanded to love them so far as to pity their faults and follies, and to shew them such lenity, forbearance, and kindness, such humanity and civility as can be of no detriment to us, to pray to God for their repentance, and if they prove by their behaviour that they repent and are amended, to receive them into favour. •

None can say that these precepts are impracticable. On the contrary, they are so reasonable, that without mutual indulgences of this kind human society can hardly subsist, and frail and fallible creatures cannot live together in tolerable peace and order, unless patience and forgiveness be in some degree approved and their peace. Christ requires of us thus to bear friendship, pardon wrongs and offences, and world is us good for evil, much more doth to be taken, that we should love our friends and benefactors, and requite kindnesses with the same, or, if it be possible, with greater favours. If therefore the Apostles had been silent concerning gratitude, yet it had been plain enough that the whole tenour of the New Testament required this virtue. But our Saviour commended the gratitude of the Samaritan leper, who returned to give him thanks for his cure; and St. Paul, in his Epistle to the Colossians, having exhorted them to meekness, long-suffering, forbearance, and charity, adds these words, And be ye thankful; that is, be grateful both to God and man. And in his Second Epistle to Timothy, describing those wicked men who should arise in the church, he says, that they should be lovers of their own selves, and unthankful.

8. The duties above mentioned relate to all men in general, and are to be practised by every one through the whole course of his life. There are besides these, duties particular to each person, according to his age, rank, condition, and the relation in which he stands to others. Such are the duties of husbands and wives, of parents and children, of masters and servants, of young and old.

Marriage is reduced by our Saviour to its original institution, as it was in the beginning, before the passions of men had broken through the rules which right reason prescribed, and by polygamy had brought poverty, jealousy, and discord into houses, and many troubles and mischiefs into the world; to which had been added another evil, that of frequent divorces upon frivolous causes. The gospel requires of those who enter into this state, that they pass their days together in concord and friendship, and in a joint care of their families.

The gospel requires that behaviour from parents to children and from children to parents, which all wise men must approve. It commands parents to educate their children in the fear of God, and to give them all necessary instruction and maintenance, and neither to spoil them by foolish indulgence, nor to use them harshly and imperiously, and provoke them to wrath, by which they will alienate their affection, and may drive them to take bad courses. They are to be guided by admonishment and reason, unless they be of incorrigible dispositions.

It commands children to honour and love and succour their parents, to obey them in all things, and in the Lord; that is, in all things which are agreeable to Christianity, or not contrary to it; for in that case, He that loveth father or mother more than me, says our Lord, is not worthy of me.

But this is a plea for disobedience that rarely happens: and there is more danger in Christian nations, that children should pay too little than too much respect to father and mother. One of the great evils which monkery brought into the Christian world, was the inveigling and stealing of young persons, and receiving them into religious orders, without the consent, and against the consent, of their parents. In this the monks acted like true disciples of the pharisees, who compassed sea and land to make proselytes, and who also taught children to disobey their parents: and you will find it to have been and to be the practice of all fanatics of every sort and tribe, to seduce young people from that deference which they ought to pay to those whom God and nature have appointed for their guides and guardians in their tender years.

In the time when the gospel was first preached, servants for the most part were slaves; and as many of these were converted to Christianity, with or without their masters, it was to be feared lest they should take too much upon them, and think too well of themselves, by entering into a religion which commanded all men to treat one another as brethren. This might have brought a discredit upon the gospel, and have been an hindrance of its progress. Therefore St. Peter and St. Paul earnestly exhort servants or slaves to obey their masters, and to be industrious and honest, and dutifully to serve not only the just and gentle, but the harsh and froward.

The law of nature knows no such thing as slavery; for by nature all men are free and equal: but by the civil laws and by the practice of nations it was established, and it still continues amongst those who know not the gospel, and, the more is the shame and the pity, it is to be found in some places where Christianity is professed. The religion of Christ, when it first made its progress in the world, left the civil laws of nations, in a great measure, as it found them, lest by altering or repealing them it should bring confusion and disturbance into human society; but as by its own genius and tendency it leads men gently back to the precepts of nature and equity; to kindness and to mercy, it put an end by degrees, in most civilized places, to that excessive distance and difference between masters and slaves, which owed its original to outrage and war, to violence and calamity: so that in Christian countries the service which is performed is usually, as it ought to be, voluntary and by agreement.

But what the writers of the New Testament have said concerning slaves, holds true concerning hired servants, and all those who are employed in other denominations under a master, that they discharge their office modestly, diligently, and willingly, and act with faithfulness and integrity in every thing that is committed to them.

To all masters the gospel enjoins that they be good and just, forbearing haughtiness, insolence, and threatening, and remembering that they also have a master in heaven.

The same sort of directions may be applied to all who are invested with power in any office or station, and to all who are placed under their government.

Of those who are appointed to teach Christianity, it is required that they study and endeavour to preach it in its own native and amiable simplicity. Even as it is contained in the holy scriptures, and that their aim and intention be to do honour to religion, and to make men wiser and better. This also tends to create and preserve a mutual esteem between those who teach, and those who are taught, than which there can be nothing more desirable to the one and to the other; for the world passeth away with all its concerns, but the good effect of brotherly love and Christian edification is stable and permanent.

per, and that they furnish themselves by times with useful knowledge and skill, which will enable them to live contentedly and reputably. It is also required of them, that they pay respect to the aged, and be willing to serve and assist them both on account of the bodily infirmities which attend that part of life, and because it will be their own state if God gives them length of days, and because humanity suggests that we should be courteous to those who probably will not stay long with us, and because the aged have commonly more knowledge and discretion, and can instruct the young in things of importance.

From the aged it is expected, that they be endued with Christian virtues, and set a good example to others, since they have the advantage of long observation to make them sensible of the folly of vice, and the beauty and utility of goodness. Age also tempers and weakens the passions, except in those who are enslaved to wicked habits; age also usually brings prudence and judgment; and these things render the old very capable of assisting and directing the young, especially when they can make proper allowances for the warmth and the defects of youth, and can preserve themselves free from austerity and moroseness. Lastly, it becomes them to meditate on death, as on a change which is near at hand, and to be prepared to go hence with decency and resignation.

Concerning the duty of kings, the Apostles have said nothing, because at that time there were no Christian rulers. The law of nature, and the laws of their own nations, and the law of Moses and the gospel, are sufficient to teach them their office, and to shew them that the power which their country hath committed to them is a power only to do good, and to restrain evil, and to promote the public welfare.

But concerning the duty of subjects to their princes, the New Testament is not silent. The Apostles recommend, in general expressions, submission and obedience to all who are in authority. St. Paul observes upon this head, that there is no power but from God, and that the powers which be are ordained of God. The meaning is, that civil government is agreeable to the will of God, and ariseth from the nature of things; for God hath so made mankind, that neither can they subsist without society, nor society without government, nor government without rulers. It is therefore the duty of every private person to be a quiet and a peaceable subject, to do nothing which tends to introduce discord and confusion, and the ruin of the state; but to defend his country on all occasions, and with all his power.

Lastly, there is a particular duty incumbent upon every person, and arising from his particular occupation. state, office, or profession, namely, that he acquire the skill and the knowledge which shall make him fit for it, fit to act in it prudently and honestly; else whatsoever virtues and good qualities he may possess, he is inexcusable both with God and man.

Such is our duty to our neighbour, as it may be collected from reason and revelation.

On the same text; or, thirdly, on our Duty to ourselves.

Titus, ii. 11, 12.

The grace of God that bringeth salvation hath appeared to all men, teaching us, that denying ungodliness and worldly lusts, we should live soberly, righteously, and godly, in this present world.

WE are here exhorted by the Apostle to live soberly, righteously, and godly. Sobriety comprehends our duty to ourselves, righteousness our duty to our neighbour, and godliness our duty to God.

I shall conclude my observations upon the text with examining that part of our duty which, although it hath some reference both to God and to our neighbour, yet relates more immediately to ourselves. This St. Paul calls, living soberly. The word sobriety hath a more extensive signification in the original than in our language, and comprehends in it, a right exercise of our reason and of our natural powers, and a discreet government of our passions.

Amongst the helps which God hath bestowed upon us, to lead us to obedience and to happiness, may be reckoned certain useful dispositions and propensities, which are called natural inclinations, which we feel more or less as soon as we come to the use of reason, and which, if we do not corrupt and stifle them, will be confirmed and improved by daily experience, and appear both profitable and commendable. These serve as a counterbalance to those passions which incline us to evil.

First of all then, men are so formed by their Creator that they love truth and hate falsehood. No one chooseth to mistake, to err, and to be deceived; every one is willing and desirous to see things as they really are. We may safely take it for granted, that there are none so brutish, so savage, and so ignorant, as not to approve truth and blame falsehood in general. Consequently they must acknowledge that it is ugly and wicked to deceive, and that it is good and amiable to instruct.

By the same use of reason men see that it is better in general to do good than to do hurt to another, and they generally own it, unless some violent passion prevails with them, and stills the dictates of nature. When the mind grows calm and capable of exercising its powers, they discover the fitness of such a behaviour, they wish that others would act so towards them, and they endeavour to perform themselves what they thus approve in others.

Hence by steps and degrees we are able to acquire right notions of all sorts of virtues and vices. Every virtuous disposition is advantageous to ourselves and to others, and every vicious habit is hurtful to ourselves and to others. But it must be remembered that the usefulness arising from virtue is not to be considered as confined to a few actions, or to a few men, or to a short space of time: the whole race of mankind, as far as we can be connected with them, and the whole duration of our life, and our future state likewise, are to be taken into consideration. What therefore is useful upon the whole, is agreeable to virtue.

and that is to be called vicious which hath a contrary effect; and we say that men would promote the general happiness and their own at the same time, if they would observe the rule of doing good to all; and that the opposite behaviour will be pernicious to them. To observe this rule, is to live according to the dictates of unprejudiced reason, or to live according to nature, and to pursue the end for which they are called into being; and in acting thus there is a decency and a dignity, whence arise self-approbation and satisfaction of mind. Every one, if he will consult his own heart, and speak his thoughts sincerely, must own that virtue is beautiful and honourable, and worthy of love and praise; and that vice is deformed, and shameful, and detestable. Nothing can silence this opinion, which naturally rises in our minds, except some violent passion depriving us of the free use of reason.

Hence we collect and conclude, that almighty God hath implanted in human nature those inclinations which make us love virtue and truth wherever they appear and shew themselves to us, and shun vice, error, and falsehood, when we know them to be what they are. Hence likewise it follows, that the goodness and decency, or the dishonesty and deformity of actions, depend not at all upon the will and the appointment of men, and of human laws, but upon the nature itself and the relation and connection of things, which is fixed and unchangeable: for as truth and falsehood depend not upon us, so neither do virtue and vice. This unalterable nature of good and evil, of right and wrong, and these judgments concerning it, which our own senses and apprehensions lead us to make, are helps which God hath given us against the power and the temptations of sin. When a man doth ill, he inwardly condemns himself; when he doth well, he approves his own behaviour. This St. Paul hath in view, when he says concerning the gentiles, When the gentiles, who have not the law, do by nature the things contained in the law, these, having not the law, are a law to themselves, which shew the work of the law written in their hearts: their conscience also bearing witness; and their thoughts the mean while accusing or else excusing one another.

1. The first duty then which we owe to ourselves, is to cultivate and improve that natural inclination which we have to love truth and virtue: for this is the foundation of all goodness, that we be able to distinguish truth from falsehood, that we esteem it when we have found it, and that we prefer what is right and honest to every thing that is evil and base. Unless we love truth, we shall either never find it, or, if we accidentally meet with it, we shall set no due value upon it. Truth shuns those who despise it, or becomes as useless to them as if it were quite unknown. By the assistance of truth we arrive to a knowledge of virtue, and we are taught to esteem it as we ought; they are united together: without truth there can be no virtue, and without virtue, truth is of small use.

There are an innumerable variety of truths, of which those of the greatest use and importance are, the knowledge of God and of religion, and of ourselves, and of eternal life, and of the way to happiness both here and hereafter. The gospel of Christ is frequently called the truth by the sacred writers; and above all other things it most deserveth that honourable name and character, because it surpasseth all other aids and methods for the discovering of this most valuable knowledge. Christ promised to his Apostles the Spirit of truth, who should lead them into all truth, that is, all necessary truths relating to morality and religion. Christ prays to his Father that he would sanctify them in truth, and says, that his word is truth. When he stood before Pilate, he professed that for this end he came into the world, that he might bear witness to the truth; and every one, says he, that is of the truth, heareth my voice. For whosoever sincerely loves the truth, and diligently seeks it, will acknowledge and receive the gospel, when Christ himself and his Apostles teach and confirm it. We are of God, says St. John; he that knoweth God, heareth us; he that is not of God, heareth not us; hereby we know the spirit of truth and the spirit of error. Thus the first duty which we owe to ourselves is to love truth and virtue.

The Hebrew language hath no word which exactly answers to the word virtue; therefore this word is scarcely to be found in the writers of the New Testament. Instead of it, they say righteousness, holiness, the fear of God, and the like; by which expressions the same thing is meant. However, St. Paul in one place uses the word virtue, and recommends the love of virtue and of truth in very strong terms: Finally, brethren, says he, whatsoever things are true, whatsoever things are honest, whatsoever things are just, whatsoever things are pure, whatsoever things are lovely, whatsoever things are of good report: if there be any virtue, and if there be any praise, think on these things. Those things which ye have both learned, and received, and heard, and seen in me, do; and the peace of God shall be with you. From which, and the like exhortations, it is manifest that the love of truth and virtue, which the gospel recommends and requires, is not a bare occupation of the understanding, a barren speculative inquiry concerning the nature of morality, but a practical knowledge of it dwelling in our hearts, by which, when we have found out truth, and know what is virtue, we suit our life and behaviour to our persuasion, openly profess the truth, and recommend it to others, and shew forth virtue in our manners and conversation, whatsoever inconveniences may press us, and whatsoever dangers may threaten us, for our adherence to them.

2. The gospel commands us to think modestly of ourselves, and to shew forth this modesty in our words and actions, which is called humility by Christian writers, and is founded upon a right knowledge of ourselves. When we are well acquainted with our own defects, and sensible how far short we fall of perfect goodness and knowledge, this usually produces in us dispositions to think and speak lowly of ourselves, and not ambitiously to seek employments for which we are not qualified, recompenses and respects to which we have no claim, and praises and honours which we have done nothing to deserve; this teacheth us to acquiesce in that station wherein the providence of God hath placed us; to be moderate, and peaceable, and honest in our endeavours to advance ourselves to a better condition; and to have the public good and the interests of Christianity more in view than our own private profit. Else if any one thinketh himself to be somewhat when he is nothing, such an one, says St. Paul, deceiveth himself. By this virtue the mind is kept free from pride, insolence, vanity, self-love, and self-conceit.

However, it is to be remembered, that humility may be carried to an excess, and that by debasing ourselves too much, and giving way too tamely to oppression and insolence, or by a sheepish indolence and an over-diffidence of our abilities, we may wrong both ourselves, and our friends, and society, to which we might have to be modest and humble, and quiet and peaceable, it is likewise our duty to be useful to mankind, and to employ whatever powers and talents God hath committed to us for the public good.

By this virtue we are disposed not to despise our inferiors, but to value the good qualities of others, and willingly to commend them; in the exercising of which duty, it is much better to think too favourably than too hardly of any person, and rather to esteem him too much than to detract from him. For although we are by no means to praise others against our own conscience, and for those accomplishments of which they are entirely and manifestly void, yet since they who in some respects are our inferiors, in other respects often equal or surpass us, we have continual occasion to exercise humility and candour, in giving to every one all the regard and all the respect that he can reasonably desire. This behaviour the Apostles require from us: Submit yourselves one to another in the fear of God. All of you be subject one to another, and be clothed with humility: for God resisteth the proud, and giveth grace to the humble. Let nothing be done through strife or vain glory, but in lowliness of mind let each esteem other better than themselves. Look not every man on his own things, that is, on his own profit and interest, but every man also on the things of others.

3. If we would perform our part in life as becomes reasonable creatures and Christians, it is necessary that we possess in some degree the virtue called prudence, by which all other virtues are regulated and conducted, by which we are restrained from acting rashly and hastily, we weigh the circumstances of things, and then we do what certainly or probably tends to the public good. This behaviour concerns our whole life, and all our words and actions, which, unless they be accompanied with discretion and foresight, may prove pernicious to ourselves and our neighbour, though our intentions were not evil. In the Proverbs of Solomon, and in the book of Ecclesiasticus, there are many useful precepts of this kind, and our Saviour hath exhorted us to join the prudence of the serpent to the simplicity of the dove. Christian prudence is often occupied in forming right judgments of religious truths, duties, actions, and opinions. It preserves us from being imposed upon by deceitful or mistaken men, in things relating to faith or practice; it directs us to adhere to the plain word of God, as it is contained in the Scriptures, in all that we are to believe and to do. By the assistance of this virtue we prove all things, and hold fast that which is good, according to the advice of St. Paul; we believe not every spirit, as St. John admonisheth, but try the spirits whether they are of God, because many false prophets are come into the world. Else we might fall into numberless errors; for every age, and every nation, usually produceth a plentiful harvest of deceivers; and he who is unsteady and unwary will never want a false guide to mislead him.

4. The writers of the New Testament frequently and strictly command us to observe the rules of temperance in our food, and in all lawful pleasures and natural inclinations: by which it is not their design to deprive us of the conveniences of life, but to make us beware lest by the abuse of things innocent and useful, we should render our souls and bodies unfit to perform their several functions; lest we should waste our fortunes, and impoverish ourselves and our dependents; and lest we should corrupt others by bad example. Therefore the gospel forbids drunkenness, debauchery, extravagance, and intemperance, and all such irregularities, and recommends chastity and sobriety: and these precepts it enjoins altogether for our own sakes, for the good of each individual, and of families, and of human society.

5. Men are so made, and such is their condition, that they who indulge themselves in laziness, will want many things necessary both for soul and body. Whatsoever state of life we be in, we cannot live reputably without labour. Therefore wise men in all times have agreed in condemning idleness, as pernicious to human nature, and a scandalous abuse of those powers and abilities which God hath conferred upon us. And there is the more reason to detest it, because sluggish people are not only destitute of the conveniences of life and of a mind capable of enjoying them, but are remarkably prone to every thing that is bad, as experience testifies. When poverty and laziness take possession of a man, lying, and cheating, and stealing, are the usual consequences, together with every kind of shameless and sordid meanness, dissingenuity, and dishonesty. Besides, the human mind is naturally restless, and occupied continually upon some object and design. It is the unavoidable consequence of being awake. Unless therefore the mind be improved by honest meditations, and employed in useful labours, it gives itself up to expensive amusements, to loose imaginations, to unlawful actions, to keeping bad company and bad hours, or to strolling from one assembly to another, or to drinking or gaming, which are very improperly called diversions and recreations, and only serve to add to the miseries and calamities of life, instead of alleviating or removing them. We have received from God a soul and a body, and we are obliged to take due care of both. The soul is to be exercised in acquiring useful knowledge, without which we shall be blinded by ignorance, and swayed by vice, and fall into many faults which might easily have been avoided. The body is to be occupied in such exercises as may strengthen it, and make it capable of performing what the understanding recommends as proper to be done; and thus we become able to accomplish what our own nature requires, what our friends and families, and society, may justly hope and expect from us. These are the dictates of reason, and these dictates are enforced and recommended to us by the sacred writers. This is a faithful saying, says St. Paul to Titus, and these things I will that thou affirm constantly, that they who have believed in God might be careful to maintain good works: these things are good and profitable unto men. And again: Let ours also learn to maintain good works for necessary uses, that they be not unfruitful. To maintain good works, is translated in the margin, to profess honest trades. Let every Christian be of some calling and occupation, that he may live creditably and usefully to himself and others. This precept belongs, in some sense, to all persons, to kings and nobles as well as to the poorest people, that they may know how to act suitably to their several conditions. Great revenues, and power, and honour are given or trusted to men, for no other purpose than to enable them to govern those who are committed to their hands, and to provide for the public welfare: and to perform the offices of such a station with tolerable credit and dignity, is a charge which requireth industry and application, and many good qualities. As to the bulk of mankind, the case is too clear to want proof. To such belongs the admonition of St. Paul, who having declared concerning himself, that he had often wrought with labour and travail night and day that he might not be chargeable to others, recommends to Christians the same behaviour: If any will not work, says he, neither should he eat. There are some who walk disorderly amongst you, working not at all, but are busy-bodies. Now them that arc such we command and exhort by our Lord Jesus Christ, that with quietness they work, eating their own bread.

6. There is a virtue extending itself to many parts of our Christian duty, which is called contentedness. It is an even disposition, by which, without repining and complaining, we bear our condition though it be inconvenient; and it is founded on a firm faith and reliance upon the providence of God; and upon his veracity in performing his promises; as likewise upon a knowledge of our many defects, by which we are sensible that if God were to deal with us in strict justice, according to our deserts, our state might be much worse than it is. Whosoever firmly believes that the course of things in general, and every particular event, is guided by the divine providence, with perfect wisdom and goodness, for the good of his creatures, especially of those who serve him, will easily persuade himself that God hath reasons for which he permits some to suffer hardships, and to be exercised with adversity. These reasons he will believe to be sufficient, though perhaps he know them not in their full extent; nor will he suffer any dishonourable thoughts and hard suspicions concerning God's goodness to harbour in his mind, since God hath graciously declared that patience under affliction shall receive an ample reward in the world to come; and that those things which seem grievous to be borne, and which human nature would willingly shun, often conduce to the health of the soul, and often preserve us from many faults to which a continuance of prosperity exposeth us. The discourses of our Saviour and of his Apostles abound with exhortations to contentment under a low and inconvenient state, and with great encouragement and favourable promises to those who trust in God, and are satisfied with the portion which he allots to them. And indeed this virtue is of singular use to all who would learn to pass quietly and safely through this world to a better. He whose desires are moderate, meets with few temptations and few disappointments; but he whose heart is set upon wealth, though he possess much, is ever desiring something more, and therefore never at heart's ease; and if he meet with losses, becomes most miserable, though he still possesses what a person contented with a little would think more than sufficient, and is ready to take unjustifiable methods with a view to retrieve his fortunes. Of such singular advantage is it to desire no more than uncorrupted nature requires, and so greatly doth it conduce even to our present happiness. Therefore the gospel condemns not only covetousness, which, as St. Paul says, is idolatry, but a greedy desire of external advantages, of high stations, of power and worldly prosperity.

A contempt of riches is so often inculcated in the New Testament, that it seems needless to bring proofs of it. Scarcely is there any thing which is more earnestly coveted than wealth, and yet there is not any thing innocent in itself whence greater evils arise; and this is the reason why Christ requires of us not to set our hearts upon it: he required it out of more kindness and compassion towards men, who know not what is expedient for them. For whether we have received our riches from our ancestors, or acquired them ourselves, so it happens, that through our own folly they often do us much more harm than good. They are often attended either with covetousness, or with luxury, and a vehement love of pleasure. When they are joined to covetousness, the fear of losses with which such persons are tormented is worse than poverty itself, they labour under apprehensions of evils which may never come, or which human prudence cannot prevent; they are sordid and uncharitable, and therefore disliked and despised, and they can hardly refrain from any thing mean and vile, when there is a prospect of gain. When riches are joined to luxury, such persons indeed are not slaves to their wealth, but which is rather worse, they are slaves to their passions and appetites, to a thousand follies and vices.

Not that we are to give away all our possessions, and reduce ourselves to a state of poverty, a state which hath its temptations no less than a state of superfluous abundance; only we are to remember that these things are entrusted to us, and that we must make a sober and discreet use of them, that use which God, and nature, and society, require.

7. To contentedness should be added modesty, a virtue by which we are taught never to say or do any thing which becomes not our Christian character, but to avoid all that is rude and indecent. To this virtue relate these exhortations of St. Paul: Let no corrupt communication proceed out of your mouth, but that which is good, to the use of edifying, that it may minister grace to the hearers. Fornication and all uncleanness—let it not once be named amongst you, as becometh saints; neither filthiness, nor foolish talking, nor jesting, which are not convenient.

If these things are not even to be named, much less are they to be practised by Christians: and the Apostle is the more earnest in recommending this modesty in words and actions to the first believers, because the gentiles were notorious offenders in this point.

To this modesty is to be joined moderation in our apparel, and consequently in our furniture, and in all our expences. Of this St. Peter and St. Paul make some mention, and observe at the same time that the endowments of the mind are the best and fairest ornament. No precise bounds can be fixed to duties of this kind, and a reasonable latitude must be left for compliance with custom. The best general rule is to follow the example of those of our own rank and condition who are accounted wise and prudent, and free from vanity and extravagance: and these restrictions cannot be called rigid and severe, since they only forbid a profusion which is attended with numberless evils.

Lastly: In the exercise of all the fore-mentioned virtues is contained and consists the duty which is called self-denial, and which our Saviour requires from his disciples. To deny ourselves is, first, to cast off all vicious inclinations and unlawful desires; secondly, to reject and avoid every thing that we find by experience to be a temptation and an incitement to sin; and thirdly, to be willing to part with any object, if ever we should be placed in such circumstances, that either that object or our religion must be quitted.

Such is our duty to ourselves, to which we shall endeavour to conform; if we love ourselves with a rational affection, and set a just value on our better part, on our immortal soul.

An early Piety a necessary Duty.

ECCLES. XI. 9.

Rejoice, O young man, in thy youth, and let thy heart cheer thee in the days of thy youth, and walk in the ways of thy heart, and in the sight of thine eyes; but know that for all these things God will bring thee into judgment.

IN this book of Ecclesiastes, Solomon calls himself the preacher, thinking it no disparagement to his royal dignity to descend from government to instruct his people. God had blessed him with the greatest wisdom, and the circumstance of his reign afforded him sufficient experience in the world; so that having observed and tried the several courses of human life, in this book he sums up all his observations, for the honour of God, and the benefit of succeeding ages. Here he has shewn us the true bounds of wisdom and folly, what is either profitable or hurtful to the sons of men; the powerful inclinations which we have to vice, and the more powerful motives to allure us to virtue. Here the ways of God are faithfully related, the nature of man is perfectly described, and the necessary connection between folly and repentance, sin and judgment, is exactly shewn. Here he recounts all the follies of his youth, and the excursions of his riper years; his fond pursuits after pleasure and mirth, women and wine, and all things which vain and inconsiderate men are apt to set their hearts upon: and he sums up all in this short sentence, vanity of vanity, all is vanity. Though the words of my text are principally directed to the young, yet they comprehend the whole compass of our lives, and may serve for instruction to every age; they shew us how naturally youth begins in folly and sin, which necessarily leads us to repentance in our riper years, and if continued in, brings us to judgment at our latter end. In the following discourse, I shall consider, antly expressed than in the former parts of the text, wherein Solomon artificially exposes the humour of that age, by shewing how it indulges its own fancy, and affects nothing more than a boundless, uninterrupted flow of pleasures. He knew the natural heat and giddiness of youth; how want of experience renders them incapable of advice, and impatient of contradiction or restraint; and who even take a pride in rejecting all prudence and consideration. All this the preacher knew, and therefore did not attempt to stop the young man in his course, by crossing the current of his pleasures; but he allows him the full scope and swing of his lusts, and lets him follow his own inclinations, to see what will be the end. Rejoice, O young man, in thy youth, and let thy heart cheer thee in the days of thy youth, and walk in the ways of thy heart, and the sight of thine eyes. And though this at first sight seems very pleasing, yet if we view it nearer, we shall find the passage so full of danger, as rather to discourage a wise man's attempt, than invite his curiosity.

As, first; Rejoice, O young man. And what is joy, but folly and want of consideration? It is to give ourselves up to a heedless intemperate life, to discard our reason, lest it should reprove our vanity; is acquiring such a habit of mind as not only endangers our souls, but is unsuitable to our nature. The providence of God has dispensed to every man a mixture of good and evil in this world, and every wise man will be contented with that allay. But if we separate the bitter from the sweet, what shall we do when we come to the bottom of the portion, where the dregs will be all bitterness, and that God besides puts trembling into our cup? A wise heathen observed, that true joy is a serious thing; and a wiser than he said of laughter, that it is madness; and of mirth, what does it? It only deludes us with false appearances of happiness, brings us into a pleasant vale, where is a snake lurking in the grass, which at last proves to be the valley of the shadow of death. Thus our pleasure leads us into a fool's paradise, and there leaves us to lament our loss of it. It seduces us from the paths of virtue and honour, into a smooth way, and then draws a mist before our eyes, that we may not see the precipice to which it leads. It gives a loose to our passions, and banishes that wisdom which is our best guard and defence. Rejoice, O young man; but know, that whilst thou investest the tempter into thy bosom, instead of filling thy heart with joy, thou emptyest it of all thy virtue. Again,

Rejoice, O young man, in thy youth: but what is there in youth to occasion such rejoicing? Youth is a time of weakness and inexperience, and is generally so ill managed as to prove a reproach to our age: and is this matter of joy? Is this a proper season to rejoice, when we are sowing the seeds of a long repentance? Is this a time to trust our virtue without a guard, when our reason is weak, and our passions strong? From whence proceeds this confidence, or what can we find in our youth to create in us this assurance? Is want of understanding a happiness, or want of experience a commendation? How powerful a thing is ignorance in so perverse a thing as man? But as youth is a time of strength and vigour, for then our spirits are active and our humour gay; therefore the young man regards pleasure as his portion, and so resolves to go on, rejoicing in his lot.

And let thy heart cheer thee in the days of thy youth. That is, improve all opportunities of joy and take thy pleasure, for nature is now in its prime, and therefore enjoy the blessings of life while it is fresh and fragrant. It is true, that youth, like the spring, is a time of hopes; and yet it is only the hopes of a joyful harvest; for then is the proper time for joy; but why should we flatter ourselves with the hopes of a glorious harvest, which perhaps we may never reap? Again, youth is a time of strength and vigour. But, alas! how short, how uncertain is that time and strength! How liable is youth to be supplanted by a disease, or untimely death! All this the young man, ignorant as he is, cannot but know. But though his understanding informs him better, yet as prudence and forecast are the things he hates, he will persist to walk in the ways of his heart, whatever happens, and will not depart from the sight of his eyes, for all the good morals in the world; and therefore resolves to allow himself the full scope of his inclinations, and to run desperately on, wheresoever his fancy will lead, or his passions drive him. But is a young man so wise as to be trusted without a guide, when age itself, with all his experience, stands in need of good advice? It is a dangerous thing for the wisest man to lean unto his own understanding; with what confidence then can the young man presume to walk in the ways of his heart, and the sight of his eyes, when his eyes, and his heart are so blind and deceitful? And yet tell him of his danger, and he will despise the information, disdain all advice, and pursue his own course, though the ways of his heart, and the folly of his eyes, lead him directly to the chambers of death.

These are the follies and dangers of youth. But if the rashness and ignorance of that age be no excuse for such a weak course of life, how much more inexcusable are they, who continue the same practice in their riper years, and carry their youthful vices with them to the grave? When experience and years have improved our reason and understanding, and given us a judgment of discretion, what a shame is it that we should deliver ourselves up to the government of our passions and lusts, and, forgetting the gravity of our age, be captivated like children with every trifling pleasure? How can we hear the voice of God, upbraiding our folly and denouncing judgment against us, and not be afraid? Rejoice, O young man, in thy youth, and let thy heart cheer thee in the days of thy youth, and walk in the ways of thy heart and in the sight of thine eyes. But know that for all these things God will bring thee to judgment. Which leads me to consider the restraint that religion puts upon us, and the great reason we have to comply with the apprehensions of a future judgment.

The consideration of a future judgment is enough to confound our lusts, baffle all our enjoyments, and allay the extravagant follies and heats of youth; for what comfort will he receive from all the rejoicings of his youth; or what profit will it be to him to have walked in the way of his heart, and the sight of his eyes; when that indecent liberty he so unseasonably used, will tend only to make his death, and the sense of his never-dying pains, the more intolerable? How dismal will be the remembrance of his sins, when he shall consider that they brought him into this place of torment, and lost him those pleasures, which eye hath not seen, nor the heart of man conceived? When the irreversible decree is once passed upon him, what would he not give to reverse the sentence? What lusts of the flesh, what pleasures of the body, what sin of the soul, would he not give up to redeem himself? Such reflections as these will aggravate our punishment, and increase the torments of hell. This is a worm in our conscience that never dies, that never goes out. A wounded spirit is the most exquisite pain; the wrath of God in judgment is what no mortal can bear: it is such a burden as the young man with all his spirit cannot remove, nor can the old hardy sinner be proof against it. For though we have hardened our hearts like the nether mill-stone, yet God can soften them again, and by putting fears and terrors into our souls, prepare them for the impressions of his wrath. Consider these things, and then rejoice, O young man, if thou dar'st, and let thy heart cheer thee, if it can; for to what purpose shouldst thou trust to the sight of thine eyes, or follow the ways of thine heart, when thou knowest that God will shortly bring thee to judgment; and then this heart of thine, which now flatters and betrays thee, will accuse, condemn, and torment thee?

Since then we have just reasons from our sins, to apprehend the dreadfulfulness of this judgment, what remains, but that we in time provide for our security, and immediately begin a wiser course of life? Surely, we will no longer trifle with God's judgments, but offer up to him our darling vices; now while we have some pleasure in them: so lively, so early a sacrifice will be accepted. But to do this when the decays of age shall come, and our pleasure abandon us, is a forced virtue, and deserves no thanks. Let us then, before it be too late, check the intemperance of our lusts, abate our immoderate desire of any pleasure, and possess our souls with more serious reflections. Let us consider that we are the offspring of heaven, of a divine extraction, and sent by God into this world to govern and subdue our sinful appetites. Let us correct the extravagance of our ways, and make God's law our only rule. Let us so rejoice in our youth, that in our riper years, and when old age comes, we may long for that time when God shall bring us into judgment, and then receive our doom with comfort. And that we may the more effectually proceed herein, it may be proper to consider this kind memento of Solomon: Remember now thy Creator in the days of thy youth, while the evil days come not, nor the years draw nigh, when thou shalt say, I have no pleasure in them. And a plain interpretation of these words will lead us to a practical application of what has been said. And,

First, The remembrance of our Creator obliges us to pay him that love and obedience, which is the natural tribute of his mercy. Whatsoever we enjoy is the bountiful gift of his goodness, the product of his creation, and therefore it should remind us of our great Benefactor. The world is a register or catalogue of his noble acts; in the volume of this book we may read in beautiful characters the name of God; and that infinite is his mercy, and wonderful his works. With what admirable order and convenience has he created this world, making it fit for our entertainment, and every creature therein, to serve for our nourishment, ornament, or defence! so that if we do not forget ourselves, we must needs remember our Creator, and acknowledge his just title to our obedience. And who so deserving to command, as he that created man? Who so proper to give us laws, as he who knows the secrets of our hearts? And therefore, with a ready compliance to his commands, and a resigned submission to his will, we should remember our Creator, and confess, that as it is our happiness to be created, so it is our honour to be commanded by him.

Secondly, We should remember our Creator with fear and reverence. There is so much majesty in the name of Creator, as should strike an awful dread into our hearts, and create a reverence within us; we should fall down and kneel before him when we remember the Lord our maker. No submission can be too low; if we humble ourselves to the dust, it is but from whence he raised us up; and if he has exalted us to a higher station, we should therefore pay him the honours. But unto his name. And if God has given us beauty and strength, the vigour of youth, and opportunities of pleasure, let us not in the enjoyment of these good things forget that God who created both them and us; lest we should provoke his wrath, whose power is mighty to destroy, as well as to create.

Thirdly, When we remember our Creator we should also pay him a religious and holy worship, which is the natural result of his power and mercy, the genuine composition of our love and fear; and what can we his creatures do less, than fall down and worship him for our creation, preservation, and all the blessings of this life? This is what we properly call the service of God, and which all nations in the world have acknowledged to be his due; even a very heathen has observed, "That no nation was ever so barbarous, as to live without religion; or so foolish, as to hope for the goods of the earth, without paying their devotion to the gods in heaven." Thus, we see that an obedient, devout, religious life, is what Solomon advises us to, in these words, Remember thy Creator. But though this is a matter of very weighty importance, and of the utmost concern to us, yet our giddy minds are apt to adjourn the consideration of it till old age, or that some kind affliction has brought us to a better way of thinking. I shall therefore consider the time when this duty is to be performed.

And the wise man's direction is, remember now thy Creator, this very instant, delay not so necessary a duty, since we can call no day our own but the present; and if we do not remember our Creator now, it may be feared we never shall. The time past is already dead, the time to come is yet unborn, but the present is our life, and the living they shall praise God. If a religious life be ever a duty, it is so now, this very moment; and therefore, without the greatest presumption, we cannot defer it till to-morrow. The very first grounds and principles of religion, teach us to worship and serve God all the days of our lives. And God knows the service of every day requires our most serious endeavour, and all that the morrow can do, is to take care of the things of itself. Therefore, remember ^{therefor} Creator now, and trifle not away the full scope.

present time, but make every day a pattern of thy whole life; perform thy duty, and make up thy accounts every night, so wilt thou be always ready to appear before God.

But some will say, that perhaps now is an unseasonable time; it may be the prime of our youth, and what need we be so early called to our duty? No, says the preacher, you must remember thy Creator now, in the days of thy youth; to defer it may be too late, therefore obey the first summons: and the more early thou attendest thy duty, the better it will be accepted, and the easier performed. Dedicate unto God the first fruits of thy life, and that will make all thy succeeding years holy and happy; offer up to him devout sacrifices in the spring of thy age, and he will bless thee with many fruitful harvests. This is the most proper time to frame and model our minds according to the will of God; for now our faculties are fresh and vigorous, our wills compliant, and our understandings free from prejudice. At these tender years we shall receive impressions with ease, and by use retain them. But if we suffer our vices to grow into habits, they will soon triumph over our virtue, and sin and death will quickly get dominion over us. It is therefore for our ease, as well as security, to apply ourselves betimes to that work, which by delay gets advantage over us every moment. Therefore let us speedily correct and reform our errors, and turn from all our evil ways, for they lead to the chambers of death.

There are others who think, that as death commonly gives warning before he strikes, by some diseases or natural decays, to admonish us of our approaching end, that it will be then time enough to redeem our souls, when the days are evil; directly contrary this to the advice of Solomon, who bids us remember our Creator, before those evil days come. For what commendation is it, to grow virtuous by force, to be frightened into our duty, and never leave our sins till they have forsaken us? What merit is there in a rebel's laying down his arms, when he can hold them no longer? Therefore let us remember our Creator before we are driven to the last extremity, lest our forgetfulness of God should force him to strike us with a sudden destruction, and not give us time to pray that we may die the death of the righteous.

Lastly, The sensual man has yet one more pretence; that as there is a time for all things, therefore old age is the most proper season for such a melancholy mortifying work. Indeed, had we nothing else to do than only to repent, a sick or death-bed might serve our turn; but it is not repentance only, but amendment that is required; not only a death unto sin, but a life unto righteousness; and to this duty we must come with vigour, and cheerfully undertake the work.

We must remember our Creator before those years draw nigh, when a man shall say, I have no pleasure in them. We must not make our devotion an act of necessity, but of choice. God expects a free-will offering, the prime of our flocks, the richest of our treasures. But if we consume these upon our lusts, and assign him the refuse of our years, we may expect him to send us for our reward, to those Gods whom we have chosen in our prosperity, and let them deliver us out of our distress, if they can.

But it is a great mistake to think, that pleasure is inconsistent with religion, and that there is no difference between a sour and a sober life: nay, it is a great disparagement to God, and a discouragement to all good men, to pretend that there is no piety but in a gloomy soul, and a dejected countenance. In our repentance we mourn, and with just reason, but in the acts of obedience, why reserved and grave? In the exercises of devotion, why so heavy, O my soul, why so disquieted within me? Surely, to live always as in a state of penance, is no good symptom in any man, no great sign of religion; for it can be no commendation of his piety to be always grieving, but yet never to repent.

True religion was, no doubt, designed to improve our nature, to complete our happiness; and to shew man in his true perfection: to fill us with exalted thoughts, to entertain us with lively notions and generous desires: that we should serve the Lord with gladness, and come before his presence with a song. It is not so much the formality of the tribute as the willing mind and the cheerful giver that God respects; but what pleasure can he possibly have in those services of ours, which we ourselves have no pleasure in? If therefore we find ourselves in health and strength, plentiful in our fortunes, and vigorous in our minds, let us not prostitute these noble gifts of God to profane ungodly uses; and think they were given us only to make provision for our flesh, and to fulfil our lusts; and when all is gone, that then it is time enough to return unto God. But when we enjoy our hearts desire, then let us deem it the properest season to pay him our devotion; for when we are most fit for pleasure, then are we fittest for religion; then is our heart a noble sacrifice indeed, and worthy of our Creator; a present fit to be made to the great God of heaven and earth, because with such sacrifices he is well pleased. But if it is unfortunately broken with age, and bruised with iniquity, yet even then it is the best we have to give, and a bruised broken heart, is a sacrifice that God will not despise. Therefore, whatever our circumstances are, whether we are in health, or lie under any affliction, calamity, or decay, let us take care to hasten our repentance and redeem the time, because the days are evil.

SERMON CV.

By BISHOP HICKMAN.

The great Duty of Self-knowledge.

PSALM ix. 10.

Put them in fear, O Lord, that the heathen may know themselves to be but men.

WHEN God created the heaven and the earth, and distinguished the whole creation, in their several orders and degrees, he placed man in the middle region, between himself and the inferior world, that we might obey the one and command the other. And in order to the preserving our respect towards God, and our government towards the creatures, he gave us laws to instruct and direct our conduct in that course of life, on which all our wisdom and happiness depends. But through our perverseness or simplicity, many temptations are apt to divert us from the right way; for either a vain desire of greatness, or an excessive love of riches and pleasures, make us forget our duty to God; and instead of walking in the ways of wisdom, our eyes are so blinded with ambition, covetousness, and luxury, that we degenerate into something less than man.

To prevent this fatal miscarriage, God has enforced his laws by many gracious promises, to invite us to our duty, and many dreadful threatenings, to deter us from evil. When the one proves ineffectual, he will execute the other. If we are so hardened and stupid, that nothing but judgments can awaken us, God will send his terrors among us, to make us know him; and his judgments, to know ourselves. As therefore the knowledge of ourselves is a religious duty. I shall endeavour to shew the excellency and usefulness of this knowledge.

There are indeed some who think for man to know himself, is of all knowledge the most delightful and easy. But this proceeds from our ignorance: for, alas! though we can with ease gaze round us, be very intent upon remote concerns, yet all the while we may be utterly unacquainted with ourselves. Besides, it is an unpleasant thing for a man to look into himself, to rake into the filthiness of his own heart, and discompose the quiet of his mind; hence it is that so many men take up with a superficial and false account of their own affairs, and are often most pleased with themselves, when they have the least reason for it. And however we may think that this fond conceit of our own worth is only an innocent allowable mistake; yet, upon examination, we shall find it such a dangerous error and disposition of mind as will disable us from performing our several duties; for it is giving up our reason to be guided by fantasy and humour.

He that will not take the pains to know himself, lives, as it were, by chance, and moves without design. He embraces vice or virtue as they best suit his fancy or convenience; but seldom considers the excellence of his nature, or the good pleasure of his God. Thus when a conceited man has lost himself, it is impossible he should maintain his proper station in life, or observe decency and justice towards men, but he will be apt to encroach upon their rights and liberties; and we must ascribe all that insolence, imposition, and violence in the world, to this ignorant self-love. We may as well expect meekness from a lion, as common justice from one conceited of his own worth, and full of himself. He that thinks himself something more than man, will not look upon others as his fellow-creatures, but takes a pleasure and pride in despising and treating them like despicable worms.

From whence proceed, in general, all heresies and schisms in the church, all tumults and factions in the state; but from this ignorance and carnal pride, this exalting ourselves above measure, and undervaluing every ordinance of God and man? But had we the sense to consider, or the grace to understand, what we are; we shall appear to be only a load of infirmities, a lump of flesh wherein our spirits are imprisoned and confined. For God knows what worthless senseless creatures we are; having nothing to boast of, but what we received from him; nothing but our humility to recommend us to God or man. For what is our wisdom, goodness, and greatness, to value ourselves upon? Who-soever does so, knows not what it is to be wise, great, or good. In short, it is nothing but ignorance that makes us so fond of admiring ourselves, which occasions all the decays of virtue, religion, and government in the world; and proves how necessary a duty, and great virtue it is, for men to know themselves. In order to our obtaining this knowledge, we ought to consider both our nature and end.

We must consider our own nature, the value and station we bear in the world; that so our behaviour may be decent and agreeable thereto. Hence some compare this world to a stage, where every person is to act conformably to his place and character. A prince should not degrade himself to those mean performances which are fit and proper in a peasant; nor a subject usurp the style or affect the figure of a prince. But much more absurd it is for ignorant man, born in weakness and sin, the son of corruption, and brother to the worms, to aspire unto the throne of God, assume to himself absolute power, and to think he is more than man; and no less shameful is it, that man, who is born lord of this world, heir of eternity, companion of angels, and representative of God on earth, should submit to sordid mean desires, make himself less than man, even level to the beasts that perish. It behoves us therefore to consider our nature and constitution, that we may seek after those things that are agreeable to them. If our souls are our better part, and immortal, it requires our greatest care, as being an eternal good.

We ought also to study our own inclinations, that we may know how to apply the advantage of religion, to the exigencies of our souls. For there is no man so perfectly virtuous, but he has a tendency to some vice; nor is there scarce any so profligate in vice, who has not some remains of virtue. If therefore we know ourselves, and our inclinations to good and evil, we may by degrees gain ground upon our vices. Some sparks of virtue, that lie covered, may with a little care be blown up into a glorious flame: and we ought to cherish these remains of goodness, and propagate the seeds of virtue. If we are hardened by sin, we may find some tender part capable of good impressions, and by degrees reduce the whole. Let us but learn to know ourselves, see how we stand affected towards the vanities and vices of the world, and we shall soon discover our failings, which is the first and great step towards a remedy; for then we are only to use our diligence and care, to subdue those vices which are most predominant, and to set a double guard on our weakest side. But if we give the devil an opportunity to assault us, when unprepared, he wants neither subtlety nor malice to take advantage, and pursue it to our ruin. Our principal care and design should therefore be to conquer our favourite sins and darling lusts, and then we shall find no difficulty in all the rest.

And yet how common is it, for men to neglect this, and bend their forces another way; to fortify themselves against remoter dangers, those lusts they have no inclination to; but as for their beloved sin, that has taken shelter in their bosoms, to cherish and keep it up, in defiance of correction or reproof. Hence it is, that many men in appearance live very regular and zealous lives, and comply with all the outward exercises of religion, and yet there is no alteration in their lives, where it is most wanted. This is what turns godliness into formality, and frustrates the design of religion. This want of knowing ourselves, is the only cause why so many people make outward profession of the gospel, and yet are inwardly never the better. But,

In order to know ourselves,* we must consider the end we aim at; and usually there are two sorts of ends to direct our actions, an ultimate, and an intermediate end. For every considerate man proposes to himself some principal ultimate end; some universal main design, which he pursues in all his thoughts and actions, and makes the centre of his happiness. Thus one man proposes honour for his portion, another chuses riches, a third pleasure; and but very few are there who delight in virtue and religion; for when men once fix their choice on the meaner concerns of this world, they scarce think upon any thing else. Indeed, he that proposes to lead a virtuous religious life, may desire a competency of the riches, honours, and pleasures of the world; but then he quits them all when they are inconsistent with his religion. And this last end is most desirable, because we undertake the rest for the sake of that.

And now let every man seriously ask himself this important question: What end he proposes to himself, or what his business is in the world? The ambitious man will answer, to be great and honourable. But surely to come into the world like a comet, to be admired by the vulgar, and despised by the wise, is below the dignity of a reasonable creature. Perhaps another will say, that his business here is only to take pleasure; but does not his being here depend on God's pleasure, and his well-being on the protection of the laws, and the good of the commonwealth? and if so, ought he not in gratitude, in prudence, and in conscience, to conform to the pleasure of God, and to be useful to the state, and not to make his pleasure his law, and his belly his God? Another will perhaps say, that his designs are only to grow rich; but this is a manifest absurdity and contradiction. For if he would grow rich to promote the honour or pleasure of himself, or his posterity, then honour or pleasure is his principal end, and riches are only means thereto; but if he would grow rich for the sake of riches, he is then the most indigent and despicable man alive: being poorer to all the ends of riches than he that has got nothing. Thus we see, that neither riches, pleasures, nor honours, those idols of the world, can be the principal end which a wise man proposes to himself; for a man in the highest honours may be discontented, and not without reason; a man of pleasure may be contemned, and not to be wondered at; and a man of great riches may be miserable, even to a proverb.

Since then none of these things can be the ultimate design, the proper objects of our wishes; what is it we should desire but to be happy? and as these vanities cannot be our real happiness, we must study to be wise, that we may enjoy happiness. We must leave these amusements to the world, to the heathen who do not know themselves, no more than they do that God that made them. We must find out some other end more suitable to our nature, more worthy of our pains; which can only be the service of our God, and the salvation of our souls. Here we must fix our hopes and make all our actions tend; there being no other way to reconcile our worldly cares to reason or common sense, but by making them subservient to religion. Then we may desire riches for the greater opportunity of doing good upon earth, in hopes of obtaining a greater reward in heaven. Then we may use innocent pleasures for the preservation and refreshment of life; in order to obtain a better inheritance hereafter. Then we may fairly desire honour and reputation in the world, that by an illustrious example of virtue to others, it may be the means of saving our own souls. It is this last end, that encourages and justifies all the rest. Take away the eternal weight of glory, and how frivolous, how insignificant are all these momentary pleasures? or what will it profit us to gain the whole world, and lose our own souls.

per end is, let us next inquire what progress and advances we have made towards the salvation of our souls; for with all the wisdom of men, too few are wise enough to do their duty. They see the glorious prize before them, yet will not run so as to obtain, but slothfully acquiesce in the formalities of religion, and in an unactive faith, as if that was enough to carry us to heaven. It is strange indeed, that we should know religion, and the value of our precious souls so well, and yet live as we do. Our Saviour speaks of taking heaven by violence, to shew what labours and difficulties a good Christian should undergo, to procure the salvation of his soul; but we, by our unconcerned behaviour in this point, seem to expect that heaven should commit a violence upon us. The Apostles and primitive martyrs endured the severest persecutions, imprisonments, and deaths, as examples for our imitation; and yet we can hear all this without the least remorse. The angels rejoice in heaven over every sinner that repenteth; and yet we have no joy but in our sins. Our blessed Saviour relinquished the bosom of his Father, and submitted to a most indigent life, and shameful death; and yet we, who were the cause of this, are neither ashamed nor troubled about it. Surely, he did not make himself so poor, only to make us rich, nor bestow temporal honours upon us, only to gratify our ambition; these are below the dignity of the gospel; prizes too mean for the Son of God to purchase, or the sons of men to desire. Much less did he take up his cross, that we might indulge ourselves in sensual delights. This is a contradiction to all religion. But he did it that we might learn to follow the captain of our salvation, by a laborious virtue, in order by our victory to obtain a crown of glory.

Since then ambition, covetousness, and lust, are those corrupted principles from whence all vicious practices grow and increase upon us, and this chiefly for the want of knowing ourselves; I will now more particularly consider, how it is that these bad principles hinder this knowledge in us.

The first vice which dazzles our eyes, and hinders us from knowing ourselves, is ambition; a vice to which mankind has too natural an inclination; and with this bait the devil tempted the first man. When our desires take their rise from proper grounds, and are directed to proper ends, there is a virtue in ambition. We may study to be alike God in wisdom, if we can; and in goodness if we please. But when we aim to be like him in power, and to be above restraint, then there is vanity in the inclination, and danger in the attempt, which makes ambition a vice. Thus the angels fell; who by endeavouring to exalt themselves, were miserably degraded, and degenerated into accursed spirits. And yet neither the angels nor our fore-fathers' fall, can terrify us from the like presumption; but we will be still bordering upon their guilt, and flattering ourselves that we are something more than men. We first learn to despise our fellow-creatures; and from thence ambition soars aloft, and teaches us to defy our God; to value ourselves upon rejecting his commands, and to think we are very great, for daring to be very wicked. This sin of ambition is the first inlet to vice. For the sake of this idol, this mere phantom, men are contented to sacrifice their own peace, and the quietness of the world, to build trophies on the ruins of other men, only to stand a little higher in the eye and admiration of the people.

When ambition leads a man on, every virtue must submit to him; both justice and mercy must give way to his violence. If he can but get the superiority, and appear like God, he cares not what destruction he brings on man, or how he disturbs the course of nature. From hence tumults and factions, slaughters and desolations take their rise: for when a pampered ambition prevails, hatred and malice, rancour and revenge, like a destroying army, attend its motions, and execute its designs. And can any man pretend to know himself, who ventures on such an enterprize? For, alas! how easily are we crushed in the height of all our pride; God need not with his thunder to cast us down; since one blast of his air, one breath of his displeasure will undo us. If he only withholds our breath we die, and all our enterprizes fall to the ground. Is this our glory, this our pride? how contemptible is designing man, who mistakes his honour, and does not know himself? does not know that there is neither device nor wisdom in the grave, whither he is going. Let us not then rejoice in flattering ourselves that we are like gods upon earth; but that our names are written in the book of heaven. Let us not boast that we have made many men subject to our power; but that we have overcome the perverseness of our wills, subdued our unruly passions, and are grown so wise, as to know, and so great as to command ourselves.

The second corrupted principle; which debauches our nature, and hinders us from knowing ourselves, is covetousness, or an immoderate love of wealth. In ambition there is something of generosity, but covetousness is perfectly vile and sordid. Ambition is an overflowing of the spirit, but covetousness sinks us below the flesh. It is burying ourselves alive, and anticipating the curse which God denounced upon us, dust thou art, and to dust thou shalt return. It is making us less than the worms, the lowest of all the creatures; they only grovel in the dust to satisfy their nature, and provide themselves with food; but covetous man rakes without measure, and scrapes without design, and never thinks he has got dust enough, till he returns to it himself; his appetite is never satisfied till his mouth is stopt. It is this that occasions all that fraud, extortion, oppression, and falsehood, that is practised among us. Covetousness is the root of all evil.

How wonderful is it then, that man should not know what it is to be a man, nor how to answer the ends of his nature; which most certainly are to improve in wisdom, and to grow in grace, till our spirits are so refined as to be fit to appear before God. But can this end be promoted by our growing rich? all our labour of this kind tends the direct contrary way; it is stifling our spirits under ground in the mines, when our thoughts should be soaring up on high. Therefore, says the wise man, get wisdom, and with all thy getting, get understanding; for wisdom is much better than gold, and understanding rather to be chosen than silver. So many absurdities and contradictions are involved in this one single vice, that, did not we see it practised, we should scarce believe that a man should labour for he knows not what, and save it for he knows not whom. If we view his income, he would seem the most selfish man in nature; but if we consider his expence, he is certainly the most self-denying man alive.

But there is another powerful principle of vice within us, which hinders us from knowing ourselves, and from pursuing our proper end; and that is lust, or an immoderate desire of pleasure. There is nothing so easily imposed upon as a man of pleasure; for he judges of things only by his sense, which is the most deceitful judge in nature. How shameful is it for a man to set aside his reason and virtue, his understanding and religion, and devote himself to a slothful sensual life? To be so unacquainted with himself, and forgetful of his soul, as to employ all his time to entertain his body? But we are too apt to get into a habit of sensuality before we are aware, and to like it we know not why.

However, I would not be thought to undertake so needless and unnecessary a work, as to persuade men from pleasure in general, since God not only allows, but allots it for our use; nor would I absolutely condemn even the pleasures of sense, or set nature and religion at variance. My only intention is, to shew, that what we call pleasure, is not really so, but only a childish fluttering state of life, too light and airy to build any solid satisfaction upon. We think it agreeable to our nature, but this is a mistake; for it first debauches that before we can approve it: and then what we call our nature, is nothing but our corruption; so that we are first corrupted, and then destroyed. And therefore, since our pleasures are not to be extinguished in us, it is absolutely necessary that they should be regulated and reformed; so that our pleasure may be agreeable not only to our sense, but to the principles of our reason and religion, and consistent with our happiness.

Thus we have considered the three vicious corrupted principles within us, which make us forsake the law of our nature, and the commandments of God, and keep us from knowing ourselves; namely, ambition, covetousness, and lust. With one or other of these vices every man in some measure is possessed; and it is our duty to find out which of them it is, that by knowing our darling sin, where our death and danger lies, we may correct and put a stop to the growing evil, before it becomes desperate. And we cannot but observe of all those vices, that though they may divert us for a time, and give some present deceitful satisfaction, yet they can never settle us in a state of ease and happiness. An ambitious man is above, and a luxurious man beside himself. He who is truly virtuous and contented, is the only man that, under all the turns of fortune in this world, maintains his station, and stands his ground. He neither flies too high, through a vain ambition, nor descends too low, through covetousness or sensual lusts; but with an equal temper of mind, and a perfect indifferency to all things human, he enjoys the smiles and despises the frowns of fortune; he is undisturbed at the course of this world, is unmoved at the chances and motions of this transitory life, because he has a dearer concern, a better portion in the world to come.

Was such a man, so established in virtue and settled in his principles, but seriously to reflect on the common practices and folly of the world; would his better thoughts, his diviner contemplations, give him leave to see with what eagerness, hurry, and zeal, the men of this world strive to ruin themselves and others; how they will alike trample upon the necks of friend and foe, to promote some little paltry vile designs; how would he stand amazed at this world, and conclude that hell itself could not be a more wicked place? When he sees with what fury, malice, and revenge, they persecute those who dare oppose the interests of their ambition, covetousness, or lust; how earnestly would he pray, that God would deliver him from such a savage race? How zealously would he wish to enjoy some private retirement, where he may enjoy calmer days, and in perfect serenity of mind, taste the sweets and relish the joys of a quiet conscience and a favourable God? In this happy state, he will find riches, honours, and pleasures in abundance; such pleasures as the sensual man never heard of; such riches as the covetous man never saw; such honours as the ambitious man can never possess: perfect peace and tranquillity of mind, undoubted security and establishment of heart, are the certain portion of that man who knows himself, and fears his God.

But if our ambition, covetousness, or lusts have so far got the ascendancy of us, as that religion can make no impression upon us; then God will find such other ways to work upon us, as we shall soon repent of. If our hearts are never so hardened, yet there are two arrows of God that will be sure to reach us; calamity and death. Calamity is one effectual method which God uses to make us know ourselves. When he strips us of all our gaudy plumes, and sends us despicable and almost naked into that world where we before took so much pride, then we shall not only know, but despise and condemn ourselves for our past folly. When poverty and shame come upon us, and deprive us of that armour which our ambition and covetousness hath clothed us with; then we shall wish for the breast-plate of righteousness, and the sword of the spirit; and confess that one grain of faith is better than many talents of gold and silver; than all that pomp which our ambition can desire, than all that treasure which our covetousness could rake up, or our luxury squander away. When our haughty looks shall be brought down, our deceitful honours taken from us, we shall no more trust to the smiles of fortune, not believe the flatteries of men; but learn impartially to examine the condition of our souls, and see how unhappy that man must be who does not chuse virtue for his ornament, and God for his defence. Prosperity is deceitful; but adversity gives us a full view, and free access to our own bosoms, and shews what is there amiss; it corrects the swellings of our hearts, assuages the overflowing of our pride, and plainly proves, that there is no true genuine pleasure but in being virtuous; no solid greatness, but in being humble; that the way to be happy men is to know ourselves to be but men.

The last method of Providence to reclaim us, and make us know ourselves, is death. When this sad spectacle holds the glass, and shews our ghastly face, then to our sorrow we shall see of what we are made, and to what we must return. When this body of ours, upon which we have bestowed so much pains, at the expence of our precious souls, is now sinking into nothing, how will all our pride and pleasure die before us? We shall then be convinced that we must die like men, and soon become dust and ashes. To what purpose then should we contrive mighty projects, and lay vast designs, when death may overtake us in the height of our vanity, and stifle our ambition in the birth. Alas! what a tame inoffensive thing is man, when death has laid his hands upon him! The very apprehension of death checks our extravagance, allays our heats, subdues our unruly wills, suppresses our vicious affections, and brings our minds into temper, and our hearts into a proper frame. But then we must have these apprehensions of death in time, lest it be too late; lest it does not lead us to a new life, but carry us to a dreadful judgment, where we shall be made to know ourselves to our eternal sorrow and shame.

SERMON CVI.

On the Passions, and how to govern them.

ACTS, xxiv. 15.

We also are men of like passions with you.

THE great business of religion is to mortify our lusts by the help of grace, and subdue our passions, those infirmities of our nature, and bring them into subjection to the Holy Spirit, whose fruits are love, joy, long-suffering, gentleness, goodness, meekness, temperance; and yet after all the advances we can make in virtue, the best proficient in grace may say with the disciples of nature, we also are men of like passions with you. These words were spoken by Paul and Barnabas to the men of Lycaonia, to convince them they were not gods, and to restrain the people from offering sacrifices to them; a very modest, true, and ingenious confession.

And yet perhaps it may seem strange, that an Apostle, renewed by the Holy Ghost, and endued with all the graces of the gospel, should make such an open profession of his passions, to the great disparagement of those other gifts. For as passion is a violent assault upon our reason, a turbulent motion in our hearts, if this must still take place, in spite of all the assistances of the spirit, where is that meekness, gentleness, and temperance, which are the ornaments and essentials of a Christian life? But so it is, that the best of men are subject to passions and infirmities; this is a truth which all good men are not ashamed to confess, and none but bad men will deny.

Indeed, when we come to heaven, we shall shake off these distempers of our nature, and our souls will be purified and refined; but whilst we are in the body, they are too deeply rooted in our senses for either our religion or reason to extirpate. Moses, the meekest of men, slew an Egyptian in his anger; David, the devoutest of men, was in his devotion transported with anger; our Saviour, the most patient of men, was once overwhelmed with sorrow; and even the apostles tell the heathens, that they were men of like passions with them; by which it appears that religion was designed only to improve and not extinguish nature. It was this very point that raised a controversy between two famed sects of ancient philosophers; the one was for governing and keeping under the passions of man; and their design was good; the other required that they should be totally abolished and extirpated; but this was impracticable. They were not contented with the nature God had given them, but were for new making man after an image of their own. By this great mistake they rendered their lives uncomfortable, and their doctrine disagreeable; and by their philosophy proved, that nature may be managed, but cannot be forced. And yet were it possible for a man to force his nature, and divest himself of passion, it is a question whether this be desirable; since our souls would be very flat and insipid without them. Our reason would be too weak to support our virtue, and man would at best be a heavy unactive creature, without our passions to encourage and excite us to good works.

But to this a stoic may object, that our passions incline us to evil as well as good, which betray us into sin and danger, and therefore ought to be rooted out. Indeed, it must be owned, that all our sins proceed from some misguided passion; but God made us subject to those passions for the exercise of our religion, that by a right management of ourselves, between our vicious inclinations to chuse the evil, and our religious endeavours to pursue the good, we might try our obedience, and recommend our virtue. Did we lie under a natural necessity of doing good, what honour would our good works bring to God? And if we had no temptation to evil, what praise would the avoiding it bring to ourselves? The difficulty and danger of the enterprise is what makes it honourable; for without opposition, there can be no conquest. But it may be said that our passions make us more liable to evil than to good; and more likely to be conquered than to conquer. And yet this is no argument for our passions to be rooted out, since we find it recorded in scripture, that the best men have been subject to the greatest failings, the sense of which has made them the greater saints. No man was more exemplary in his virtue than David, and none more notorious in his vice. No man more glorious in his undertakings than St. Peter, and none more shameful in his falls. And as the excellencies of these men have done more honour to God, and service to the church, than their failings; therefore we ought not to extirpate our passions, and so destroy the good and evil together.

To this may be objected, that we deserve to be punished for the evil, but not to be rewarded for the good: and as our passions occasion both, were they discarded it would be better for us. To which I answer, that God in the judgment which he passes on men, will no doubt make allowance for their different constitutions. He knows whereof we are made, and that every man's constitution inclines him strongly to some one passion or other. And if we think that he expects the same from all persons, this would be to make him act arbitrarily by us, and not according to our ability. For instance; the scripture does not tell us that God expects the same temper of mind, the same evenness and steadiness of temper, from a sanguine man, as he does from the cold and phlegmatic; or that he requires the same fervent zeal, and ardour of devotion, from the phlegmatic, as he does from the warm and sanguine. Though both are obliged to struggle with their infirmities, yet nature will be nature still, and fall we shall sometimes. And we cannot but admire the excellency of the gospel above all other religions, for being exactly calculated to the nature and abilities of men, requiring nothing of us, as necessary to salvation, but what we are able to perform. It gives us the best encouragement to be virtuous, and yet does not condemn us for every vice; it shews the true way to subdue our passions, and then offers us a pardon for those we could not overcome.

Indeed, our Saviour's coming upon earth and dying for us, plainly intimates that there are vicious principles within us which cannot be subdued; for had we not lain under a moral impossibility of avoiding sin, we needed not so extraordinary a redemption. And after the gospel was preached on earth, how many frailties of the apostles do we find recorded? frailties of men inspired by the Holy Ghost; frailties of those very men who are proposed to us as most eminent examples of piety and religion. How many frailties has St. Peter recorded of himself in St. Mark's gospel? How many more do we read of him and his brethren in the Acts of the Apostles? How hot was the contest between him and St. Paul, who withstood him to the face? How sharp was the dispute between St. Paul and Barnabas? In my text we find them both promoting the honour of God like friends, and modestly declaring they were subject to passions like other men; which they soon after verified, being so angry with each other, that they parted. And why do these things stand upon perpetual record in God's book, by the direction of the Holy Spirit, but for our notice, and to inform us, that there is nothing perfect upon earth; that they who have the most grace, will still retain a taint of their nature; that though our virtue be ever so strongly guarded, yet some passion or other will frequently creep in.

From hence we may learn, not to cast off our trust in God, nor yet be discouraged from performing the duties of religion, though our passions shall sometimes break in upon us; for this they did on the apostles themselves. And if we could be but men of like virtues, we need not be uneasy that we are of like passions with them. We are also to take care that we not condemn other men for passions, though they are not the same to which we are subject. For we are men of like passions with them, if not the same; and ought to judge favourably of their failings, as we hope God will of ours.

Another instruction we may learn from these words, is, that it is not for the reputation of our religion, to dissemble or deny those passions we are possessed of, though we could thereby gain honour to ourselves. The apostles Paul and Barnabas, having wrought a miraculous cure upon an impotent man at Lystra, the people concluded they were gods, and were preparing sacrifices for them. Had the apostles been ambitiously inclined, they had a fair opportunity to be deified. But they not only modestly and zealously disclaimed the title of God, but proclaimed their own failings; we also are men of like passions with yourselves. Hence may those who affect to be esteemed godly men, without sin or passion, receive very proper instruction; they may here learn, that virtue and humility, modesty and piety, must always go together. Certainly there is no sin so odious as hypocrisy; no passion so dangerous, as when concealed. And yet were the dishonour, danger, and disgrace of hypocrisy only to ourselves, it would not be so criminal. But it reflects upon religion also, and makes it despicable in the sight of men, by which God is dishonoured.

We are too apt to be puffed up with pride; God has therefore instituted a holy religion, on purpose to humble us, to shew us the vileness of our nature, to convince us of the malignity of our sins, that we may give God the glory, and take shame unto ourselves.

Our passions are a demonstration that we are men. For which reason God has inseparably annexed them to our nature, and made them a necessary condition of our mortality; and there is no living in this world without them. A religion that does open violence to our nature can never gain credit in the world, or be thought to come from God, who gave us life and being. To bid a man throw off all his passions, never to be angry, or sorry, or afraid, is a command that never came from God. Indeed, he has given us some restraining precepts, as not to be angry unto sin; not to be sorrowful as men without hope; not to be afraid where no fear is. But absolutely to renounce these passions is more than God commands, because it is more than man can do; nay, more than our Saviour did. In truth, whoever pretends to be void of passion, must be either more or less than man. But for us, who are really subject to passions, to conceal them, that we may be thought like gods, is the only way to make us proud and arrogant, crafty and malicious. The sum of all is this; God has put passions into our nature for several useful ends; but as the best things in nature are liable to be abused, so are our passions. We must therefore endeavour to correct and keep them under; but to extirpate them is impossible, and to conceal them dangerous.

Having thus seen that our passions cannot be rooted out, and ought not to be disguised, we are next to consider, how they may be so managed as to be serviceable to religion. And if we would have our passions useful to us, we must take care that they be well regulated, subdued, and governed: or otherwise they will be of no service to us. And the best way to do this, will be seriously to reflect on the passions we are guilty of, and consider the many inconveniences which the excess of them exposes us to. How uneasy and vexatious they are to ourselves, how reproachful and hateful to others! how they debar us from the use of our reason, silence all the precepts of religion, run us headlong upon all kind of dangers, and so furiously assault us, as scarce to leave us the command of our senses! Surely this is enough to make us afraid and ashamed of being blindly or madly led by them. And yet they are generally raised about trifles, or mere bubbles; it is there we pursue with much eagerness and affection. And is it not surprising, to see a man restless and fretful, impatient and clamorous, for such trifling things; to be almost as zealously solicitous and as really concerned for them, as if his life was at stake? Nay, were they of much greater value, it cannot excuse us, for so vehement a pursuit, so hot a contention. Though it be the honour of God, and the interest of religion, that we are contending for, yet even here, by an imprudent management of our passions, we may prejudice a good cause. For certainly, without moderation, we neither do honour to God, nor service to religion. A zeal for truth must be expressed by such passion as is consistent with meekness, gentleness, and peace. In a word, whatever the occasion be, we must never suffer the passion to overpower our reason, but our business is, so to temper and manage it, as to keep it under. And when our passions are thus subdued, they are fit to be employed in the service of God, and may be useful to us in the exercises of religion: which brings me to consider how our passions should be employed.

The passions of men are a sort of evil spirit within us, that is too easily raised, and may do much hurt, if we do not find them some proper objects to work upon; and these are no where to be had but in religion. Here our passions may be of excellent use; either to promote our virtue, or increase our devotion. Certain it is, that when our passions are well regulated and reformed, they are great assistances and encouragements to virtue. Our reason is a cold heavy principle, that slowly moves us to our work; but passion puts an eagerness into our desires, warmth into our prosecutions, and makes business go cheerfully and vigorously on. Whenever therefore we find ourselves passionately engaged in the pursuit of our temporal affairs, in the advancing of our wealth, or promoting our pleasure; let us consider how much greater work we have to do, and turn our heat and zeal that way, and then we shall have cause to thank God for giving us these passions to assist us.

Our reason has little to do in forming our minds, and bringing us to a virtuous religious life; but it is our passions and affections, must do this; for till they begin to move, our reason is like a chariot without wheels, that can never perform the journey. Our reason has not much to learn, and is easily taught; only our passions are obstinate, our affections perverse, and our wills crooked, so that we find it harder to be persuaded than informed. But when once we have got our passions at command, all obstacles are removed, the difficulty of our work is over, and then there is no virtue that we may not with ease attain.

As our virtue, so our devotion is much indebted to our passions; for a true religious zeal towards God, is only the kind workings of a pious and warm affection. There are in religion such substantial motives to piety, as are enough to make every man devout. As a passionate man's zeal is the soonest kindled, so the same warmth of constitution that inclines him to be intemperate, may, if well managed, excite him to be devout; and therefore we have no reason to be ashamed or afraid of those passions which God has implanted in our nature; since we find by pleasing experience, that they may become the most excellent means of grace. They may, if we rightly manage them, prove encouragements to our virtue, and helps to our devotion; they may tend to promote our meekness, gentleness, goodness, and all the fruits of the spirit. What has been said of our passions in general, I will now illustrate by a few particulars. And, first,

With respect to anger. This passion bears an ill name, and is frequently a troublesome companion, by engaging us in quarrels and disputes, so that one would think we might be better without it. And yet even this passion may be made of excellent use to us, not only by securing our persons from such indignities as may be unreasonably offered us; but as a guard and sentinel to our virtue. It may caution us not to be surprised by vice, nor tempted to approve of those things which are pernicious to us. Nay sometimes our anger turns upon ourselves, and grows warm against our bosom sin; so that by the help of this passion, we may cast an evil spirit, when our reason alone could not effect it. What has been said of anger, may in part be applied to hatred, disdain, and pride; passions which occasion much evil, and yet by prudent management may be turned to a religious use, and do as much service. But envy, malice, and detraction can be of no good use; they being pure vice, without any mixture of virtue.

Another troublesome companion to man is fear; a treacherous passion appointed to give us fair warning of dangers, and yet it often needlessly disturbs us by false alarms, and representing dangers nearer and greater than they really are. It awakens our jealousy, increases our apprehensions, and anticipates our pain, so that one might almost think it might be well spared. And yet would we but set this passion right, and apply it to its proper object, there is not a more noble, a more useful principle in our nature. A heathen poet said it was the foundation of all religion. The divine Psalmist says, it is the beginning of wisdom. And those men whose constitution inclines them to be fearful, have a great advantage on this account: for if we are afraid of a little transient pain, a touch of the lancet, or prick of the sword, how much more tenderly ought we to be affected with the apprehensions of eternal death, and endless torments? If we are afraid of disobliging a man, because he may hurt us; how much more shall we stand in awe of God, who is ever present with us, and by the word of his mouth can speak us dead? If we are so apt to be terrified with every little accident, from the wind, the earthquake, and the fire; how can we but be astonished at the thoughts of that day, when the earth itself shall fall from under us, and the heavens shall melt with ferrent heat? If we are subject to be fearful, let us be afraid of these things, and then our fear will prove our best preservative. If we set the passions in the right way, they may be made at all times useful and serviceable to us.

Lastly, I shall mention but one passion more, and that is pity: a passion that seems to be implanted in us for the sake of that most excellent Christian duty, charity: a passion that makes us partake of the griefs, fears, and pains of other men, and is therefore properly called compassion. It was the passion of pity which occasioned the apostles' declaration in the text; it being the cure of a poor impotent man, that made them pass for gods; and which forced them to declare they were subject to passions like other men. It must be allowed, that this was the most natural error that idolaters could be subject to; for there is nothing so apt to gain us true veneration and esteem, as the relieving the wants of others, and making their misfortunes our own. In nothing shall we appear so much like God, as by having a provident care, a tender concern for the good of his creatures. This is so kind, so human, so generous a passion, and so glorious a duty, that it is difficult to say, whether it be most nearly allied to nature or to grace. It is in truth the top and perfection of both. It is that love which leads to all the graces of the gospel, and brings us to joy, peace, gentleness, goodness, and whatever is valuable and praise-worthy.

Love is the tenderest affection of the human soul, the first-fruits of the spirit; therefore let us shew our love in the most natural, the most religious way; and that is by our pity. There are many poor, many indigent persons among us, that stand in need of our relief; and though we cannot assist them in that miraculous manner the apostles did, yet silver and gold we have, and should also have pity and compassion, and let us give of what we have. Those who debase and magnify themselves for their good temper, and drink to pass for gods, by being void of passion, will act according to their opinion; but God grant that we may shew ourselves to be men, by employing our passions agreeably to reason, as the apostles did, and then they will tend to the honour of God, and the benefit of mankind. I will now propose some means, fit and proper to be used by us, to have our passions under rule and government.

There is a great difference between those who have been long subject to the power of unruly lusts and passions, and such as have rather evil inclinations than sinful habits to overcome; because it is more difficult to reform the former than the latter; the thought of which should prevail on all young persons, to curb and restrain their affections betimes. And that our passions and lusts may not get the dominion over it, we must be careful to oppose and check them at first, before they become inordinate. We must be so vigilant as timely to rebuke and stifle all malicious, revengeful, proud, unclean, covetous, or repining thoughts, at their first starting up in our minds; for we must not play with and encourage any corrupt and impure imaginations, or wicked thoughts. When we cherish in our hearts covetous, lustful, or envious inclinations, we put our passions into a ferment, and so by degrees they rise to that height as to get the mastery of us, and then we are hurried into all kinds of sin and misery. So dangerous are such beginnings as these, that the devil, when he discovers them in us, takes advantage thereof, and brings us at last to commit the greatest wickedness, and the vilest crimes, without fear or shame.

We must therefore carefully resist the first motions and inclinations to sin, lest they break out into inordinate unruly passions; for it will be much easier to do this at first than when they have gained power over us. This advice is very proper for those whose passions are grown headstrong, and have long held them in captivity. Let such strive to avoid the temptations to his lusts, whatever it be, and oppose and weaken the first attacks, thereby to prevent the ill effects that might otherwise ensue. A little advantage is not inconsiderable and to be despised. A person who hath been long contracting an evil habit must be content to mend by degrees; and by gradually gaining ground, he will at last obtain a complete conquest over himself. Men of furious and choleric tempers, by constant resolution, by suddenly rebuking themselves after they have been surprised, and continuing in this good way, have at length attained a spirit of meekness and patience. And if once we gain a rectitude of temper, the government of our passions will not be difficult. In order to this we must be renewed in the spirit of our mind. A meek-spirited man is not apt to break out into fury, nor a patient spirit to fall into despair, nor a philosopher of an even temper to be extravagantly raised or depressed at prosperity or adversity. The chief difficulty lies in reforming the disposition of our souls, and renewing the inner man. It is not so hard for a bad man to abstain from one single act of sin, or to do a thing that is good, as to be converted from an evil temper, which leads him to vice, and renders him averse to virtue. Thus it is easier for a miser to give an alms upon occasion, than to be cured of that covetousness which is ever a root of injustice and uncharitableness. It is easier for a choleric person to curb and suppress his passion and wrath now and then, than totally to subdue that hastiness of spirit, which upon any provocation prompts him to anger. It is easier for a licentious voluptuary to deny himself sometimes a vicious pleasure, than quite to throw off the power of temptation. But however difficult this may be, it must be done. We must cleanse ourselves from all filthiness of spirit, and be transformed by the renewing of our minds.

We must not forget to make our prayers to God, that he who giveth wisdom liberally and upbraideth not, would teach us the wisdom of governing our passions, and by the aid of his Holy Spirit, give us the victory over them; that he would create in us a clean heart, and renew a right spirit within us, and sanctify us throughout. When an unruly passion is subdued, and a bad temper corrected, we have as it were obtained a new nature, and this is to be born anew, or of God. For these great blessings we must depend upon God by daily and fervent prayer. And all our vigilance and pains with ourselves, and our earnest intreaties at the throne of grace, we must particularly apply against that sin which does so easily beset us, against that passion we have the least under command; for that which exposeth us to the first mischief, requires the greatest care and strength to subdue it. We must labour to set nature right where most crooked: this will give us rule over all our passions, because the government of the rest will more easily follow. And if we once keep our ground, we shall maintain the inward quiet and security of our minds, and being freed from the bondage of sin, we shall enjoy the happy liberty of the children of God.

SERMON CVII.

By BISHOP GIBSON.

Of Temperance in Eating and Drinking.

1 Cor. ix. 25.

Every man that striveth for the mastery, is temperate in all things; now they do it to obtain a corruptible crown, but we an incorruptible.

THE apostle here alludes to those games and races that were celebrated among the Corinthians, in which the victors were rewarded with crowns and garlands; and such were their desires after these victories and rewards, that they who strove for the prize, regulated their diet and exercise, in order to improve their strength and activity; cheerfully submitting to the strictest abstinence, and denying themselves their most beloved pleasures. They were temperate in all things, or, as the original better expresses it, they were resolutely, temperate and regular, so that nothing could break their constancy and resolution; and if they could do all this to obtain a corruptible crown, much more should we Christians willingly and cheerfully submit to such regulations and self-denials as the gospel requires; and not be tempted to any excess, when we have in our eye an incorruptible and immortal crown of glory. Though these words may be so taken, as to signify an universal government over our inordinate appetites and desires; yet in this place, the apostle more immediately alludes to the discipline observed at the games and races, with respect to a strict regulation in meats and drinks. But by shewing what are the proper rules and measure of a regular use of these, the great sinfulness of any irregular abuse of them will more evidently appear both in itself, in its consequence, and effects. However, it should be observed, that the constitutions, ages, and other circumstances of men being so very different, there can be no one fixed rule or measure in this point; because the same proportion, which to one person may not be a sufficient nourishment, may to another be excess; so that what is necessary or convenient, within the bounds of moderation, must in great measure be left to the judgment of every Christian, upon an honest and conscientious regard to the true ends of eating and drinking; namely, the preserving of life, the refreshing the spirits, the preparing ourselves for the business of that station wherein God's providence hath placed us.

As God hath planted in every man a natural desire of life, so the first and most immediate end of eating and drinking is for the preservation of it. But then we are always to remember, that it is life we are to provide for, and not luxury; that the using God's creatures more liberally than nature requires or can bear, is not the way to preserve, but to shorten and destroy life; and that it is very sinful, ungrateful, and unreasonable, for us to suffer an inordinate appetite to turn those blessings to the destruction of life, which God graciously gives us for the preservation of it. Not that we are to live by weight and measure, or were presently guilty of sin, if we exceed what will barely support life, for this is impossible; and, besides, the fear of transgressing would fill the mind with perpetual scruples, and deprive us of the enjoyment of God's gifts: but the guard and caution which God requires of us, is, to keep from what will weaken and destroy life; and there is so great a difference between what will barely support, or overcharge nature, that we may, by observing a due proportion, very innocently enjoy the blessings of heaven.

Another end of eating and drinking, is to repair and refresh the spirits, when wasted by thought and business. It has pleased God to clothe our souls with bodies of a weak, heavy, and unactive constitution, which cannot endure long application of any kind, without growing faint, weary, and uneasy; and therefore he has provided meats and drinks in the nature of remedies, to revive and refresh the drooping spirits, and give new life and vigour to the whole. But then we must use them so as God intended; not to neglect or lay aside our natural strength and vigour, but only to assist nature when faint and drooping. We must not apply these remedies but when nature requires them, either when we are hungry and thirsty, or tired with thought and labour; nor must we apply them in larger proportions, than what will fairly answer the needs and necessities of nature. But if men, out of luxury, or a desire to please the appetite, to pamper the body, or to comply with custom, and a habit of indulgence, will be continually refreshing nature, when she has no need, or overcharge her when she has; this is a direct abuse of God's blessings, clogs the spirits, instead of refreshing them, and by using nature to such needless aids, makes her lose her own strength, by craving a perpetual supply of artificial spirits; till by degrees men have no power to resist the importunity of such appetites, nor any life, any vigour left, but what they derive from those false flames which will quickly expire, and end in a fatal stupidity. This is the most wretched state into which man can sink; and changes the human into a brutal nature. For what is there that more distinguishes men from brutes than the government of the appetite? and when that is lost, they are only beasts in the shape of men; and yet so bewitching are the pleasures of the palate, and so easily are men's appetites corrupted, that with a little indulgence, they will insensibly sink into this miserable condition; and which nothing can prevent, but a serious regard to the real necessities of nature, uninfected by habit, together with steadfast resolutions to apply these refreshments only when they are proper and needful; and in such proportions as may make them a real refreshment, and not a burden by excess.

Another end of eating and drinking, is to fit and prepare us for the business of that station in which God's providence hath placed us. For every man, high or low, rich or poor, hath some certain work or business to do in the world; and by the wisdom and goodness of God, he affords us those blessings, to enable us to perform these with comfort and success; and therefore we ought to use and apply them in such a manner as may make them most subservient to our daily business, calling, and profession. And this we do, when we make the seasons of eating and drinking what they ought to be, only short retreats from business, and not the business of life; when we take care in due time to return to the duties of our calling, and bring with us understanding and abilities, sufficient to pursue it: and when we unbend our minds, which is sometimes necessary, to let it be seldom, and without any mixture of excess. An enjoyment of the blessings of life within these rules, is truly a repairing of our strength and spirits, and a real furtherance in our daily business; and being so, is a sober and temperate use of our meats and drinks, and answers the end for which God gave them. But when these refreshments are long and frequent, and consume much time that might be otherwise usefully and beneficially employed; when men have no other aim in invigorating the spirits, by the liberal enjoyments of God's blessings, but to spend them in mirth and jollity; when so far from designing them as preparatives to business, they cannot bear to think of returning to business, or when their excesses have left them neither sense nor reason to attend it; then is such a conduct an irregular and sinful abuse of God's creatures.

And this intolerable waste of time is greatly aggravated by the expence of treasure thereby occasioned, which in the richer sort is a defrauding of their indigent neighbours, who are to partake of their superfluous wealth; and in the poorer sort, is the robbing of their own needy families, which ought to be their daily and immediate care. And both rich and poor will find these no small aggravations of the guilt of gluttony and drunkenness, when they come to render an account at the last day. Nor will it be any excuse to say, they were unavoidably led to these excesses, by their concerns in the world; since were it not also their inclination, the business and the excess may be easily separated, where there is a sober virtuous mind. But instead of making this a pretence for their intemperance, they should be very watchful against such temptations, and earnestly pray for God's grace, to be delivered therefrom. And if we duly attend to what has been observed, we shall be able to judge, not only what are the proper bounds of sobriety and temperance, and when we exceed them; but also how great and heinous the guilt of that excess is, and how basely we abuse the blessings of God; in our forgetting their proper ends, by perverting them to purposes directly contrary thereto, in turning that to the destruction of life which God gave for the preservation of it; in our making that the means of stupefying the spirits, by which he designed to raise and refresh them; in transforming ourselves into the state of brutes by those helps, which he bestowed for the more vigorous discharge of the duties of rational creatures; and in making that the occasion of indisposing us for the business of life, which God graciously gives to support us under it. Such is the sinfulness of an inordinate use of meats and drinks in itself, as it perverts the true ends of the blessings of God, and is a shameful abuse of human nature. I shall now proceed to consider the sad effects and bad consequences of this sin.

Every sin is in some respect contrary to us. Some sins are hurtful to our bodies, others to our souls. Some waste our fortunes, others ruin our reputation. Some are very bad in their own nature, and others are attended with fatal consequences. But the sin of drunkenness is equally hurtful to soul and body; it is as bad in itself, as in its consequences; and has an ill influence on human society in general, and on those who are guilty of it in particular. Was I to describe all the ill characters of this vice, the description would be so frightful and surprising, that one would really wonder how it is possible that human nature should sink into so base and infamous, so hurtful and desperate a vice; for nothing so much wears the body, wastes the life and strength of man, as drunkenness. It fires the blood, weakens the stomach, and often puts a speedy end to life, by fevers, sad diseases, or other fatal accidents, to which a man is then exposed: and where a constitution is so strong as to escape this, yet the certain slow waste that these disorders bring, seldom suffer such men to live out half their days. Gouts and other infirmities are severe reckonings, that they must pay for those unruly liberties they have allowed themselves. And hence arise many quarrels among men, whose passions being inflamed, while their reason is extinguished, do often end fatally. This vice is the great corrupter of young persons who are drawn in and ensnared by the mirth and gaiety that accompany it, and from hence proceed many irregularities. The wise man elegantly describes this: Who hath woe? who hath sorrow? who hath contentions? who hath labbling? who hath wounds without cause? who hath redness of eyes? they that turn long at the wine. But at the last it biteth like a serpent, it stingeth like an adder. Thine eyes shall behold strange women, and thine heart shall utter perverse things. Both sweating and lewdness are the ordinary effects of it. Yea, thou shalt be as he that lieth down in the midst of the sea, or as he that lieth upon the top of the mast:—a drunken man being exposed to so many dangers which he can neither foresee nor prevent.

There is nothing that more wastes a man's time and fortune than drunkenness. It makes him forget God, himself, and his neighbour. The time he should employ for improving his mind, looking after his affairs, or doing good to others, is thrown away in those brutal excesses; so that, as the wise man says, The drunkard and the glutton shall come to poverty; and drowsiness (or laziness) shall clothe a man with rags. That hard drinking insensibly brings on sloth and great carelessness, by which men first neglect, and then ruin their affairs, is too notorious to require any proof. It also makes men remiss in the concerns of their families, and wanting in all the respects due to their relations, friends, or neighbours. But the worst part of this vice appears in this, that our reason, and all the powers of our souls, fall under such disorders and unruly violences, that a man, while he is under the power of wine or strong liquor, is transformed into a beast or madman. Our reason is the image of God, the glory of our nature, and the guide of our life: and God has plentifully supplied us with meat and drink, that by these our bodies may be rendered capable to serve our minds. But when men abuse these by excess, they not only waste and misapply the good creatures of God, but do also contradict the ends of nature, deprive themselves of the free use of their reason, and which usually produces in some a spirit of rage, passion, and cruelty; in others, sullenness, obstinacy, and ill-nature; and in most, great folly and indecency in words and actions. Hence often proceed riots and excesses, swearing and railing, fighting and murder. And all these are so many aggravations of the sin of immoderate drinking; and are such as men know by their own repeated experience to be the usual effects of it. And thus, whereas the chief study of every wise and good man ought to be, to perfect his reason, and raise his nature to the highest pitch; a drunkard labours to debase and depress it all he possibly can.

Some men of stronger heads will perhaps think themselves unconcerned in all this, because being used to hard drinking, it has no visible effect on them. But let such seriously consider these words: Woe unto them that rise up early in the morning, that they may follow strong drink, that continue until night, till wine inflames them!—And woe unto them that are mighty to drink wine, and men of strength to mingle strong drink! Such men are generally the plagues of the places where they live, being the instruments of corrupting all about them, tempting them to waste their strength, to ruin their families and constitutions. Thus it appears that drunkenness carries with it a complication of evils, equally destructive to soul and body. But there is another species of intemperance, that seems not so criminal, because not attended with so many fatal symptoms; I mean those who are not quite intoxicated, and therefore think themselves free of the heavy charge that falls upon it; and yet habituate themselves to drinking of wine or strong liquor when their bodies no way require it. Some think it a decent and hospitable way of entertaining friends to be frequently putting the glass about, without which they imagine conversation grows heavy, and that the master of the house is too frugal of his liquor. But besides the waste of time and of God's good creatures by means of such tipping, an excessive heat is raised in the blood, which insensibly impairs nature, and brings on such a habit, that they cannot refrain from drinking, and this in time corrupts their health, and enfeebles their minds.

To all these arguments against this vice, arising from the nature of our souls and bodies, there is another very strong one which the Christian religion affords. When St. Paul reckons up the works of darkness, in which the Romans had lived while heathens, which Christians were obliged to avoid, he begins with this; Let us walk honestly as in the day; not in rioting and drunkenness; not in strife and envy. And the same apostle, comparing the gospel to light, and heathenism to darkness, observes, That they that be drunken are drunken in the night; but let us who are of the day be sober. And our Saviour bids us,—take heed to yourselves, lest at any time your hearts be overcharged with surfeiting and drunkenness, and the cares of this life; and so that day come upon us unawares. St. Paul also reckons drunkenness among the works of the flesh, and says, that those who do such things shall not inherit the kingdom of God. Besides what appears from these passages of scripture, there is a more general consideration, which shows how contrary this sin is to the spirit and design of the gospel; which directs us to mortify our bodies with its lusts and affections; to subdue our appetites, to crucify the old man, and to bring our bodies into subjection to our minds. The main design of the New Testament is, to make us consider ourselves as pilgrims on earth, daily to remember that we must soon leave this world, and therefore ought to prepare for another. We are called upon to live after, and to walk according to the spirit; not to indulge our irregular appetites and desires; but as far as our state of health and life will permit, to deny all unnecessary gratifications. These are the rules, and this is the spirit of the gospel; so that, if we duly consider things, we have arguments sufficient to deter us from this sin.

But what then must we think or say of our age, in which this corruption so universally prevails over all ranks and degrees of persons, so that scarce any are to be found who have escaped it? Some of a more brutal kind, are overcome with the mere love of the liquor, though it be so shameful an excess, that no one will own it. Others know not how to dispose of their time, being bred to nothing, and hardly capable of any thing. And because of mere idleness, to get time off their hands, they run into these extravagancies, in which days and nights are spent. And yet no man can have been so neglected in his education, but that he may find somewhat to do if he will. He may and ought to look into his own affairs, and apply himself to some sort of industry. He may find out some good company to converse with, and some occasions to do acts of kindness and charity to others; so that a man may, if he will, employ his time to many good purposes.

A pleasant conversation is no doubt very agreeable, and to have it moderately enlivened and refreshed, with some generous liquor, can be no crime; but cannot men have mirth and be merry without being drunk or mad? Is there no measure to such folly? It may therefore well be said, that the end of such mirth is madness. For to play with our health and life, our fortune and reputation, above all with our souls and eternal happiness, is a madness beyond expression; and yet these are the men who often pretend to wit and sense. Some indeed are carried against their own inclination, merely by ill example and custom; till at last habit and practice make it familiar to them. But it is a strange degree of perverseness, that men will become a sort of martyrs for their vices. They would think it extremely hard, were they obliged to endure so much in the practice of religion and virtue as they suffer by the sin of intemperance. But dissolute habits do not change the nature of things; for though they may grow less shameful and reproachful, by being common, yet they are not the less evil. And that man must have a very weak mind, who is ashamed of being wise and sober, because others are irregular and extravagant. Some there are, who think they cannot be hospitable and free-hearted without sending their friends and servants home intoxicated. But this is a very unsuitable return of a civil visit; to endeavour to destroy the health of him who in kindness comes to see him, and perhaps to endanger his life in going home. The imputation of covetousness, which some are afraid of, may easily be removed by acts of charity to the poor, or generosity to the afflicted and unfortunate. These are noble instances of true goodness and largeness of soul, by which others are both benefited and relieved. Thus it appears, how weak all those excuses are, which these mad sort of people make use of to palliate such an enormous practice.

And among the miseries of this unhappy state, it is none of the least, that where an inordinate appetite reigns, reason and consideration are shut out; and when men are reduced to such a thoughtless condition, they generally go on without any sense, either of their sin or danger; and without any view beyond their present enjoyment. And nothing can awaken them out of this stupid state, but a great resolution, and serious reflection on the brutal condition in which these indulgences have brought them: on the shameful abuses of God's blessings, and their own rational faculties, in which it has betrayed them; and to what dreadful miseries it will bring them at last. These reflections imprinted on their hearts, may by God's blessing produce a happy change, and deliver them from their misery and danger. For though custom is very powerful, especially in the present case, yet it has not force enough to make that necessary to nature which is destructive of it, as all excess must be. But so far from this indulgence being necessary to life, that when a long course of intemperance has endangered it, the leaving that course is always the first prescription, without which all other remedies are useless and ineffectual. So that what they call necessary to preserve life, tends only to satisfy a craving and inordinate appetite; the gratifying of which is the direct and immediate means of destroying life. And it is therefore no wonder, that an indulgence which has been long continued should be uneasy under the first check or restraint. But if there be a steady resolution to restrain the current of desire, the appetite will, by degrees, grow more patient and quiet, and such persons will find more pleasure in governing than they ever did by indulging it.

Let then those who have indulged themselves in a habit of intemperance, stand still and consider, that they are in the worst state of slavery; a slavery of reason to appetite, of the human to the brutal part. Let them resolve to assert the freedom and dignity of their nature, and if they have lived like beasts, to die like men. Let them reflect how they have abused the blessings of God to luxury and excess: with how much goodness he has borne their provocations, and waited for their amendment. And let a sense of his mercy and their own vileness produce in them that godly shame and sorrow, which worketh repentance to salvation. But if neither the force of reason nor religion will prevail, let the terrors of the Lord persuade them not to continue in a course that must shortly end in their eternal destruction. If the work be difficult, it is also necessary; and let men consider, whether they shall be uneasy now, or miserable for ever. The difficulty of the work should excite their resolution; and by constant prayers to God, he will strengthen and assist them.

It must be owned that the condition of such a person, though not desperate, is exceeding dangerous; and the more so, as there are but few instances of any who are reclaimed from it. And a state so dangerous should be powerful warnings to others not to be betrayed into the same kind of slavery, by luxury and indulgence. The only way to avoid the danger is, at first to govern and restrain the appetite, to keep under the body, and bring it into subjection. Such restraints and self-denials are a necessary means to preserve and secure men's innocence, and keep them from falling into excess. So that the only way to be safe and innocent, is to keep an habitual guard and restraint upon the appetite, from a due sense of the true ends and uses of eating and drinking; of the great wickedness of abusing God's blessings, to the dishonour of religion, to the shame and reproach of human nature; and of the unspeakable danger and misery of living and dying in habits of excess, both as to this world and the next. And with these considerations, there must be frequent and earnest prayer to God, that he will preserve upon their minds a lively sense of these things, and mercifully afford such supplies of grace and strength as will be needful to prevent those evil habits, and effectually to restrain all such acts of irregularity and excess as naturally lead to them.

SERMON CVIII.

By ARCHBISHOP SHARPE.

Character of an upright Man.

PSALM cxii. 4.

To the upright there ariseth light in the darkness.

THIS psalm seems to be an explication or paraphrase on the words of St. Paul: godliness hath the promise of this life, as well as of that which is to come. And here we have a description of the pious man, and of his blessedness in this life. His piety is described in the following terms: he is one who fears God, and delights in his commandment; he is righteous and upright in his conversation; he is prudent, and guides his affairs with discretion! he has a great sense of God, on whom his heart is fixed, trusting in the Lord? he is charitable, gracious, and full of compassion; he sheweth favour and lendeth; he hath dispersed and given to the poor. His blessedness is thus represented: His posterity shall be great and happy: his seed shall be mighty upon earth: the generation of the upright shall be blessed. His fortune shall be ample and plentiful: riches and plenteousness shall be in his house. His fame and reputation shall be lasting, his righteousness remaineth for ever; he shall be had in everlasting remembrance. His honour, power, and dignity shall excite the envy of the wicked; his horn shall be exalted with honour, the wicked shall see it and be grieved. Lastly, he shall be safe and secure in troublesome times: To the upright there ariseth light in the darkness. Such light shall arise to an upright man in evil times, as that he shall not be moved, neither shall he be afraid of evil tidings; for his heart is established, and he shall not shrink, until he sees his desire upon his enemies, or is delivered out of his distress.

Of these several characters ascribed to a pious man, I shall recommend to your present consideration his uprightness; and of the several instances of his blessedness shall only observe those of safety and security, in times perilous and troublesome: To the upright there ariseth light in the darkness. The character of the person to whom the promise of blessedness is made, is the upright man, or a man of honesty and integrity. By uprightness is meant the conformity of a man's mind to the eternal rules of righteousness, and the agreement of his actions to the principles of his mind: so that, in general, an upright man is one who in all things follows the dictates of his conscience, and makes his duty the rule of his actions. But the more lively to display his amiable qualities to our imitation, it will be proper to consider him more particularly with respect to God and men; both as to his religion, and his civil conversation.

A religious carriage towards God is essentially necessary to uprightness. He that walketh in uprightness feareth the Lord. Take away religion and the fear of God, the foundation of uprightness is destroyed. He that hath no sense of God and religion can never think himself bound to observe any rules in his actions and behaviour, but what are subservient to his private, sensual, and worldly interest; and consequently whatever is inconsistent therewith, be it never so base, vile, and injurious, he may act and execute without restraint, whenever a temptation offers; and yet think himself as innocent, and his actions as commendable, as if he had been truly honest and virtuous.

He therefore that is an upright man, hath a serious and hearty sense of God and religion on his mind, and is ever careful to preserve and increase it. But then he is not contented with a mere speculative belief, an outward profession of religious truths; but he has them so impressed on his heart, as to influence his whole life and conversation. He thinks it not sufficient to be orthodox in his opinions, or a member of a true church; zealous in maintaining and promoting the right way; but he strives to live as he believes, to practise suitably to the profession he makes. As he holds fast the form of godliness, so he is careful to express the power of it, in an innocent, virtuous life. He takes not up his principles to advance his interest, or please a party; but he believes what appears true, and professes it because it is his duty. He neither chuses his religion out of worldly considerations, nor leaves it on such motives; but is resolute and constant in bearing testimony to the truth against all opposition. He is one who thinks religion too sacred to be prostituted to mean purposes; and therefore never uses it as an instrument to serve any base end, though he was sure thereby to compass his designs. He is a man who does not place his religion in outward forms and services, but hath a nobler sense of God than to think such things are pleasing to him; and therefore his principal concern is about the great indispensable duties of Christianity: the weightier matters of the law, justice, mercy, and faith. He hath the everlasting notions and differences of good and evil deeply engraven in his heart; and how to practise the one and avoid the other, is his chief study. He endeavours uprightly and sincerely to observe all God's commands; calls no sin little, because his temper inclines him to it; but at all times preserves an uniform aversion to whatever is evil. He is an utter enemy to all factions in religion, and though he loves truth, is not less concerned for peace. He is better pleased with his charity to compose and reconcile religious differences, than with all his skill and abilities to dispute them; for he knows that love is more acceptable to God than a right opinion. Lastly, he is religious without noise, and uses no little arts to make his piety known. He seeks not the praise of men, but studies only to approve himself to God; and is therefore as careful of his thoughts as of his actions. He fears God, and regards his duty as much when no one sees him, as if the eyes of all were upon him. These are the great instances of uprightness as to religion; and whoever makes good these characters, may reasonably conclude himself an honest man towards God, a true Israelite indeed, in whom there is no guile.

If we take a view of the upright man in his civil conversation, as to his carriage and demeanour towards men, it will be proper to consider him as a private person, and a magistrate. As a private person, he will so frame and model his whole conversation, take such a prudent and diligent care of himself and his own good, as is consistent with, and tends to promote the good and happiness of others. He considers that every man has a right to be happy as well as himself; and since none can be so without the assistance of others, he thinks it reasonable that he should contribute his endeavours towards it. These being the main principles of his mind, he is careful that his actions and whole conversation are suitable thereto. He is therefore exactly just in all his dealings, not knowingly doing wrong or injury to any one, though he could gain ever so much without being discovered. He is faithful to his trust, never taking advantage of another's credulity, nor abusing the confidence reposed in him. He is a man of great candour, of sweet and obliging behaviour; careful not to suffer by good nature, and yet ready to be kind and assist others, unless attended with great inconvenience to himself; but what he once promises he punctually performs, though it be prejudicial to him. He is a man that loves, and is as tender of a good name and reputation as any one; but scorns to use any evil arts to procure or preserve it. He hates mean and servile compliances, and will not speak or act against the sense of his own mind, to humour any man. Flattery and dissimulation he abhors; envy and detraction he is above. He never lessens another to make himself greater, nor repines at his neighbour's prosperity. He puts a fair construction on men's words and actions, rather concealing a fault than report it worse than it is. He hopes and thinks the best of all men, and does the most good he can. He is plain, free, and open in his carriage; his words and thoughts always go together. Though he is watchful of opportunities to do himself good, and is careful to avoid dangers, yet he never uses indirect means to benefit or secure himself. He scorns to take advantage of any man's necessities, nor will undermine another to effect his own designs. Deceit and collusion are strangers to his dealing. He esteems a cunning intriguing man no better than a knave. In a word, all his designs are honest and just, such as tend to the good of the community as well as his own, but to no man's loss and detriment; and the means he makes use of to obtain his designs are so fair, that he cares not who knows them. This is the man that is upright in his conversation towards men; the man that to the wisdom of the serpent joins the innocence and simplicity of the dove.

Thus much of the upright man, as a private person; let us now view him under a more conspicuous character, and as a magistrate, intrusted with the management of public affairs: and here we shall find him actuated by the same principles, and pursuing the same designs we have before mentioned; only his virtues, having another sphere and object, require a different consideration. The great thing he proposes by accepting any office, is the glory of God and the public good: the honour and dignity of the place, and other worldly advantages, are but secondary considerations with him. He studies not to ingratiate himself with men, but to discharge a good conscience. He has courage and resolution to do what is fit, just, and conducive to the public good; not discouraged from his duty by the menaces of the mighty, nor the murmurings of the multitude. He resolves not hastily, but maturely deliberates and considers before he determines. He does nothing precipitately, but impartially weighs what is represented to him. His ears are open to all parties; he debates without passion, prejudice, or prepossession. Neither profit nor friends can corrupt him to act in matters of right contrary to his inward sense. His care and study is chiefly employed on the public. He is ever sedulous to maintain the worship and service of God, to defend and encourage true religion; to suppress vice and debauchery, impiety and irreligion. He is a father to the poor, and the cause which he knoweth not, he searcheth out; he breaketh the jaws of the wicked, and plucketh the spoils out of his teeth. He studiously endeavours to preserve his allegiance to his prince, and his fidelity to the public; neither invading the rights of the one, nor injuring the liberties of the other. By his prudence and moderation he will endeavour to extinguish growing flames, and not add fuel to them; but will calm and allay men's jealousies, rather than excite and encrease them. To conclude; he is a man that fears God and honours the king, obeys the laws, and meddles not with them that are given to change.—I shall now proceed to represent the advantages and privileges, that an upright man enjoys in evil and dangerous times. To the upright therefore there ariseth light in darkness. By darkness is here meant any kind of straits, difficulties, or adversities. By light we are to understand either guidance and direction, safety and defence, or peace and joy, which ariseth to the upright man. And

To the upright there ariseth light in the darkness, taking light for guidance and direction. Be the times never so dark, he hath this happiness, that he is rarely at a loss how to conduct himself. He, of all others, most easily sees his way, it being plain, easy, and straight before him: but the ways of vice and wickedness are extremely rough and crooked. Whoever pursues evil designs, and is a slave to base affections, must necessarily be entangled in perpetual labyrinths; for having many different and inconsistent ends to pursue, he must unavoidably be often at a loss how to behave himself. If he goes this way, then something will be discovered which he studiously endeavoured to conceal; if that way, then some man or party is obliged; whose interest he stood in need of; if he takes a third way, perhaps he then destroys his main design. Such difficulties and perplexities always attend the man of intrigue, and every one who walks not uprightly. But the contrary of this is the lot of the upright man. For he has only one end to pursue; and that is, to discharge a good conscience. By this all his concerns are regulated; and of consequence he hath no clashing of interests to perplex his deliberations; no little turns to be served ; all his resolutions are easily made, and he avoids most of those difficulties which entangle others. His counsels and methods are always the same, and he is never at a loss to behave himself on any emergency. His way is commonly so plain, that he requires little advice or instruction to find it: The integrity of the upright shall guide him, the path of the just is a shining light. Again,

If he happens to fall into such circumstances, as to stand in need of great advice and deliberation, yet the upright man hath vastly the advantage of others : because he always enjoys the free use of his intellectual powers, can exert his reason to its highest perfection and greatest advantage : whereas the man who has sinister ends to pursue, by indirect methods, is sadly clouded in his discerning faculties, so as to hinder him from distinguishing rightly, whereby he commits many blunders and mistakes. For whoever frames his mind by other measures than those of honesty and conscience ; whoever intemperately pursues his private ends, or is a slave to inordinate passions of any sort ; these things will so bias his soul, as to render him incapable of making a true judgment of what is right ; and expose him to many dangerous errors in the management of his affairs, even in matters of little difficulty. But the upright man is not obnoxious to any of these inconveniences ; for having no turns to serve, but what are good and honest, nor no private affections or passions to be gratified, his conceptions of things are according to their nature, his determinations and resolutions are reasonable and proper, such as become the occasion. As his main design is to do in all instances what is best, so that preserves him from mistaking what is so. His reason and understanding are free and at liberty, and when any difficulty arises, he of all men is most likely to get out of it with ease.

And yet if we take light for safety and security, for defence and protection, an upright man in the worst of times may, above all others, promise these things to himself ; he that walketh uprightly walketh surely. And indeed this seems to be what is principally intended by the Psalmist. The light here said to arise to the upright in darkness, chiefly respects his security from danger in times of great calamity, as appears from what follows : He shall not be moved for ever : he shall not be afraid of evil tidings, his heart shall not shrink, till he sees his desire upon his enemies. And this security in times of danger the upright man may expect, because uprightness does in its own nature conduce thereto, and is what also intitles him to God's more particular protection. As by wickedness a city is overthrown, so by the blessing of the upright, it is exalted. Every upright man is really a benefactor to the public. And if any one can in reason hope to escape the violence and iniquity of bad times, the man of honesty and integrity, he who is upright in all his ways, is the most likely to succeed therein ; because he of all others takes the surest method to preserve himself ; he is least obnoxious to the malice, envy, or rapine of open enemies, or pretended friends. So that uprightness and integrity is a shield and protection.

The upright man conducts himself in life with so much prudence, as to avoid those rocks, on which others split and are ruined. The destruction of men, even in the worst of times, is generally to be imputed to themselves ; either to the careless neglect of their own affairs, the lavishness and intemperance of their tongues, or to a busy intermeddling with the concerns of others. Such things as these commonly bring misfortunes on men, and are the foundation of all those straits and difficulties with which they are entangled, even in times of the greatest calamity. But the upright man in a great measure is free therefrom, because his principles oblige him to act directly opposite. His ways are so universally approved, that none will offer him an injury, lest it tends to their own detriment. As he endeavours to oblige all men, and by his conduct to make every one his friend, and none his enemies ; so when any difficult circumstances attend him, he will easily find those who are ready to help and assist him. His conversation is so unexceptionable, his management of affairs so prudent, that those who do not love him, will not easily find an occasion to do him injury. Such as have no acquaintance with him, yet having a good esteem for honesty and uprightness in general, will be ready to afford him what assistance they can; from a natural sense, that a good man should be protected, because his case and circumstances may one day be their own. Even those who have lost all sense of good and evil, yet in order to preserve their credit and interest with mankind, will think themselves obliged not to oppress an upright man.

But how ineffectual soever all human means may prove, to secure and preserve an upright man in evil times, yet he has still an anchor more firm and stable to rely on, and which will not fail him; and that is the protection of God, and the care of his particular providence. Men may plot and design, order and contrive as they please, but still God governs the world; and either blasts their most fair and hopeful projects, or if he suffers them to succeed, turns them to what use and purpose he thinks best. And if God rules and disposes all things, as that not a sparrow falls to the ground without his will, in a more especial manner doth he engage himself to take care of those who walk uprightly before him. He hath promised to make their righteousness as clear as the light, and their just dealing as the noon day: that they shall not be confounded in perilous times, and in the days of death they shall have enough. Though they fall they shall not be cast down, for the Lord upholdeth them with his hand: that he will be their strength in the time of trouble; he will stand by and save them from the ungodly, because they put their trust in him. It would be endless to produce the many passages in scripture to this purpose; I shall therefore only add that remarkable one, where in the upright man, and his security in evil times, are described after a very particular manner: He that walketh righteously and speaketh uprightly; that despiseth the gain of oppressions; that shaketh his hands from holding of bribes; that stoppeth his ears from hearing of blood; and shutteth his eyes from seeing evil: he shall dwell on high; his place of defence shall be the munitions of the rocks; his bread shall be given him, his water shall be sure. That is, whoever walks uprightly, and makes a conscience of his ways, such a man shall be always under the watchful care and protection of the divine providence. For God will not suffer him to fall into any great distress; but will afford him such a portion of temporal good things, as to render his life easy and supportable. Experience generally verifies the truth of this; honest and upright men, in the midst of public calamities, for the most part escaping better than those who are otherwise. Such, in their greatest extremities, when no prospect of deliverance from any human means have appeared, yet, after a most strange, extraordinary, and unexpected manner, have met with succour and relief. And thus attended by the special providence of God, they have never been miserable, however sometimes afflicted, and deprived of an ample fortune.

But it must be acknowledged, that though piety and uprightness have the promise of blessedness in this life, and which is generally made good; yet there are many instances to the contrary. God, for wise reasons, may suffer an upright man to be oppressed, and perish in a common destruction, without violating such his promises; which can only be meant to respect ordinary and common events. And even in this case there will to the upright arise light in darkness: that is, light in the third sense we have given of the word, as implying peace, joy, and comfort; according to the Psalmist, light is soon for the righteous, and gladness for the upright in heart. Whatever afflictions the upright man suffers, he hath this advantage over others, that he can more easily bear them than they, without any great disturbance to himself: because he enjoys the same calmness and serenity of mind, the same peace, quiet and contentment, that ever he did. He rather rejoices than repines and grows discontented under his present sufferings; well knowing they are so ordered by the great Governor of the world, for his good and benefit. This consideration effectually supports him under all difficulties he conflicts with; that he is not only easy and quiet, but well-pleased with the dispensations of the divine providence towards him, how ungrateful soever to flesh and blood. Let what will happen, he is full of peace and joy, not being disappointed in his designs. His great aim was to please God; his conscience assures him, from God's word, that he has done it; and he waits for the happy time, when the secrets of all hearts shall be disclosed, and then doubts not of receiving approbation, and praise, and great reward; and his life and death will verify the Psalmist's observation, Mark the perfect man, and behold the upright, for the end of that man is peace.

SERMON CIX.

By ARCHBISHOP SHARPE.

A Serious Persuasive to a Holy Life.

PHIL. iv. 8.

Whatsoever things are true, whatsoever things are honest, whatsoever things are just, whatsoever things are pure, whatsoever things are lovely, whatsoever things are of good report; if there be any virtue, if there be any praise, think on these things.

HERE are many particulars recommended by the apostle, to our thoughts and practice, though not so many as the words which express them, there being several used in this enumeration of the same meaning and import: and which may be reduced to these following observations, and are so many instances of a Christian's duty: namely, a constant adherence to the true religion; honesty and justice in our dealings; a life of chastity and purity; and the constant practice of every thing virtuous and commendable. This being the true meaning of the words, I shall make them the heads of my present exhortation.

And first, Whatsoever things are true, think on these things. The truths St. Paul here exhorts us to remember, are no doubt the truths of the gospel, delivered by our Saviour; these we should think on, persist in, and never be prevailed on to depart from. It is an inestimable blessing of God to this kingdom, that he not only vouchsafes us the light of his gospel, but has also delivered it to us, with greater purity and sincerity, and free from the mixture of errors, than to any other people. Were we all sensible of the state of religion in other countries, we should soon be convinced how exceedingly happy we of this church are, above all Christians in Christendom. Let us therefore firmly adhere to the truths we have been taught and do profess; and to that church from whom we learnt them. Though I think no church infallible, yet if the truths of religion are to be taken from the rules of holy scriptures, and the platform of the primitive churches, then the church of England, both as to doctrine and practice, is undoubtedly the purest this day in the world; the most orthodox in faith, the freest from idolatry, superstition, and enthusiasm, of any now extant. This I can say, and declare it with great seriousness and sincerity, that if the religion of Jesus Christ, delivered in the New Testament, is the true religion, as most certain it is, then I believe in my conscience, that the communion of the church of England is a safe way to salvation, nay, the safest of any I know in the world. And therefore let me exhort you, stedfastly to hold fast and persevere in this communion. As here we have the things that are true, let us think of, and heartily embrace them, live and die in the profession of them.

The next thing recommended to us, is universal honesty, justice, and righteousness in our conversation. Whatsoever things are true, honest, and just; think on these things. The words honest and just import the same thing, though sometimes honest signifies grave or venerable. And indeed, if we are not sincerely just and honest, it is in vain to expect any advantage from our professing the truth. Whoever can allow himself in the practice of any knavish, dishonest, indirect dealing, however orthodox his belief and opinion may be, yet he is no true Christian. Let then our interests be what they will, yet in all our dealings we must be strictly just and upright: use no tricks, practice no ill arts to serve our ends; but in all our transactions with men, we must deal with that simplicity, integrity, and good conscience, as becomes those who are the disciples of him who was the most innocent, sincere, and upright person in the world. For no dishonesty can prosper long; whatever present turns it may serve, in a little time it will be bitterly repented; but righteousness and justice will establish a man's ways; the upright man, though not always the richest, is ever the safest.

The apostle having recommended to our practice whatever is true, honest, and just, he then adds, things that are pure; meaning thereby that we should study to be chaste and temperate in our hearts and lives, avoiding all manner of lewdness and sensuality. And if it was necessary to put Christians in mind of this, in an age of so much strictness and devotion, it is abundantly more so in ours, when luxury, debauchery, and all manner of immorality so greatly prevail among us. I pray God to make us all sensible of the great folly and wickedness, the danger and dreadful consequences of such practices. And if we would preserve a sense of religion on our minds; if we have any regard for our health, estates, and families; any intention not to entail sottishness and diseases on our families; if we love our souls, and hope to see God, let us abstain from fleshly lusts, which war against the soul. Let us learn to live soberly and chastely, to practise purity and temperance, to avoid whoredom and drunkenness. For however we may slight these things, yet we are expressly told, that whoremongers and adulterers God will judge. That neither adulterers, fornicators, unclean persons, nor drunkards, shall ever inherit the kingdom of God, or of Christ.

But the apostle having recommended truth, honesty, and purity, to the daily thoughts and practice of all Christians, he then sums up the whole in generals, advising them, not only to be careful in those things, but also to improve in every other virtue that is praise-worthy, and esteemed among men. For, says he, whatsoever things are lovely, and of good report; if there be any virtue, any praise in them, think on these things. From hence we may learn what obligations we are under. For if the gospel of Christ favours us with such glorious light, such invaluable promises, and mighty assistances, we may in reason suppose, that in return great things are expected from us. To believe and profess the gospel, to do no wrong to any one, to be free from lewdness and drunkenness; though these are great and good things, yet Christianity obliges us to much more; for we must also be kind and charitable, as well as just and honest; modest, meek, and humble, as well as temperate and chaste. And not only so, but we must even avoid all appearance of evil. We must not only abstain from acts of injustice but from doing a hard ill-natured thing to any one; not only keep ourselves within the known limits of temperance and chastity, but avoid all opposite vices leading thereto; and the same in all other instances. For we are to endeavour to be as free from blame in our whole conversation as we possibly can; and besides, to do as much good as our circumstances will permit; this is to be a Christian indeed, and to adorn the doctrine of God in all things. Extremely happy and great will be the reward of those who thus walk worthy of their heavenly calling. They will here enjoy the solid peace and assurance of God's favour, which far exceeds all earthly blessings; and hereafter partake of eternal glory. Having thus given an account of what things we are to make the main pursuit of our lives, it will be proper also to say something of the methods and means which are necessary to be used for that purpose.

And the first thing I would exhort you to, is to use your endeavours to possess your minds with a hearty sense of Almighty God, and the absolute necessity of being seriously religious. Though mankind are naturally disposed to believe a God and religion, yet many of us have no lively hearty sense of it; we use religion as we do our clothes; they are convenient and necessary, therefore we wear them, but as to the form and make, we follow the custom of the country wherein we live. Yet as our clothes alter not our features, or the shape of our bodies, so neither doth the religion we profess any way affect the temper of our souls. In each case we only consult outward conveniency, being still the same persons, both inwardly and outwardly; but this way of being religious can do us no great kindness. Our religion will never serve us to any extraordinary purpose, unless our hearts are affected with it as well as our understandings. If therefore we love either our happiness in this world or the next, let us be persuaded to make it our principal care, to get a lively and vigorous sense of God impressed on our minds; and to approve ourselves to him, by walking as our blessed Saviour hath taught us; if we do this, we shall experience the great benefit of it, both here and hereafter. It is in vain to think of passing tolerably through this world, unless we have the hopes of God's favour to support us under the multitude of evil accidents, to which the state of human life necessarily exposes us. And as to the other world, without such hopes we are perfectly lost. Nor can we entertain any rational hopes of God's blessing and favour, unless we make it our chief business to serve, please, and obey him.

There are a great many excellent rules and maxims that we usually give our friends and children, whereby to make their fortunes. We are apt to advise them to get a true understanding of their business, and to pursue it with diligence; to keep out of ill-company; to avoid drinking, gaming, and lewdness; to study the tempers and humours of mankind, and dexterously apply themselves to those they want to converse with; and no doubt these are exceeding good rules, and very fit to be studied and practised. But still there is one rule, without which the others will signify little, to make the life of man easy and happy; and that is, to preserve a lively sense of God on our spirits, to have his fear always before our eyes, to love him above all things, to value his favour more than life, and dread his displeasure as the worst of evils. He that is possessed of this good principle, will naturally fall into the practice of them. And as to have the fear and love of God in our hearts is the most effectual way to obtain the divine blessing: so it is the only means to make our circumstances happy, if they are good; or easy and supportable, if bad. If therefore we would prosper and not be miserable, let us not be contented with a superficial outside religion, but affect our minds with a deep sense of God, and our duty towards him; and endeavour to impress the same sentiments on our children and friends. In truth, our present and future happiness so much depend on the true belief of a God, on our love to him, and the hopes of his favour; that without it, the present world, and all the imaginary pleasures and glories thereof, would to all wise and good men appear not only an empty, dull, unsatisfactory place, but a dismal melancholy prison. Was it supposed that all things here were the effects of blind chance or fatal necessity, and that no wisdom and goodness presides, to take care of mankind, no considerate man would desire to live in this world.

But after we have possessed our minds with a hearty sense of God, and of his providence, presence, and goodness, so as to make it the business of our lives to recommend ourselves to him; we should, in the next place, be careful to keep up that sense, by a constant and daily worship of him. For the sake of God and our own soul, we must not neglect our prayers. We cannot expect God to bless us if we do not make conscience of daily paying our tribute of honour and worship. We must therefore be constant in our private devotions; as we every day receive renewed pledges of God's love and goodness in various instances, so every day our affection and gratitude should be expressed to him by hearty prayer and thanksgiving. This is absolutely necessary, if we would preserve a hearty sense of religion on our minds. Those who have families should consider themselves as heads and governors of a society: the first notion of a society being that of a family. Every family is a little kingdom, and every kingdom ought to be a great family. And is it natural or decent that there should be any society on earth not to own and worship God? And yet I fear there are great numbers of families in this kingdom, wherein God is not so much as named, unless to affront him by cursing and swearing. With just reason we complain of the great looseness, profaneness, and irreligion of the age. I doubt much of this is owing to the masters of families: would they take more care to have their children and servants worship God, we should have it otherwise; but if we give our domestics the opportunity of seeing our bad qualities, and afford them none to learn our good ones, how can we expect they should have any sense of religion? They know we offend God by many rash words and sinful actions; but they do not see us repenting and asking God's pardon, by solemn prayers and applications to the throne of grace. Let us then be serious in this matter; and bring religion into our families, and there pay our common tribute of prayer and praise, for the mercies we daily receive. Our Saviour seemed to have respect to this duty, when he made that gracious promise, that where two or three are gathered together in his name, there would he be in the midst of them. And the very petitions of his own prayer are so contrived as to make it most proper for more than one, and which seems naturally to refer to the worshipping God in our families. But,

As we should not neglect to worship God in our closets and families, so it equally concerns us, to frequent the public worship of God in his own house; it being one of the greatest blessings and privileges we can enjoy. Let us then embrace all opportunities, not only on Sundays, but other days, of resorting to the public assemblies, and there join in our solemn sacrifice of prayer and thanksgiving: which, offered up with an honest devout mind, will find acceptance, and produce such effects as our closet prayers will not: there being certainly more promises made to public than to private prayers; not but both are good, and absolutely necessary.

And as I am now considering the means and instruments of religion, I cannot omit most seriously to recommend to you, the solemn observation of the Lord's day: I am sensible that some are too superstitious in this matter; and which proves rather a snare to men's consciences than of any service to religion. But to be nice and scrupulous about the Lord's-day service, is far from my intention to recommend. The laws of God and man in a great measure leave this to our own discretion and circumstances. However, thus much is certainly necessary, that every one who professes Christianity, ought to have a religious regard for the Lord's day, by devoting it to spiritual uses both public and private. It has been observed by some good men, and which I believe may be true, "that a man shall prosper much better in both his spiritual and temporal affairs, all the week after, for his careful observance of the Lord's day." And I am further persuaded, that those have little or no sense of religion, who make no conscience of sanctifying, or putting a difference between this and other days; for was there no divine command to have it appropriated to religious uses, which I believe there is, yet to do so, is both prudent and beneficial to mankind; since, besides the civil and temporal conveniences of it, we owe the very being of Christianity among us to the religious observance of this day. And it is worthy our observation, that the most profligate of both sexes, who by wickedness come to an untimely end, do generally impute their misfortunes to their breaking (as they express it) the sabbath day. Under this head, it will be proper to mention another duty, too much neglected, that of frequently coming to the holy sacrament. We can have little hopes of making any great progress in virtue and holiness, if we neglect this holy ordinance, which Christ hath appointed for conveying his grace, and enabling us to overcome our sins, to improve in virtue and goodness. Many indeed are the prejudices, though without reason, against this duty. But whoever designs honestly, and endeavours to lead a Christian life, may with as little scruple, come every month to the communion, as every week to church to say his prayers or hear a sermon. For whoever does not so live as to be qualified to approach the sacrament every month, week, or day, if there is occasion, I fear is not fit to come once in seven years. A due preparation depends not on setting aside some days, to put ourselves in a religious posture; but on the plain, natural frame and temper of our souls, as to their constant inclinations to virtue and goodness. A man that seriously endeavours to live honestly and religiously, may come to the sacrament at an hour's warning, and be a worthy communicant; whilst another who lives a careless, sensual life, shall set apart a week or a month, to exercise acts of repentance, and prepare himself for the communion, and yet not be so worthy a receiver as the other. Though even such an one may be also worthy, provided he is really honest and sincere in what he is about, and so remembers his vows, as not to return again into his former state of carelessness and sensuality.

I verily believe most of the doubts, fears, and scruples, that generally arise about receiving the sacrament, are without any ground or good reason; and therefore I am of opinion, that every well-disposed person, who has no other design in that action but to do his duty to God, to express his belief and hopes in Jesus Christ, and his thankfulness to God for him, may as safely come at any time to the Lord's table, as come to church to say his prayers. And if so, how culpable are they, who, having so many opportunities, seldom or never join in this solemn institution, which was designed on purpose to be the means of our growing in grace and virtue, in love to God and the world? If then we have any serious regard for our souls, and are truly sensible how much we want the grace of Christ, to lead a life pure and holy, I persuade myself we shall not be strangers at the Lord's table.

And let me recommend to you not a means or instrument of being good, but a principal virtue itself, at all times useful and in season; and that is to walk in love, to study peace and unity, and live in all dutiful subjection to government; endeavouring to promote the public happiness and tranquillity, and not to disturb the public peace, under any pretence, or abet those that do; especially not to make a rent or schism in the church, upon a mere point of state. In all ages, and countries great revolutions have frequently happened. But it was scarce ever known for Christians to separate from the church on that account. They still kept unanimously to their doctrine and worship, and no otherwise concerned themselves in the turns of state, how great soever, than peaceably to submit to the power in being; and heartily to pray to God, so to prosper their government, and direct all their affairs, that all their subjects might lead quiet and peaceable lives under them, in all godliness and honesty. And when in any revolution, a prince was advanced to the throne, that was a good man, and one who would encourage the true religion; in such case they not only readily submitted to him, but acknowledged it as a great blessing of God, for to raise up such a governor to rule over them. This was the notion, this the practice of the primitive Christians, nay of the Christians in all ages, in matters of this nature; and whatever some may think to the contrary, this is the doctrine of the church of England.

Let me then persuade those who profess Christianity, to answer those obligations to a holy life, which their religion lays upon them. We call ourselves Christians, and should be much offended if any denied us this title. But if we are so, let us make good our profession, by a suitable life and practice. We profess to entertain the doctrine of the gospel, to be taught and instructed by the best master, to be the disciples of the most perfect institution in the world; to have embraced a religion, which contains the most exact rules for the conduct of our lives, lays down the plainest precepts, sets before us the best patterns and examples of a holy life, and offers us the greatest assistances and encouragements to this purpose. We are furnished with the best arguments to excite us to holiness and virtue; we are awed with the greatest fears, and animated with the best hopes to the practice of it. And whoever makes such a profession as this, obliges himself to live answerably, and not to contradict it, or act contrary to what he professes. For with what face can any man continue in the practice of any known sin, who believes the holy doctrine of the gospel, which forbids all sin, under the highest and severest penalties? Did we but regard the laws of Christianity as we do the laws of the land; were we but persuaded that fraud and oppression, lying and perjury, intemperance and uncleanness, covetousness and pride, malice and revenge, the neglect of God and religion, will bring men to hell as certainly as treason and felony will bring them under the sentence of the law, this would have a great tendency to keep us from sin; and if the gospel has not this effect upon us, it shows that we do not truly believe it.

If we profess ourselves Christians, it may justly be expected that we should evidence this by our actions, and not live as the heathens did, who walked in the lusts of the flesh, and of uncleanness; who were intemperate, cruel, and unmerciful. But let us, who profess Christianity, whenever we are tempted to any vile lust, remember and consider what title we bear; by what name we are called, whose disciples we are; and then say, shall we allow ourselves in any impiety or wickedness, who pretend to be endued with that grace of God, which teaches us to deny ungodliness and worldly lusts? Shall we cherish any sinful passion, who have put off the old man with all his evil deeds? If by our lives and actions we contradict that religion which we profess, we thereby prove ourselves hypocrites; and that we have taken up our religion for a fashion, or merely out of custom. So that the reason why we are Christians, instead of Jews, Turks, or heathens, is, because we are born in a Christian country, and that religion came first in our way.

A Christian does not pretend to have more wit or understanding than a Turk or heathen; but he professeth to live better than they, to be more chaste and temperate, more just and charitable, more meek and gentle, more loving and peaceable than other men. If he fails in these, what signifies all the noise and stir about the gospel and doctrine of Christ? If a man professes himself a Christian, and doth not live better than others, he is a mere pretender in religion. And how great a scandal must this needs be to our blessed Saviour and his gospel? The impieties and vices of professed Christians have caused many severe reflections upon Christianity: for there is nothing can more disparage religion than a few and debauched life. This consideration ought greatly to affect us: for a Jew or a Turk is not so great an enemy to Christianity as a wicked and vicious Christian. Therefore, let me beseech Christians, as they tender the honour of their Saviour, and the credit of their religion, that they would conform their lives to the holy precepts of Christianity. And whoever are resolved to continue in a vicious course, they had better abandon their profession than keep a vizard, which can only frighten others from religion.—Many are apt to pity poor heathens, who never heard of Christ, and sadly to condole their case; but as our Saviour said on another occasion, weep not for them but let us weep for ourselves. There is no person so miserable as a degenerate Christian; because he falls into the greatest misery, from the greatest advantages and opportunities of being happy. Those sins which are committed by Christians under the gospel are of deeper dye, and attended with more heinous aggravations than those of heathens. And better had it been if we had never known the gospel, nor never heard of Christ, than, after embracing it, not to depart from iniquity.

Let these arguments prevail to awaken men to a serious consideration and real reformation of their lives; let them oblige all who call themselves Christians, to live up to the fundamental laws of our religion; to love God and our neighbour; to do to every man as we would have him do to us; to mortify our lusts, subdue our passions, and sincerely endeavour to grow in every grace and virtue, and to abound in all the fruits of righteousness, which are, by Jesus Christ, to the praise and glory of God. This indeed would become our profession, would be honourable to religion, and remove one of the greatest obstacles to the progress of the gospel. For if ever the Christian religion be effectually recommended, it must be by the holy and unblameable lives of its professors. It would then look with so amiable a countenance as to invite many to it; and carry so much majesty and authority, as to command reverence from its greatest enemies, and make men to acknowledge that of a truth we believe in God, and by our lives adorn the doctrine of Christ, and glorify our Father which is in heaven.

—And hath brought life and immortality to light through the gospel.

By life and immortality is meant, in scripture, that immortal life which our Saviour hath brought to light, or given us assurance of by the revelation of the gospel. For though all men by the light of nature, have some apprehensions of a future state, yet their reasonings about it, when left to themselves, are vain and uncertain, often very wild and extravagant. The best discourses of the heathens, and the wisest philosophers, about another life, were weak and obscure, doubtful and conjectural; nor even in the books of Moses and the prophets are there contained any plain express promises of life eternal. The knowledge men had of it was very dim and imperfect; till the Sun of righteousness appeared; till God was pleased to send from that invisible world, his own most dear Son to live and converse amongst men, in order fully to discover this unknown country, and to conduct us in the only true way to this everlasting happiness; an happiness too great for words to express, or our faculties to comprehend. And yet so much of it is clearly revealed in the gospel, as is abundantly sufficient to raise our thoughts, and excite our sincerest endeavours to obtain it.

By this plain revelation of a future state of immortality, is most illustriously manifested the transcendent goodness and indulgence of our most merciful Creator, in that he will graciously reward our imperfect services and mean performances, with glory so immense, as eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, nor can it enter into the heart of man to conceive the greatness of it. All we can do bears no proportion to such an ample recompence. Our best actions, so far from deserving to be rewarded, stand in need of a pardon. All possible duty and obedience is certainly due to the author of our being; and should God have exacted this from us, on account of his sovereign authority over us as his creatures, we had been indispensably obliged to an absolute subjection to him; but that he should, besides, promise to reward our faithful obedience with life eternal, is a most wonderful instance of his infinite grace and goodness. By this revelation of immortal life, is farther demonstrated the exceeding great love of our blessed Saviour, who, by his death and perfect obedience, not only purchased pardon for all our past sins, and redeemed us from eternal misery, (which of itself was an unspeakable mercy,) but also merited and obtained for us an everlasting kingdom of glory, if we truly repent and return to our duty.

The minute value and efficacy of what our Saviour has done for us, appears in this; that by his most powerful mediation, he procured not only our discharge from punishment, but also inexpressibly glorious rewards for us on most easy and reasonable terms. This is what especially recommends Christianity to us, in that it contains such glad tidings, and offers such mighty arguments to engage us to our duty, as no other religion could ever do. For since hope and fear are the great hinges of all government, the most prevailing passions of human nature, what more agreeable can be proposed to our hope, than to be for ever happy in body and soul, and what more dreadful to our fear than everlasting misery? The utmost that can be said to men, in order to reclaim them from sin, and oblige them conscientiously to observe God's laws, is, that God hath appointed a day when he will call all men to an account for what they have done in this body; who will then reward the sincere faithful Christian with immortal glory, but punish the disobedient and impenitent with everlasting vengeance. And if men will not regard such powerful considerations, nor be concerned or solicitous about their eternal happiness or misery, what other motives are likely to prevail, so as to make any impression on them? For what can be proposed to the reasons and understandings of men, of greater weight and moment, than what shall become of them in a future eternal state? It shall be therefore my present business to apply myself with all possible plainness and seriousness to three sorts of persons:—To such as seem to doubt of this fundamental doctrine of a future state; to those who profess to believe it, but not heartily; and to such as do really and constantly believe it.

As to the sceptical disputers against religion, let us for once suppose, what they can never prove, that it is doubtful whether there will be another life after this; that all those notions of a judgment to come, a heaven and hell, are mere fables, the inventions of crafty politicians and designing priests; and that all good and virtuous persons have been miserably deceived with vain hopes and fears, and given themselves needless trouble about religion: now, granting all this, yet if we would act prudently, and consult our own safety, nothing is more evident than that we ought to believe and live, as if all these doctrines of religion were most certainly true; because every wise man would run as little hazard as possible, in a concern of so much consequence, and where a mistake must be fatal. Let such therefore consider, how little detrimental it will be to him, who believes and acts according to these principles, should they at last prove false; and what extreme desperate hazard he runs, who doth not believe nor live according to them, should they happen to prove true.

He who believes and acts agreeably to these principles, should they prove false at last, only loses some present gratifications and enjoyments which he denies himself. He indeed crosses the irregular inclinations of his nature, and avoids those excesses which are really hurtful to him; he lives up to the dignity of his nature, is possessed with cares and fears about another world, which the atheist is not wholly free from; and strictly ties himself up to several rules and duties, and perhaps is exposed to some hardships, reproaches, and sufferings for the sake of religion; which is the worst of his case. But then he is at present blessed with a contented life, with peace of conscience, and the joyful expectation of an eternal reward hereafter; and if in the right, he is made for ever. Or should he be mistaken, his condition will however be no worse than other mortals. All the trouble and pains he was at about religion, will indeed be lost; but if his soul does not survive his body, he will never be sensible of it, nor can the disappointment be troublesome to him, when he goes where all things are forgotten. So that a virtuous religious man may, for the generality, pass his days here more easily and comfortably than any wicked person, and please himself with the hopes or dreams of future glories; and which, if no other than mere fancy, will yet sufficiently recompense any self-denial it puts him upon. In short, if these things at last prove true, then he will be inexpressibly blessed and happy; or, should they be only false and vain hopes, and that there is no other life after this, yet it will be as well with him as with the atheist, in the supposed state of eternal silence and insensibility. All the hazard he runs is, to lose some forbidden pleasures, which in most cases is best for them to be without, even as to this life. If the doctrine of a future state is false, yet he who lives religiously is safe; but if true, he is infinitely happy.

But let us now consider the extreme and desperate hazard which that man runs, who does not believe and act according to these principles, should they at last prove true; for then he ventures the loss of whatever is good and desirable, and of being for ever miserable. Perhaps, nothing would sooner convince such men of their stupid folly, than sometimes to ask themselves, when calm and sober, a few such questions as these:—What though I have endeavoured to persuade myself that religion is no more than a melancholy dream, a political cheat, a common error; yet, should it be true at last, how dismal, and of what dreadful consequence will such a mistake be? What amazing, surprising thoughts, fears, and despair, will attend me, if, when my friends have closed my eyes, I should find myself immediately conveyed into the company of those spirits which I had before denied, and into the presence of that God whose existence I had impudently denied? What horror and confusion must it create, when my infidelity shall be confuted by such a woe-ful experiment, and I find myself suddenly carried to that endless state, which I would not here believe any thing of ? Were the arguments on both sides equal, yet the hazards run are not so ; since the one is the chance of being for ever happy, the other of being eternally miserable. Which one consideration fully justifies the discretion of a religious man, in renouncing and despising the glories and pleasures of this world, even though it was uncertain whether there is another life after this. But of what great madness must they be guilty, who reject this doctrine of another life, against many fair probabilities, good reasons, nay, certain demonstrations of its truth ; when there is as great evidence in favour of it, as the nature of the thing will admit. When God hath most plainly revealed it from heaven ; when this revelation is confirmed by all the signs and testimonies that we can reasonably expect and require ; and when he hath implanted in the souls of men, such lively apprehensions of it, as that they must suffer violence to their own minds, before they can force themselves to disbelieve it. For I verily think, was the most desperate sinner to labour and struggle ever so much, to subdue and extirpate this natural persuasion of another life, that yet, after all his pains, he would not be able totally to remove the thoughts and fears of it.

I proceed now to reason with those who, though they profess to believe an immortal life, yet do it not really and heartily ; and this I fear is the case of most Christians. But let me ask such, these following questions :—What is the reason that the promise of eternal life, so immense in itself, should so little influence men, and make their endeavours so faint and languid after it ? Are any temporal things so valuable as the glories of heaven, or any evils here so dreadful as the miseries of hell ? This none can pretend ; because the good or evil of this life is of short continuance, but that of the next is durable and eternal. Or, why are Christians so cold and indifferent about the momentous concerns of another life, as if it was of no importance to them ? This can be no otherwise accounted for, but that men do not heartily believe what they profess, or not duly consider it.

Most men, whatever they profess or pretend, or however they may deny it, are not sincerely persuaded of the certainty of a future state ; their understandings not being rationally convinced of this truth, the belief of it is not firmly rooted in their minds. Indeed, was God to gratify the expectation of some men, and indulge us with the sight of these future glories and miseries which are revealed in the gospel, this might perhaps prevail to convince and reform mankind. Would he give us a view (though but short and transient), of that blessed place where he ever lives, to behold for a few moments the perfect happiness of those blessed souls who are admitted into his beatific presence ; or would he open the gates of hell, and permit us to look into that dismal receptacle of wicked spirits, to be eye and ear witnesses of their sad torments, despair, and misery ; such a sight perhaps might possibly reform and make us to be what God requires. But God's ways are not like our ways, nor his thoughts like our thoughts. He governs us in a method suitable to our rational natures, and gives us such assurances of another life, as are abundantly sufficient to satisfy and convince men ; but yet so as that it may be resisted by those who resolve not to believe it. For if the rewards of religion had been present to our senses, there could have been no trial of men ; no difference between the wise and considerate, and the foolishly wicked. God will not force a faith on us, but requires it as a matter of choice, an instance of our virtue. There is no faith in believing what we see ; such believe not God, but their own eyes. But blessed are they who have not seen, and yet believe. The things unseen which God hath revealed, ought to have the same effect as if the other world was visible to us. And as the principles of religion, which concern another life, are not things to be seen, we can only be assured of them by proper arguments and testimonies, about which we must use our reason to judge the force of them, before we can be really convinced by them. Nor is this difficult ; it only requires such serious attention of mind, to examine with care and diligence the evidences of a future state, as men commonly use in other affairs, when they would find out the truth. But the generality of professed Christians are so far from being convinced of the truth of religion by rational arguments, that very few of them ever inquire into the reasons of their belief. Their faith is solely owing to education, and the examples of others, or embraced without any consideration of the grounds and reasons of it. And then no wonder, if a truth thus received without any rational conviction, and so weakly founded, should have but little force or power on men's minds. This is not the faith which our Saviour requires, or that God will accept from those who are capable of acquiring a better. A Mahometan hath as good reason for believing the Alcoran, as such a Christian hath for the belief of Christianity. One great reason therefore of the inefficacy of men's faith is, that their belief of the principles of religion was never well rooted and fixed in their understandings.

But if we are rationally convinced of these truths, and yet our belief is not effectual to reform our lives, the reason of this must be, that we do not really consider them. The understanding hath not such an absolute power over the will, as necessarily to determine it to what is best, for our wills may stubbornly refuse the clearest evidence and strongest reasons, if what is proposed be contrary to our fleshly and worldly lusts. A man's will is moved by the understanding to obey its dictates, so is it also most importunately solicited by our appetites and lusts to gratify their several desires and propensities. Hence a great conflict often arises between the truths of religion, which are proposed by our understandings, and such things as proceed from our inferior sensitive faculties; our lusts being checked and crossed by the hopes and fears of another life, tempt us to deny the principles of religion, and with all their power strive to oppose the entertainment of them in our minds. Thus it was with the Jews when our Saviour was on earth; they could not resist those undoubted testimonies which he gave of his being the Son of God; but yet the love of this world, or fear of sufferings, so far prevailed over their wills, as to prevent their becoming his disciples. Though many of the chief rulers believed on him, yet because of the Pharisees they did not confess him, lest they should be put out of the synagogue. For they loved the praise of men more than the praise of God. It is not therefore enough that the truths of religion subdue our understanding by the evidence of reason, but they must also conquer our wills and affections before they can have any lasting effect on our lives. Till our belief hath powerfully wrought on our love, hope, and fear, it can have but little influence on our actions. The way to obtain this consent of our wills and affections to any truth proposed by our understandings, is often most seriously to consider the immense greatness of the happiness afforded to us; the extremity of the misery threatened; how dreadful our condition will be, if we carelessly neglect to provide for it; and how infinitely the glory of heaven surpasses all the pleasures of this life. If we represent and fix in our minds such things as these, it will by degrees so captivate our wills and affections as to make us regard and value this future happiness as our greatest good, and to avoid eternal misery as the greatest evil that can possibly befall us. The concerns of eternity are of such infinite moment, that if we do but patiently attend to, and freely think about them; if we will not suffer our lusts to bias our judgments, or stifle these principles of religion, they will at last awaken our conscience, and prevail above all temptations. And when our faith, by frequent and serious consideration on these important concerns, hath conquered our minds and wills, then will our actions naturally follow. For men will live and act agreeably to what they love, desire, hope for, or fear. So effectually hath Christianity provided for the happiness of men, that nothing can make us miserable, but either not believing, or duly considering the great arguments of religion.

I beg leave to represent the different behaviour of men, as to our Saviour's promises concerning another life, by this plain similitude:—Suppose a person of great power and authority should make us this offer, that if we would follow him, and entirely resign ourselves to his government, he would safely conduct us to a certain country, where we should possess whatever our hearts could wish, be made kings and princes; enjoy all manner of health, riches, and honour, and every thing that could contribute to our pleasure and satisfaction; and who would give all the security any reasonable man could require, that what was thus promised, should be faithfully performed: but that some among us, not regarding the offer, nor any reasons or arguments he can urge, either through prejudice to his person, or dislike to the conditions, will yet reject him as a deceiver and impostor; such as these are the atheists and infidels. Others, though convinced that all this may be true, not having any just reason to doubt of it; yet they are so pleased with their present circumstances, as not to exchange them for such hope; these are the fond lovers of this world. Others are willing to go to this place, but they would fain live here as long as possible, and when they can stay no longer, are glad to be conveyed to this happy country: these are them who defer their repentance to a death-bed. But there are a few others, who, entirely relying on this person's promises, and preferring them to all present enjoyments, do readily forsake their own concerns, and absolutely resign themselves to his direction; and if in their passage they meet with any dangers or difficulties, cross winds or storms; though this may fill them with doubts and fears, yet they resolve to proceed and venture all: these, and only these, are the true believers. When the consideration of another world is become our most prevailing interest, and the main principle that governs our lives, then is our faith true.

To pretend to believe this great doctrine of a future eternal state, and not to govern ourselves by this persuasion, is the worst folly which a reasonable creature can be guilty of. It was the observation of a great man, "that the strangest monster in nature was a speculative atheist," "one who denies the being of a God and a future state, excepting one, and that was the practical atheist, who professed to believe both, but lived, as if he thought there was neither." Indeed the difference between them is not great; for as the atheist winks at, or rushes blindfold upon eternal ruin, so the wicked believer runs madly upon it, with both his eyes open.

All that remains is, to address those who sincerely and constantly believe this great truth of another life, who not only assent to this doctrine with their understandings, but make this future happiness their ultimate concern. To these much need not be said; their faith alone will always teach them what to do. He who hath this eternal state ever present to his mind, is fortified against all the temptations of this world, either as to the sufferings of this life, or the being enticed by any of its alluring charms and enjoyments. When the soul by faith views that place where his God and Saviour lives, how mean and contemptible, vile and sordid, will all things here below appear? Faith looks beyond this present scene of life; it beholds this world dissolved, all the glory and pomp of it vanishing; and this curtain being drawn there appears a new world to his view, wherein are joys, pleasures, and honours, substantial and eternal; the prospect of which lessens his esteem for all things temporal. This faith will inspire and animate us with such courage and resolution, as to make us despise all difficulties and dangers, and to think eternal happiness to be a sufficient amends for any pains or trouble to procure it. This conquers the love of life itself, which, though most deeply implanted in our natures, yet those who have been endued with this faith, have not counted their lives dear to them, so that they might finish their course with joy. The exploits and achievements of faith, may be seen at large in the 11th chapter to the Hebrews, for the encouragement of all true believers. But yet far greater and more stupendous are the triumphs of faith, recorded of the holy lives and patient deaths of the blessed apostles, primitive martyrs and confessors, who with invincible constancy endured pains and torments, being only assisted by the grace of God, and a lively faith in his son Jesus. They rejoiced and sang praises in the midst of scorching flames, they took joyfully the spoiling of their goods, and gave God thanks that they were counted worthy to suffer for his name; and doubtless God's grace with the like faith would produce in us the same effects, and enable us to do or suffer any thing with the same joy and resolution. Such a faith will fill the soul with constant peace and satisfaction; so that a good man may delight himself with unseen pleasures, which the worldly man knows not any thing of: this makes him content with whatever is here allotted him, and to be very little concerned about the affairs of this life. He chiefly converses with invisible objects, and therein finds that solid and lasting comfort, which all things temporal can neither give nor take away. This faith cheers his spirits under all calamities and afflictions; and when wearied, or not pleased with the impertinence of this life, he can entertain his mind with those ravishing joys that will never cloy nor satiate. This faith will arm a good man against the fear of death, and strip that king of terrors of all that is dreadful; who considers it only as God's messenger to knock off his fetters, to free him from an earthly prison, and to conduct him to a place of eternal bliss and happiness. All this and much more will a sincere and hearty faith effect; it will afford us a foretaste of this immortal happy state, give us in part an entrance into heaven, and at last the complete enjoyment of it.

Let it then plainly appear by our words and actions, what our faith and hope is; and that we walk by faith, not by sight or sense. Sense is a mean low principle, confined to this world, and can extend no farther than to things present and visible. But the just live by faith; they govern their actions not by what they see, but by what they believe and hope for, looking beyond this life for such things as are eternal. Let us not be ashamed of this our design before men; but whatever they think of us, let us resolve to be for ever happy, and to use this world as if we were shortly to leave it; so to improve our time, as to remember it will be soon swallowed up in eternity. And blessed be God, who hath set before us such mighty hopes, given us such glorious promises, made such a plain and clear revelation of this eternal life, by Jesus Christ, and by him taught us the true way of obtaining it; who, having suffered for our sins in our nature, entered into the highest heavens, to prepare mansions of glory for all his faithful followers.

The Certainty of our Resurrection proved.

1 COR. XV. 35.

But some men will say, how are the dead raised up? and with what body do they come?

AFTER St. Paul had firmly established the truth and reality of our Saviour's resurrection from the dead, he proceeds to infer from thence the certainty of our own resurrection. If Christ, says he, be preached that he rose from the dead, how say some among you, that there is no resurrection of the dead? But if there be no resurrection of the dead, then is not Christ risen. That is, "it can no longer seem impossible or incredible that God should raise the dead, since you have so plain and certain an example of it, in the person of our Lord, who having been truly dead and buried, is now alive, and hath appeared unto many, with the visible marks of his crucifixion still remaining on his body: and the same power which raised Jesus from the dead, is able also to quicken our mortal bodies."

When the apostle preached unto the Athenians, concerning the resurrection of the dead, the philosophers mocked at him, and entertained his doctrine with contempt. Indeed it was one of the last things the heathens received into their belief, and is yet the greatest objection against Christianity. How are the dead raised up, and with what bodies do they come? are questions that almost every one is ready to make, especially those who love to cavil at religion. I shall, therefore, from these words, shew, that the resurrection of the dead, even of the very same body which died and was buried, contains nothing in it impossible or incredible. And then observe what difference the scripture makes between a glorified body and this mortal flesh.

The most common received opinion amongst Christians is, that, at the last day, we shall rise again with the flesh in which we died. Most of the ancient fathers did believe and teach, that at the general resurrection men would be restored to the very same bodies which were laid in the grave; and that as our Saviour Christ arose with his former flesh, bones, and limbs, so likewise shall we at the resurrection. That the primitive Christians did generally believe and expect that they should at the resurrection rise again with the very same bodies, in which they lived on earth, evidently appears from the heathen's malice and envy towards their dead bodies, which they would reduce to ashes, and then scatter and throw them into the air and rivers, thinking thereby to defeat their hopes of a resurrection. Such of the ancient Christians as defended or explained this article of the resurrection of the dead, had generally recourse to such principles and arguments to suppose the very same body, flesh, and members to be raised again, that the soul animated in this life; and, in truth, this is the most plain and easy notion of a resurrection. For nothing dies and is corrupted but the body; the soul goes upward and returns to God; and therefore nothing can be properly said to be raised again, but only that very body which died and was corrupted. If at the last day God gives a new body to our souls, that cannot literally be called the resurrection of our bodies; since the most proper and useful signification of the word is, that the same flesh which was separated from the soul at death, should be again vitally united to it.

The scripture in many places assures us, that the very same flesh shall be raised again. I will not insist on the words of Job, that though worms destroy his body, yet in his flesh he should see God; because I cannot think the primary and original meaning of them doth at all relate to the resurrection, but a plain prophecy of his own deliverance, and an high expression of his confident hope in God, that he would vindicate his innocence, and bring him out of all his troubles. But there are several other texts in the New Testament more applicable to the present occasion. As when St. Paul tells us, that this corruptible shall put on incorruption, and this mortal shall put on immortality; meaning the body we now live in, which shall one day lie down in the dust. And the scripture, describing the places from whence the dead shall rise, plainly intimates, that the same bodies which died shall revive again. Thus we read, that they who sleep in the dust of the earth shall awake, some to everlasting life, and some to shame and everlasting death. The metaphor of sleeping and awaking, by which our death and resurrection is here expressed, seems to imply, that when we rise again, our bodies will be as much the same as those we lived in, as they are when we now awake from sleep. Again, all that are in the graves shall hear his voice, and come forth; they that have done good, unto the resurrection of life; and they that have done evil, unto the resurrection of damnation. And the sea gave up the dead which were in it, and death and hell (that is the grave) delivered up the dead that were in them, and they were judged every man according to their works. But if the same flesh shall not be raised again, what occasion will there be to ransack the graves at the last day? The sea can give up no other bodies than what it received; nor the grave deliver up any but those that were laid therein. And was it not necessary, that we should rise with the very same bodies, the graves need not be opened, but we might rest there for ever. St. Paul also tells us, that our Saviour shall change our vile body, that it may be fashioned like unto his glorious body; which can only be meant, that this our present body of flesh and blood shall be restored to life again.

If we consider the several instances and examples of those, who either immediately ascended into heaven, or after death were restored again to life, they all seem to confirm this opinion, that we shall rise at the last day with the very same flesh and blood which we had here. Enoch and Elias were translated to heaven in their terrestrial bodies. And they whom our Saviour recalled to life, or rose with him at his resurrection, appeared in the very same bodies they had before their dissolution. These being the examples and types of the general re-sururrection, ours therefore must resemble theirs; and we must also appear at the last day with the same bodies we lived in here. Even our blessed Saviour, who was the first fruits of them that shall, raised his own body, and appeared to his disciples with the very prints of the nails in his hands and feet, and with all the other marks of his crucifixion: Behold my hands and my feet; says he, that it is I myself; handle me and see, for a spirit hath not flesh and bones, as ye see me have. From whence it seems to follow, that in our resurrection, we shall be conformable to our Saviour's, and resume the very same bodies that were laid in the sepulchre.

Lastly, the ancients have urged for a proof of the resurrection of the same body, that the exact justice and righteousness of God requires it. Since God's justice, which consists in the equal dispensation of rewards and punishments, will seem much obscured, at least not so illustriously manifested and displayed to the world, unless the same body of flesh be raised again; that as the body was partner with the soul in all her actions, whether good or evil, so it should hereafter share with her in rewards and punishments; it being but just that the same body which sinned should be punished; and that the very flesh which pleased God, should at the last day be exalted to glory, and receive a just recompence of reward, for whatever hardships and trouble it underwent here. Having thus evinced the resurrection of the same body, I shall proceed to shew that there is nothing in this impossible or incredible.

"God can distinguish and preserve unmixt from all other bodies each man's particular body, when dissolved into dust and atoms, however distantly dispersed, and recollect and unite them together; because God is infinite in wisdom, power, and knowledge. He can tell the number of the stars, and call them all by their names. He measures the water in the hollow of his hand, metes out the heavens with a span, and comprehends the dust of the earth in a measure; he numbers the hairs of our heads, and not so much as a sparrow falls to the ground

"without his knowledge:" and is it incredible, that such an infinite understanding should distinctly know the several particles of dust into which the bodies of men are mouldered; that he should observe the various changes they undergo, and plainly discern to whom they belong? Can it be thought impossible, that he who at first formed us, in whose book all our members are written, from whom our substance was not hid when we were made in secret, and curiously wrought in the lowest parts of the earth; should not again know every atom whereof our bodies are composed? If any curious artist knows every pin and part of a machine that he makes, so as, when taken in pieces, he can distinguish one part from another, and readily assign to each its proper place, and exactly dispose them into the same figure and order they were in before; can we suppose that the almighty Architect of the world is ignorant of and unacquainted with the several parts and materials of which this our earthly tabernacle is framed and composed? At the first creation of the world, all things lay confused, in a vast heap of rude and indigested chaos, till by the voice of the Omnipotent they were separated and framed into those distinct bodies, whereof the beauty and excellent order of the world doth now consist; and why may not the same power, at the consummation of all things, out of the ruins and rubbish of our corrupted bodies, reduce them to their proper places, restore them to their primitive shapes, and frame them into the same individual bodies they were parts of before?

But it may be objected, that it often happens for the bodies of men to be devoured by the beasts, fishes, and other animals, which are afterwards eaten by men, and converted into the substance of their bodies; and in some places even for men to feed on human flesh; whereby the substance of one man's body becomes part of another's; and then how can both rise at the last day with the very same bodies?

To which I answer, that the body of man does not always continue in the same state, or consist of the same matter; but is perpetually spending and renewing itself, every day losing and gaining new matter. This is undeniably certain from experience. For so much as our bodies grow, so much new matter is added to them, over and besides the repairing of what is continually spent. And after a man comes to his full growth, he usually wastes and carries off, by insensible perspiration every day, in proportion five parts to eight, of what he eats and drinks. So that every man must change his body several times in a year. Indeed, the bones do not change so often as the fluid and fleshy parts of the body: but they also change, because they grow; for whatever grows is nourished and spends, or otherwise it would not want repair. If the matter of a man's body, which he had at any time of his life, be raised, it is as much his own, and the same body, as that which he had at his death, and generally much more perfect. Besides, it is a very small and inconsiderable part of what is eaten and descends into the stomach, that turns into nourishment: the far greater quantity going off by excretions and perspirations. Or if it did not, to what a vast monstrous bulk should we grow to in a few years? So that was the body of a man eaten by cannibals, very little of it would pass into the substance of their bodies. Or was it more, there cannot be so much as is before gone from the same man's body. If a man lives thirty or forty years, his body hath undergone many new repairs in that time, and yet in the sense of all mankind, it is the same body. Suppose a corpulent man to fall into a gradual consumption, must this man at the resurrection have no more of his body than he had when at the hour of his death? Would it not then be the same body, if made up of the parts it had at the beginning of his consumption? If it be, then the same holds as to other times of his life. And consequently this objection of cannibals devouring men, is of no force to destroy the possibility of the resurrection.

Perhaps it may be thought by some, unworthy of God to concern himself about such trifling matters, or inconsistent with his ease and happiness, to mark and observe all the particles of dust into which the several bodies of men are dissolved, so as exactly to distinguish and preserve each entire and unmixed, and at last restore them to their old bodies.

It is the greatest excellency and perfection of the divine Providence to extend itself even to the least things, so that nothing is exempted from its care and influence. To imagine the government of the world is a burden to God, is to entertain very mean conceptions of him. Because we are of such weak and frail natures, as that a little business and employment soon tires us, does it therefore follow, that to direct, order, and govern the several affairs of this world, must give trouble and interruption to the infinite pleasure and happiness of almighty God?

Our dust being thus preserved and collected together by God, he can easily remake and rebuild the same bodies which were dissolved. That this is possible must be acknowledged by all who believe the history of the world's creation, as to God's forming the first man Adam out of the dust of the ground. For if the body of man turns to dust after death, it becomes what it was originally; and surely the same power that first made it of dust, may as easily remake it when reduced into dust again. Nor is this more wonderful than the formation of an human body in the womb; yet of this we have daily experience, though as great a miracle, as extraordinary an instance of divine power, as the resurrection of it can possibly be. And was it not so common a thing, it would be thought incredible, that such a beautiful fabric as is the body of man, consisting of nerves, bones, flesh, veins, blood, and other parts, should be produced as we see it is. Why then is it not as easy to believe it shall hereafter be rebuilt, when crumbled into dust? Had we only heard or read of the curious formation of man, it would have been as natural for us to have asked "how are men made, and with what bodies are they born?" as now to inquire concerning the resurrection, how are the dead raised up, and with what bodies do they come?

When God hath raised again the same body out of the dust wherein it was dissolved, he can enliven and make it the same living man, by uniting to it the same soul and spirit which did formerly inhabit there. That this is possible we have several undoubted examples thereof, in those whom the prophets, our blessed Saviour, and his apostles, raised from the dead. Even our Saviour himself, after he was dead and buried, rose again and appeared unto his disciples and others, to whom he was known; who had clear evidence and conviction that he was the same person they had seen expire on the cross. Well therefore might St. Paul say, why should it be thought a thing incredible with you, that God should raise the dead? To raise our bodies from death is not so great an act, as first to create them. If God, by the word of his power, could make the heavens and the earth of no pre-existent matter, why should we doubt but that the same God by his mighty power can also raise to life, those who, though dead, do not cease to be? For although we cannot answer all the difficulties and objections which the sceptics, wicked and prophane, make against this doctrine; nor can we exactly discover how our bodies will rise, or the nature of them; yet this ought not to weaken our belief of this most important article of our Christian faith. It is sufficient that an almighty being, to whom nothing is impossible, hath solemnly promised to raise our mortal bodies after death to life again. Let such therefore as despise, oppose, or object to this doctrine, try their ability on the common appearances of nature; let them rationally explain things that daily happen, before they disbelieve a resurrection, when Omnipotency stands engaged to perform it. Do they know how their bodies were framed, fashioned and curiously wrought? Can they give a satisfactory account of this glorious structure, their bodies, and the several parts thereof; consisting of members, blood, heart, veins, arteries, and nerves? Or how the body came to be fenced with bones and sinews, skin and flesh? When they can answer these and other difficult questions, concerning the formation of their own body, it will be then time enough to solve all the objections and difficulties about the resurrection of it. But if to do this, they must have recourse to the infinite power and wisdom of the First

Cause, the sole Governor and great Sovereign of the world; why should they doubt but that the same power can quicken and enliven that body when rotten and returned to dust, which it first formed? Let us therefore not perplex ourselves about some difficulties which arise concerning this doctrine of the resurrection; for it is no absurdity to suppose an infinite power can effect such things as seem impossible to our finite beings; but rather let us believe what God hath revealed concerning it. I proceed

To consider the difference which the scripture makes between a glorified body and this mortal flesh. Our conceptions of a future state are indeed very dark and imperfect; all we know of it is from the scriptures, which describe it either by representing the several evils and inconveniences we shall be freed from; or by comparing the glory that shall be revealed, with such things as are here most admired and esteemed. Hence it is called an inheritance, a kingdom, a throne, a crown, a sceptre, a rich treasure, a river of pleasures, a splendid robe, an exceeding eternal weight of glory. Not that the happiness of another world consists in outward joys and pleasures: but these things being here most coveted and desired, are made use of to represent the transcendent blessedness of a future state, though of a different nature, and infinitely surpassing the greatest happiness of this world. They are only little comparisons to help our weak apprehensions; but we shall never know the glories of the next life till we enjoy them. For though from the description the scripture gives us of another world, we may frame a confused idea of it, yet we shall never have a complete notion thereof till we enter into it. However enough is revealed concerning our future happiness, to raise our thoughts and affections above the fading beauties and flattering glories of this world; to make us sensible how mean and unsatisfying all human pleasures are, to excite and engage our most earnest endeavours to attain it. For the scriptures inform us, that our bodies at the resurrection, will be raised immortal and incorruptible, glorious and spiritual.

At the resurrection our bodies will be immortal and incorruptible; for this corruption must put on incorruption, and this mortal must put on immortality. Though the bodies of the damned will be raised immortal and incorruptible, because intolerable pain and misery will be their portion for ever; yet these words do farther signify to the blessed an exemption from all bodily evils, and whatever is penal, afflictive, or uneasy to us. Were we at the general resurrection to receive the same frail bodies again, subject to the miseries we now suffer, no considering person would willingly take it again; he would rather it should rot in the grave, than be bound fast to all eternity to such a cumbersome clod of earth; for such a resurrection is more like a condemnation to death again, than a resurrection to life. The best we can say of this earthly house of clay, the tomb and sepulchre of our souls, is, that it is a building which will soon be dissolved and tumble into dust; that we shall not always be confined to this doleful prison, but in a little time be delivered from this bondage of corruption, be disengaged from this burden of flesh, and admitted into the glorious liberty of the children of God. Alas! what frail brittle things are these bodies of ours? How soon are they disordered and discomposed? To what number of diseases, pains, and infirmities are they continually liable? How doth the least distemper disturb our minds, interrupt our ease and rest, and make life a burden? If any part of our body suffers pain, what torment and anguish doth it create; or, when our bodies are well and in health, yet to what labours and perfect drudgery must we submit to serve their necessities, to provide for their subsistence, and supply their wants; to repair their decays, to preserve and keep them in health? How are we forced every night to enter into the confines of death, if not to cease to be for a time, yet at least to slumber away many hours without any useful and rational thoughts; and this only to keep in repair those carcasses of clay, and enable them to perform the labours and business of the ensuing day? In short, so long as these frail, weak, and dying bodies, subject to so many evils and inconveniences, are so closely united to our souls; we cannot possibly expect much ease, rest, or happiness in this life. Our hope and comfort therefore is, that in a little time we shall be delivered from this burden of flesh; when God shall wipe away all tears from our eyes, and there shall be no more death, sorrow, crying, nor pain; when we shall hunger nor thirst no more; neither see nor feel the light of the sun; for the Lamb, the Son of God shall feed us, and lead us unto living fountains of water.

O when shall we arrive to those happy regions, where we shall enjoy constant and uninterrupted pleasure both of body and mind, and be never more exposed to any of those evils and inconveniences, to which we are liable in this state of pilgrimage? where we shall live the life of angels; and be clothed with spiritual glorious bodies; neither subject to those weaknesses and decays, nor want that daily sustenance and continual recruit which our present bodies cannot subsist without. That perfect and complete happiness, which all good men shall enjoy in the other world, consists in having a mind free from all trouble, and a body exempted from all pains and diseases. Thus will our mortal bodies be raised immortal; they will not only by the power of God be always preserved from death, but their nature will be totally changed and altered, so as not to retain the same principles of mortality and corruption; for they cannot, says our Saviour, die any more. Our bodies will also be raised in glory. Then shall the righteous shine forth as the sun in the kingdom of their Father. Our heavenly bodies will be like the glory and splendour of the sun. For Christ will fashion our vile bodies like unto his glorious body; the splendour of which we may conceive, by the visions of St. Peter at the transfiguration of our Saviour, whose face did shine as the sun, and his raiment was white as snow. Some imagine that the excellency of our heavenly bodies will chiefly arise from the happiness of our souls; whose felicity will be and appear in the brightness of our countenance, illustrating them with beauty and splendour.

Lastly, at the resurrection we shall rise with spiritual bodies, but not of a spiritual substance, for that is a contradiction? it being impossible for it to be both a spiritual and bodily substance. Spiritual is here opposed, not to corporeal, but to natural or animal; signifying thereby, the subtilty and purity of our heavenly bodies. In this state our spirits are forced to serve and attend on our bodies: but in the other world, our bodies shall wholly serve our spirits, minister to, and depend upon them; a natural body is fitted for this lower, sensible, earthly world; a spiritual body is suited to a spiritual invisible state, to live like saints and angels in heaven. This flesh is one of the greatest and most dangerous enemies we have; for it continually tempts and solicits us to evil; it rebels against reason, and is ungovernable; the law in our members wars against the law in our minds, and brings us into captivity to the law of sin; and when the spirit is willing, the flesh is weak. We are now in a state of warfare, and must be always on our guard, continually arming and defending ourselves against the assaults of the flesh, and all its impetuous motions. How doth it hinder us in all our religious duties? How soon are our minds tired, when employed in any divine or spiritual meditations, and how easily diverted from such noble exercises? Well therefore, might St. Paul so mournfully complain; O wretched man that I am, who shall deliver me from the body of this death? Why! even death will do this; that will give us a full and final deliverance. When once we arise unto life, we shall no more feel those struggles of the spirit with the flesh, which are now so troublesome and uneasy to us. Our flesh will then cease to torment and tease our souls with evil inclinations, immoderate desires, and unreasonable passions; but being spiritualized, purified, and free from all earthly affections, it will become a fit and proper instrument of the soul in all her divine and heavenly employments; it will not be weary of singing praises unto Almighty God to all eternity; it will want no respite or refreshment, meat or drink, but take an infinite delight in doing the will of God. In these things chiefly consists the difference between this mortal flesh and our bodies at the resurrection. I shall now make a few inferences tending to practice.

And the best way to prepare ourselves for those heavenly spiritual bodies, which shall be bestowed on us at the resurrection, is by continually cleansing and purifying our souls from all fleshly lusts, and by degrees weaning ourselves from all earthly and sensual pleasures and delights. We must refine our affections, raise and exalt them in the contemplation of things above; we must take off our hearts, and leisurely disengage them from what is present and sensible, in order frequently to think of and converse with things spiritual and invisible: that so soul and body may here in some degree be acquainted with those objects, or spiritual delights and pleasures, which will hereafter be presented to us. A soul wholly immersed in this earthly body is no way qualified for those celestial and glorious mansions which God hath provided for us. An earthly sensual mind is so captivated with bodily pleasures, as to be incapable of relishing or enjoying such as are spiritual, though infinitely greater and more to be preferred. But if we subdue and mortify our carnal inclinations, we shall thereby fit and prepare ourselves for another state. When our souls are thus spiritualized, they will soon grow weary of this flesh, and long for their departure; they will be ready and glad to go hence, that they may live and abide in a body suitable to their rational and spiritual appetites.

From hence also we may give some account of the different degrees of future glory. For though all good men shall have glorious bodies, yet they shall not be all equal in glory. They shall all shine as stars, and yet as one star differs from another in glory; so also is the resurrection of the dead. Some will have more bright and resplendent bodies than others. Those who have done their Lord eminent and extraordinary service, who have bravely and courageously suffered for his name; or who, by the constant exercise of severity and mortification, have arrived to a greater measure of purity and holiness than others, shall shine as stars of the first magnitude. The purest and most spiritual bodies will be given to the most heavenly and spiritual souls. And this surely is no small encouragement for us diligently to proceed in the ways of virtue and piety; since the more we wean ourselves from sensible objects and things present, the more glorious and heavenly will our bodies be at the resurrection.

Let these considerations then engage us patiently to bear those afflictions, sicknesses, and bodily pains, with which we are exercised in this life. Let us hold out a little longer, for the time of our redemption draws near; when our tears shall be wiped from our eyes, and we shall sigh nor sorrow no more. We are now pilgrims and strangers travelling towards the heavenly Canaan, and must therefore expect to struggle with many straits and difficulties; but when we arrive to our journey's end, that will make amends for all. We shall then be in a quiet safe harbour, out of the reach of those storms and dangers that here surround us; we shall then be at home in our father's house, no more exposed to those inconveniences we now are subject to. And let us not forfeit all this happiness only for want of a little more patience and constancy; but let us hold out to the end, that we may receive an abundant recompence for all the trouble and uneasiness in this our passage, and be instated in rest and peace, perfect and eternal. Let these considerations in particular arm and fortify us against the fear of death; for death is now conquered and disarmed, and cannot hurt us. It indeed separates us from the body for a while, but this only in order to our receiving it far more pure and glorious. Let us therefore no longer profess this hope of the resurrection unto life; or else with more courage expect our own dissolution, and with greater patience bear that of our friends and relations. Let us not fear to go down in the house of rottenness, to lie in the dust; for when God destroys this house of clay, he will raise it again infinitely more splendid and glorious. Let us take care so to live, as that we be worthy to obtain the other world, and the resurrection from the dead. Let us in a moral sense, rise from the death of sin to the life of righteousness, and then the second death will have no power over us. Since therefore we have this comfortable hope of a glorious resurrection unto life eternal; let us purify ourselves from all filthiness of flesh and spirit; let us hold fast our profession, and steadfastly adhere to our duty, whatever we suffer here; knowing we shall reap if we faint not. Let us be steadfast, unmoveable, always abounding in the work of the Lord, forasmuch as we know that our labour will not be in vain in the Lord.

ON THE RELATIVE DUTIES.

On the Duties of the Married State.

EPHES. V. 33.

Nevertheless, let every one of you in particular, so love his wife even as himself; and the wife see that she reverence her husband.

THE apostle's principal design, in this epistle to the Ephesians, is, to deter these new converts from all those corruptions that reigned in the heathen world, and exhort them to that purity of life and manners, enjoined by the gospel: that they should put off, concerning the former conversation, the old man, which is corrupt according to the deceitful lusts; and be renewed in the spirit of their mind, putting on the new man, which after God is created in righteousness and true holiness.

Many of the deities worshipped by the heathen world, were the greatest monsters of iniquity and uncleanness that ever were heard of. And therefore it is no wonder if these worshippers thought there was no evil in those actions, which were authorized by the example of their gods. Nay, on the contrary, forasmuch as all religion directs us to the imitation of what we adore, hence it came to pass, that the most flagitious and monstrous impurities were not only practised, but enjoined, enjoined as necessary rites of adoration, and actually performed in their very temples. And as this was the practice in many other places, it was remarkably so at Ephesus, (whither this epistle is directed,) as we are assured by Strabo and Athenæus. And therefore the apostle's design, in this epistle, is to reclaim his converts of that city from those abominations to which they were before devoted.

And in order to do this, he gives them to understand, that the God they were now taught to worship, was a Being of infinite perfection and purity; and therefore, to make their adoration acceptable to him, they must put off their former pollution, and imitate his purity: they must put off the old man, which is corrupt according to the deceitful lusts; and put on the new man, which after God is created in righteousness and true holiness.

For, however the guilt of their former corruptions might be alleviated from the ignorance in which they were then involved, yet were they now, from the advantage of better information and instruction, altogether without excuse, if they committed the same enormities. For, saith he, Ye were sometimes darkness, but now are ye light: but fornication and all uncleanness, let it not be once named among you, as becometh saints. For this ye know, that no whoremonger, or unclean person, hath any inheritance in the kingdom of Christ and of God.

And soon after this, the apostle subjoins the duty of husbands and wives; the duty of submission and respect in the one, and of love and tenderness in the other: modestly implying, that a religious regard to the matrimonial contract was the most natural and rational method of avoiding those sensual corruptions, into which the heathen world was sunk. And when he hath shewn, that the original union of one man with one woman was an emblem of the mystical union of Christ and his church, he adds, Nevertheless, let every one of you in particular, &c. That is, but whatever this mystery may be, however, setting aside the mystery, let every one of you in particular, so love his wife even as himself; and the wife see that she reverence her husband.

Having thus explained the occasion and intent of these words, I now proceed, from them to lay down to you the duties of the married state.

I shall begin with the husband's duty to his wife. And this may be reduced to these three heads; love, fidelity, and support.

First, Husbands are to love their wives. And this they are engaged to do, from all the natural and moral motives that can influence a rational creature.

And, first, it is observed, that an equality is necessary to the establishment of an entire affection and friendship in life. For this reason, tyrants and slaves are no more to be tied together in the bands of love, than an ass and an elephant can be harnessed under one yoke. Equality is necessary to union; and therefore love is observed, either to find all persons equal, or to make them so. This the great Author of our nature well knew, and therefore he created the first pair perfectly equal; and, to express this equality, as divines observe, he formed Eve from Adam's side: the woman was taken from that part, rather than from any other, either higher or lower, to signify, that she is neither her husband's mistress, nor yet his slave: that as she is not to insult, so she is not to be insulted; but to be treated upon a foot of natural equality, with affection and regard.

Again, Union is necessary to love; to have the same desires and aversions. For this reason God Almighty made the first pair of one flesh. And Adam said, this is now bone of my bones, and flesh of my flesh; she shall be called woman, because she was taken out of man.

And this natural union of the first pair was but an emblem of that moral and mystical union, that was to be established between all succeeding pairs, that should be joined together in the holy state of matrimony to the end of the world.

And hence it is, that when Adam had declared his sense of this union that joined him to Eve, he adds, as from himself, (yet most evidently by divine appointment,) therefore shall a man leave his father and his mother, and shall cleave unto his wife; and they two shall be one flesh: signifying, that the bonds of marriage should from that moment be more powerful than the bonds of a shameful and corrupt course, read Solomon's reflections, read the observations of the wisest of mankind, upon the danger of such a conduct, and the sure ruin that awaits it, in the 6th and 7th chapters of his Proverbs.

To keep you from the evil woman, from the flattery of the tongue of a strange woman, lust not after her beauty in thine heart, neither let her take thee with her eye-lid. Can a man take fire in his bosom, and his clothes not be burnt? Can one go upon hot coals, and his feet not be burnt? So he that goeth in to his neighbour's wife, whosoever toucheth her, shall not be innocent. And surely it is full as certain, that he that goeth in to a polluted prostitute, whosoever toucheth her, shall neither be innocent nor unhurt; but doth in truth take fire into his bosom, almost in a literal sense.

Again, saith the wise man, Whoso committeth adultery with a woman, lacketh understanding. He that doth it, destroyeth his own soul. A wound and dishonour shall he get, and his reproach shall not be wiped away. Nor is either the wound or the reproach less certain in the commerce of a mercenary harlot. The arts with which these wily creatures lie in wait to deceive and to destroy the thoughtless unwary part of mankind, are most admirably set forth in the 7th chapter of the Proverbs; where, after the wise man hath described the lewd woman's shameless allurements at large, he then adds the sure ruin of the simple one that was caught by them. With her much fair speech she caused him to yield; with the flattering of her lips she forced him; he goeth after her straitway, as an ox to the slaughter, or as a fool to the correction of the stocks; till a dart strike through his liver; as a bird hasteth to the snare, and knoweth not, that it is for his life. Hearken unto me now therefore, O ye children, and attend to the words of my mouth. Let not thine heart decline to her ways, go not astray in her paths. For she hath cast down many wounded; yea many strong men have been slain by her. Her house is the way to hell, going down to the chambers of death.

And although vicious liberties are commonly regarded as less criminal on the side of the man, yet in reality, and in the sight of God, it is not so; because the obligation to fidelity is equal, is exactly the same, on both sides. And therefore the same apostle that tells us (1 Cor. vii.) that the wife hath not power over her own body, but the husband; tells us also, in the same place, that the husband likewise hath not power over his own body, but the wife.

It is true the reputation of families is more concerned in the chastity of the wife; but, on the other hand, the interest and well-being of families is, for the most part, more concerned in the chastity of the husband; because he hath it more in his power (generally speaking) to destroy the fortune of the family by vicious extravagance in this point than the woman hath; and actually does so, in twenty instances to one. And therefore, however men may be indulged in corruptions of this kind, from the liberties of a looser education, and from the worst title in the world, the privilege of a long practice in sin; perhaps too from the partiality of human laws; yet are they, both from the law of nature and the law of God, under equal ties of fidelity with the wife, and under equal guilt from the violation of it. And thus we know, that no whoremonger, or unclean person, hath any inheritance in the kingdom of Christ, and of God. And therefore, let no man deceive you with vain words; for, because of these things, cometh the wrath of God upon the children of disobedience.

The last duty of the husband is to support and maintain his wife; and this ariseth from the consideration of their being one flesh. Therefore the apostle tells us, that men ought so to love their wives as their own bodies: he that loveth his wife, loveth himself. For no man ever yet (saith he) hated his own flesh, but nourisheth and cherisheth it, even as the Lord the Church.

From hence it appears, that the same obligations that are upon you, for your own support and nourishment, engage you also to the support and nourishment of your wives. And this is accounted the more direct and immediate duty of the husband, because the administration and management of the fortune is (generally speaking) in his hands; that being, by the divine appointment, his province; as being better fitted by nature for the fatigues and hurry of life; and for the most part endowed with a greater strength both of body and mind, to enable him to make a proper provision for his family. I say for the most part, because there are many particular instances where this care rests chiefly upon the wife, when she is found blessed by Almighty God with better talents for those purposes. But, generally speaking, the business of the woman is the care of her house and family, to relieve the man from the fatigue of domestic concerns; and to be in this respect a help-meet for him; and to see that what he provides is prudently managed, and carefully preserved.

And thus I have gone through the several duties which the husband owes to the wife, viz. love, fidelity, and support.

SERMON CXIII.

EPHES. V. 33.

Nevertheless, let every one of you in particular, so love his wife even as himself; and the wife see that she reverence her husband.

I PROCEED now to the duties of the wife; and these are, love, fidelity, and obedience.

First, She is to love her husband; and that upon the same principles, and for the very same reasons, that he is to love her.

First, Because they are one flesh; for this cause shall a man leave father and mother, and shall cleave unto his wife; and they two shall be one flesh. And in truth they are joined together upon terms of as entire and thorough a communion, as if they were one soul, and one body: and secondly, because their interests are in all respects perfectly the same, which is the truest foundation of friendship. The husband's happiness naturally tends to make the wife happy at the same time; and his misery, to make her miserable; his riches make her rich; and his poverty makes her poor. It is always their interest to wish and avoid, to desire and to detest, the same things; and surely to have the very same interest, the same desires and aversions, to be happy in each other's happiness, and miserable in each other's misery, are the strongest engagements, and the surest foundations of entire friendship, and perfect affection, that can possibly be imagined.

Secondly, She is to be faithful to him; and as the reasons of fidelity are the same both in the husband and the wife, the crime of infidelity is more shameful and scandalous in the woman; because it is committed against the rules of a more reserved and virtuous education, and against the natural decency and modesty of the sex; and, at the same time, is of far worse consequence to the honour of families, because it brings a lasting stain of infamy along with it: and, what is worse than all this, it often robs the heir of his inheritance, and substitutes a spurious offspring into his place; an injury that is the more to be dreaded and avoided, because, when once it is committed, it is impossible to be repaired.

Thus much, however, may be said in honour of that sex, that this crime is less frequent among them; and rarely committed till the husband's infidelity, or ill conduct, hath first provoked to it. And this is the true reason why the infidelity of the wife reflects so much scandal and dishonour upon the husband, because (generally speaking) his own vices and ill conduct have brought the evil upon him. And therefore the only true way of securing your own reputation in this point, as well as your wife's virtue, and the honour of your family, is to behave yourself with so much fidelity and tenderness towards her, as may entirely engage her affections, as well as her conscience, to you and you only.

And indeed, let any man reflect seriously upon the treatment the generality of wives meet with from their husbands, and then think impartially, whether they have not too much reason to be provoked at their rudeness and neglect. Before marriage they are adored and preferred before all the world; but soon, very soon after, they are slighted and disregarded, as if they were unworthy of common esteem; and they are slighted for the very same reasons for which they should be respectfully and tenderly treated. They observe, at the same time, that their husbands can still treat other women with respect and complaisance; and that other men still continue to use them with respect and complaisance, and none but the husband slights and despises them; as if marriage, which is the strongest engagement to tenderness and affection, were but a privilege for contempt and rudeness. This is in truth provoking; and I am satisfied, the generality of those women who have been so unhappy and so wicked as to violate the marriage vow, have been provoked to it by the rudeness and neglect of their husbands, or urged to it in revenge of their prior falsehood.

It is not indeed to be imagined, that men should treat their wives with the same reserve and formal complaisance after marriage; that the freedom and ease of friendship forbids: but why friendship and freedom should be a reason for ill treatment, I must own I cannot conceive. I am sure they should be reasons of a very different conduct; and I believe there is not a righter rule in life, or of more importance for the preservation of friendship, than this, never to let familiarity exclude respect.

But, after all wives that are so unhappy as to be too much provoked by the ill-treatment of their husbands, should always remember, that their husbands' guilt doth not justify theirs; and much less will neglect or rudeness in the husband justify infidelity in the wife. There are arts of decency and good behaviour which have inexpressible charms; and if a woman can but have constancy enough to practise these, and to continue in well-doing, they are almost irresistible; and it is scarcely possible to imagine any husband so brutal as not to be at last reclaimed by them. And women would be more solicitous to reclaim their husbands in this manner, by a course of good behaviour, if they considered that in so doing they consulted their own real interest, and the interest of their children; and greatly recommended themselves and their concerns to the favour and protection of Almighty God; and at the same time saved a soul alive. Whereas the contrary behaviour can tend to nothing but the utter ruin of their children, and their own mutual destruction, both of body and soul.

The next duty a wife owes her husband is assistance; that is, aid, comfort, relief, and support, in all the anxieties and exigencies of life. And hence it was, that when Adam was created, God Almighty declared it not good for him to be alone; and therefore he adds, I will make him a help meet for him. And therefore such wives as think it beneath them to trouble themselves about low domestic concerns, that are above the care of their husbands and family, would do well to consider how they answer the end of their creation. Surely they cannot imagine they were made for no higher or nobler ends than to dress, or visit, or to be esteemed, like a statue or picture, for a fine shape, or a fair outside. Are these purposes worthy of infinite wisdom and goodness? No; God Almighty intended them not only for the support of society, but for consolation, friendship, and assistance; to be partakers of the husband's joys and cares; to lighten the labours of life, and increase all its enjoyments, by sharing in them. For, as cares are lessened by being divided, joys are increased by being communicated. And therefore what can be more desirable in life, than to have a prudent, a faithful, and an affectionate friend, who is perfectly in our interest, to alleviate all the evils, and increase all the happinesses that befall us? And to this purpose, God Almighty hath endowed the other sex, not only with more native tenderness, but likewise with a certain vivacity and gaiety of heart that bears up against misfortunes; or, at least, is not so long cast down under them, as men usually are. Their spirits are more light and volatile, and their imagination more sprightly; and this prompts them to think and speak a thousand agreeable things, which would never enter into the heavy heart of an anxious and thoughtful husband; and by that means inspires a cheerfulness which is not natural to him, and is a wonderful relief to the toils of life. And, without question, this is one great reason, why God Almighty hath endowed the other sex with a greater quickness and readiness of speech upon common occurrences, that the husband, upon his return into his house from the cares and labours of the day, might be entertained with cheerful accounts of his family affairs, and with agreeable inquiries into his own conduct; not without pleasing and proper reflections upon both. And therefore that disposition to discourse, which melancholy and morose husbands are wont to censure as troublesome and impertinent in their wives, is, in truth, an instinct most wisely and graciously appointed of Almighty God, for the relief and joy of the conjugal state; and life would (in endless instances) be an insupportable load without it.

What therefore women are concerned to do upon this account, is this; not to speak less than they are naturally inclined to do, but to endeavour to speak better than the generality of them are taught, or wont to do. It is not their business to check the instinct that God Almighty hath endowed them with, but to direct it, and make it answer its true end, the relief and delight of their husband and their household; whereas, when it is diverted from its right end, and degenerates either into impertinent garrulity, or into brawling and abuse, it forms one or other of the most hateful and unbecoming characters in life. And therefore Solomon rightly observes (Prov. xxi.) that it is better to dwell in a corner of the house-top, than with a brawling woman in a wide house. That is, it is better to be confined to one spot on the top of a house, exposed to all the injuries of the weather, than enjoying all the advantages of shade and shelter, to be exposed to the assaults of a boisterous tongue. And again, it is better to dwell in the wilderness, saith he, than with a contentious and angry woman; that is, it is better to be banished the society of mankind than be confined to such society as that.

Now there are two things required of women, in order to make their conversation agreeable; the first is, the ornament of a meek spirit, without which no other ornament will become them. And this, the apostle assures us, is in the sight of God of high price: nor is it less so in the eyes of men. The next is, that they endeavour to furnish their minds with a store of useful observations, for the conduct of life, from competent knowledge of the manners and history of the world, a thorough acquaintance with the holy scriptures, a particular and exact study of their husbands' inclinations and interest, and a careful inquiry into the economy and good government of their family; and this, joined to a fund of virtue and good humour, will rightly direct their natural instinct, and make their conversation equally agreeable and useful; will give them new and lovelier charms, when those of youth and beauty are long since wasted and decayed.

And here I cannot but reflect with concern, upon the unhappy methods which have obtained in the world in relation to the education of women. One of the first things that takes possession of their minds, is, the hopes of a husband; but how to become a faithful friend, and an agreeable amiable companion in the married state, are lessons rarely taught, and more rarely learnt. Superficial and showy accomplishments are indeed inculcated with sufficient care; but how to acquire solid worth and useful knowledge makes, for the most part, but a small part of parental solicitude. By this means a woman becomes every thing to a husband, but what she should be; a social friend and an useful assistant. Forgetting that the interest of all men makes that one essential part of the character of a good wife, laid down by Solomon, (Prov. xxxi. 26.) that she openeth her mouth with wisdom, and in her tongue is the law of kindness. That is, as she hath acquired habits of prudence and discretion from study and observation, so she hath made it a fixed rule to herself, not to be imperious or presuming upon her knowledge; but rather to make it a reason of constant cheerfulness and good humour, together with a ready, a rational, and an affectionate assistance in every exigency and on every occasion; in her tongue is the law of kindness. And surely wisdom, so seasoned and sweetened, is amiable and delightful beyond expression. And therefore this character is crowned by Solomon with that noble encomium, many daughters have done virtuously but thou excellest them all. That is, many other women may be as virtuous; but virtue thus recommended, virtue that is adorned with all the graces of prudence and good-humour, is virtue in its highest and loveliest perfection; thou excellest them all. And again, Favour is deceitful, and beauty is vain, but a woman that feareth the Lord, she shall be praised. That is, the regard that ariseth from colour and complexion is transient and unsteady; beauty is deceitful; a fair face may cover a deformed mind, and is at best a short and uncertain recommendation; but piety and virtue are sure and lasting perfections, which will always entitle the woman that is blessed with them to eternal veneration and esteem.

But further, a good wife is, in many instances to do yet more than this; she is not only to relieve her husband under his household cares, by the goodness of her humour, and sprightliness of her conversation; but she is likewise to lighten those cares, by dividing them with him, and bearing her part in the burden. And therefore the least that is to be expected from a wife, is, that whilst the husband is busied abroad, or in affairs that call off his attention from the care of his family, that care be supplied by her; and this constitutes the true character of a good wife; at least that part of it which is of principal and most universal use in life.

The care and good economy of a family is a business of a very distinct nature from that of making a provision for the support of it; the care of providing for a family, for the most part, resteth upon the husband; because that is a business of more labour and fatigue than women are ordinarily able to undergo; but then the administration of what is so provided, is the woman's province: thus is the labour of life divided; and if either fail in their proper business, the affairs of the family are in a ruinous way. And upon this is founded that known observation, That a man must ask his wife whether he shall be rich; forasmuch as few men are able to take sufficient care both abroad and at home; and foreign care will be of small use, if the domestic be neglected. And therefore it is, that Solomon, in the character of a good wife, (Prov. xxxi. 11.) tells us, that the heart of her husband shall safely trust in her, so that he shall have no need of spoil. That is, she will manage his household affairs with so much prudence and fidelity, that her husband shall need no indirect methods of fraud or oppression to support her luxury and extravagance. Again, he tells us, (v. 27.) that she looketh well to the ways of her household, and eateth not the bread of idleness. Indeed he adds many other circumstances of great industry; such as her rising up by night, and plying the spindle and distaff, and providing clothes for her husband and family; but these being circumstances of industry peculiar to a country life, and better adapted to the simpler ages of the world, when trades were not sufficiently settled and distributed into their distinct classes, I think them not necessary to be insisted on in this place.

Now, as the care of the house and family is the immediate and direct duty of the wife, it is evident this duty cannot be discharged, if she be addicted to rambling and going abroad, and do not delight to dwell with her family; and, indeed, a disposition to running abroad, and neglecting the care of her household, is an argument of a light and vain mind; and is made by Solomon, a mark of the most infamous character among women; for, when he describes a vicious woman, in the tire and habit of an harlot, he tells us, she is loud and stubborn, her feet abide not in her house. And therefore all women that would be deemed modest and virtuous, should avoid this character of neglecting their husbands and their homes, as a piece of ill conduct, that will lead them into many others; and such as seldom end but in infamy and ruin.

Solomon hath observed, that the ant is a fine emblem and example of industry; and the observations of modern naturalists have made this emblem yet more instructive to us in the distribution of the conjugal care. The male ants, they tell us, are at a certain age furnished with wings, to facilitate their acquisition of food: whereas this advantage is denied the females, inasmuch as their province is the distribution of what is acquired.

Another principal and very important branch of the wife's duty, is the education and care of her children. For the business of the father being for the most part without doors, and the man being from education and use less fitted for the lower cares that are due to children; having also less leisure to employ that way; having less gaiety to cheer and enliven their humours, and less natural tenderness to relieve all their little wants and afflictions; having, from nature, a stronger propensity to sullenness and silence; and being upon that account less fitted to gratify the eager curiosity of children, in their endless enquiries after every thing that is new or unknown to them; for these reasons, and upon all these accounts, the early education of children rests almost entirely upon the wife; and she is in truth, by nature, much better fitted for it.

And, in order to qualify her for so great a trust, upon which the well being of every family, and consequently of the whole world, doth so greatly depend, it is requisite that her mind be rightly formed, by a thorough acquaintance with the scriptures, and some few useful books of devotion, to humility and meekness; to temperance and diligence; to humanity and charity; and, in one word, to all the virtues of a social and a christian life. And besides all this, it is necessary that she be furnished with a competent knowledge in the employments and accomplishments proper to each condition and age in life, that so she may be capable of directing her children how to employ their time agreeably and usefully, and conduct them gradually to virtue and goodness by her practice, as well as her precepts. And although the mother's principal business be the education and care of her daughters, yet her sons also claim their part of instruction and improvement at her hands; forasmuch as they remain some years entirely under her tuition; and the goodness of their mind and manners depends mainly upon the first impressions they receive; upon the first formation of them to knowledge, and virtue, and piety.

And however mothers may in these ages be thought unequal to such a task, they were not anciently so esteemed of, but were remarkably successful in the education of some of the greatest men of antiquity. Thus 't is well known, that Cornelia the mother of the Gracchi, and Aurelia the mother of Cæsar, had a principal hand in forming those men, who were the glory of their age; and we have yet left an excellent lecture to king Lemuel, (with good reason believed to be Solomon,) which his mother taught him.

Indeed the case is now in a good measure altered, from the present course of education, which (as it respects the better sort) depends mainly upon a knowledge and a mastery in the learned languages, which women do not ordinarily attain to; but then, on the other hand, it ought to be remembered, that virtue and good sense are to be learnt in every language. And forasmuch as morality and religion are now much better understood than they were in the heathen world, the instruction of children, in all the important duties of life, is now a work of much less difficulty than it anciently was.

And that mothers may be the better enabled to go through with this great task of education, it is absolutely necessary, as I before observed, that they be perfectly well acquainted with the holy scriptures, so as to be able to apply all the precepts of them to all the duties in life; to every purpose, and every occasion that shall offer; and also to be well versed in the most useful and approved treatises that have been published upon the subject of education; such as those of Mr. Locke and the Archbishop of Cambray. And this is the true way for all mothers to entitle themselves to that real veneration and sincere esteem from their children, and from their husbands, which completes the glorious character of Solomon's virtuous wife so often mentioned, Her children rise up, and call her blessed; her husband also, and he praiseth her.

And thus having gone through the several branches of that assistance the wife owes to her husband, in order to make her an useful and agreeable helpmeet for him, I now proceed to the last instance of duty she owes her husband, to wit, obedience.

Man and woman were at first created perfectly equal. For although there are some passages in St. Paul's epistles which imply a superior dignity in the man, yet are there none that infer a superior authority, or right of dominion, on his part, before the fall. And indeed, when Adam and Eve were yet in their innocence; when their understandings were clear, and their wills upright; when their interest and inclinations were in all respects the same; and pride and vanity had introduced no competition of superiority between them; there was not the least need of giving either of them power and authority over the other: because the greatest pleasure either of them could be capable of, in that condition, was to do every thing that they knew would be most acceptable to the other; and consequently there was no need of power or command, or force, to oblige either of them to do what either of them desired. But when the woman sinned, through a vain desire of knowledge, and possibly from a vain hope of being superior to her husband, in the only point that gave him pre-eminence over her, it pleased God to punish that vanity in a disappointment of the very end it aimed at; and to make that very desire of pre-eminence a reason of subjection; decreeing, that from thenceforward her desires should be referred to the will and pleasure of her husband, either to reject or comply with them, as he thought fit. As you may read, (Gen. iii. 16.) And thy desire shall be to thy husband, and he shall rule over thee.

And indeed the same desire of pre-eminence, is, for the most part, the cause of their subjection to this day. There are few women of tolerable discretion, that might not entirely preside in their families, or at least be perfectly at ease, under the government of their husbands, if they did not too apparently affect to rule. And this, as it is exceedingly imprudent, and the occasion of almost all the disquiets that distract the married state, so is it, in truth, immoral and irreligious: since they are expressly commanded in the scriptures to submit and be obedient to their husbands; as you may read, (Eph. v. 22, &c.) Wives submit yourselves unto your own husbands as unto the Lord; for the husband is the head of the wife, even as Christ is the head of the church; and he is the saviour of the body. That is, as Christ and the church make one mystical body, of which Christ is the head; so man and wife make one body, of which the man is the head; and as Christ is the Saviour of the church, so likewise is the husband given to the wife, to be a saviour to her; to maintain, and protect, and defend her, and by his his superior prudence to provide for her well-being; and to conduct her in every instance of discretion and duty. But then, as the head hath no interest of its own, distinct from the rest of the body, nor any advantage over the other parts unless the care of directing and providing for them be deemed an advantage; so hath the husband no true interest separate from the wife, nor any advantage from his superiority, but the care and trouble that attends it. And therefore neither hath he any reason to pride himself upon his power, nor she to repine for her subjection: since a condition of subjection to a wise and good government, is, beyond all question, the happiest condition in life; and a lawless licentiousness would but put us into the power of every passion and every folly, to hurry or seduce us to destruction. And I must insist upon it, that it is in the power of most women, by prudence, gentleness, and sweetness of temper, to make the authority of their husbands a source of ease and happiness to both.

From hence it follows, that, as the authority of the husband is a rational authority, devolved upon him by God, for the direction, and preservation, and well-being of the wife; it should never be exercised but with that view, and that in an humane and rational manner; consequently, blind tyranny, and brutal force should be banished the society of reasonable creatures, and is contradictory to the very nature and end of the marriage union. So ought men to love their wives, saith St. Paul, (Eph. v.) as their own bodies. He that loveth his wife, loveth himself: for no man ever yet hated his own flesh, but nourisheth and cherisheth it, even as the Lord the church. Dominion was given to man, not for oppression and abuse, but for preservation and protection; on account of his superior wisdom and prudence. Let these then be the reasons and measures of his rule; otherwise he defeats the ends, of his dominion, and at the same time degrades himself from the dignity of his nature, and declares himself unworthy of the prerogative he is possessed of. And therefore St. Peter (1 Eph. iii.) directs the husband, to dwell with the wife according to knowledge, giving honour to the wife, as unto the weaker vessel. That is, making that superiority which God hath given you, a reason, not of insolence and abuse, but of humanity, and tenderness, and conjugal affection.

And Plutarch very beautifully to this purpose tells us, that husbands ought to preside over their wives, not with the same despotic power wherewith men dispose of their possessions, but with such a kindly sway as the soul rules the body; sympathizing, and, as it were, growing into one with it; united by all the ties of tenderness and affection. And since the dominion of the man seems to have been originally founded, by the divine appointment, in his superiority of wisdom; if his heart be set upon supporting his authority, his first care should be to support that superiority of wisdom upon which it is best founded. Wisdom is a natural claim to dominion, and wherever that is, authority and rule will wait upon it, especially when kindness and good-nature are added to it; for then it is irresistible: nay, in truth, kindness is oftentimes in itself, more powerful to the attainment of all our desires, than the utmost stretch of power can be. And this is finely illustrated in the fable of the sun and the north wind: a contest arose between these two powers, which of them should soonest oblige a countryman to throw off his loose coat; Boreas began, and storming with all his force, tumbled and tost the coat about the poor man's ears, but to no purpose; for the stronger he blew, the stronger the clown held, and the closer he wrapt his coat about him. When the wind was weary, the sun began, and play'd his cheerful beams upon him so successfully, that he soon melted him down into a kindly warmth, that made his coat not only useless, but troublesome to him: and so he quickly threw it off.

The fable is well known, and the moral of it obvious and I would earnestly recommend it to all married men and women, to remember, that when storming and raging are ineffectual to gain their ends, kindness and good-nature will seldom or never fail of success.

And thus I have gone through the several duties of the married state.

The duties on the man's part, I told you, were love, fidelity, and support; but, above all, fidelity, forasmuch as infidelity, for the most part, destroys the other two duties, and is the common cause of poverty, as well as contention and hatred. And therefore it is, that Solomon (Prov. v.) advises to remove far from the strange woman, lest strangers be filled with thy wealth, and thy labours be in the house of a stranger; and thou mourn at the last, when thy flesh and thy body are consumed; and say, how have I hated instruction, and my heart despised reproof, and have not obeyed the voice of my teachers, nor inclined mine ears to him that instructed me! and soon after he adds, drink waters out of thine own cistern; let thy fountain be blessed, and rejoice with the wife of thy youth; let her be as the loving hind, and pleasant roe; let her breast satisfy thee at all times, and be thou ravished always with her love. And why wilt thou, my son, be ravished with a strange woman, and embrace the bosom of a stranger? for the ways of man are before the eyes of the Lord, and he pondereth all his goings; his own iniquities shall take the wicked himself; and he shall be laden with the cords of his own sins. Remember the apostle's admonition. Remember, that as the wife hath no power over her own body, but the husband, so likewise the husband hath no power over his own body, but the wife. Nay, although your wives had not any power over your bodies, yet would you have no right to abuse and prostitute them to the purposes of vice. What, know ye not, that your bodies are the members of Christ? will ye then take the members of Christ, and make them the members of an harlot? God forbid. What, know ye not, that your body is the temple of the Holy Ghost, which is in you, which you have of God; and ye are not your own, for ye are bought with a price? Therefore glorify God in your body, and in your spirit, which are God's.

On the other hand, let the woman always remember, not only to be faithful to her husband, but agreeable, and observant; not querulous, not contentious; diligent in the care of her family, and the education of her children in the nurture and fear of the Lord; for this is the woman's justest and highest praise, both in the sight of God and man! Whose adorning, let it not be that outward adorning of plaiting the hair, and wearing of gold, and putting on gorgeous apparel; but let it be the hidden man of the heart, in that which is not corruptible, even the ornament of a meek and quiet spirit, which in the sight of God is of great price: despising the shewy outside of things, the paltry, the perishing vanities of this world, and being clothed upon in their stead, with the silent, the lasting, the invaluable ornaments of modesty, and humility, and piety, which are of eternal excellency! ornaments of irresistible charms, even in the eyes of men, as well as inestimable value in the sight of God.

And now, my brethren, if ye know these things, happy are ye, if ye do them. And surely ye would do them, if ye knew your own happiness. Brethren, how good and joyful a thing it is to dwell together in unity! to dwell together in an entire union of affection and interest; and in a perfect harmony both of heart and soul! forbearing one another in love, and keeping the unity of the spirit in the bond of peace; well knowing, that ye are tied down to an entire and perfect union, by all the natural engagements, and by all the moral and christian bonds, that can be imagined. And as your temporal interests are one, so also are your eternal. As ye are one body, so likewise are ye of one spirit, even as ye are called in one hope of your calling; ye have one Lord, one faith, one baptism, one God and Father of all, who is above all, and through all, and in you all.

To whom, in the union of the glorious and ever-blessed Trinity, be all majesty, and power, and praise, for evermore.

SERMON CXIV.

BY PATRICK DELANY, D. D.

The Duty of Parents to their Children.

PROV. xxii. 6.

Train up a child in the way he should go; and when he is old he will not depart from it.

ALL the wise men in the world agree, that the first impressions made upon us, in our tender years, sink the deepest, and last the longest. And therefore Solomon well directeth, that children should be carefully taught, as soon as they are capable of instruction, all those principles and duties which we would desire to have them practise throughout the whole course of their lives. If good precepts and principles are early impressed and fixed, they will be so many lights set up in the minds of children, to direct their conduct through this maze of life; to guide them in the ways of virtue and truth, and in the paths that lead to everlasting happiness. And although the giddiness of youth, and the blind impulse of unruly passions, should sometimes drive them out of their course; yet as soon as this tumult and infatuation is over, and the mind calmed to the dictates of reason, they will again return into the way they should go; and when they are old, they will not depart from it.

From these words, thus explained, I shall make it the business of this, and some following discourses, to lay down the duty of parents to their children, in all its parts; and this I shall endeavour to do, in the illustration and proof of the following propositions:

First, Parents are to take care of the health and constitution of their children.

Secondly, They are to give them good instruction.

Thirdly, They are to correct them in their faults.

Fourthly, They are to shew them good examples.

Fifthly, They are to make a proper provision for them, as far as they are able.

And, lastly, They are to pray to God for them.

First, Parents are to take care of the health and constitution of their children.

And this care should begin earlier, and extend further, than is commonly imagined.

It is a constant care in the culture of trees, to have a strict regard to the goodness and health of the stock you plant from ; because such as the stock is, such will the cyon be ; and the prudent husbandman exerts the same care, in relation to all the creatures, whose increase he is concerned in ; and would count it strange stupidity to breed from beasts that were either diseased or vicious : and with great reason ; because such as the sire or dam is, such, in all probability, will the issue be. And, if men be so much, and so justly concerned for the fruits of their trees, and the offspring of their brutes ; can it be a question, whether they should be much concerned for their own ? especially as it is of far worse consequence to bring a vicious man into the world, than a bad apple, or a vicious horse. And therefore all persons that intend to marry, should take particular care both of their body and their mind, to form both in such a manner, as that neither should be a source of evil to the world ; they should, above all things, take care not to become the founders of a vicious and an infected race. For this reason they are to take care to strengthen their bodies by temperance and exercise, and to abstain from all excess in eating and drinking, by which their health and strength may be impaired. And, above all, they are carefully to abstain from that vice, so common and so fatal to youth, for whose punishment God Almighty hath, in signal judgment, appointed so severe and dreadful a distemper ; a distemper of such distinguished malignity, and inveterate infection, that it descendeth to late posterity ; and is one of the chief, among those remarkable methods, by which God visiteth the sins of the fathers upon the children, to the third and fourth generation.

And as the body is to be disciplined to health and strength by temperance and exercise ; so likewise should the mind be disciplined to knowledge and religion.

by proper information and instruction, and by the practice of every virtue. Good habits should be acquired, and vicious habits removed and rooted up, with all possible diligence, before men become parents ; that they may not derive the guilt upon themselves, of having filled the world with a race of fiends and monsters : nor the curse upon their posterity of having evil constitutions and evil habits conveyed to them with their very being ; such habits as may make them very miserable in this world, and lead them to everlasting misery in the world to come ! forasmuch as it is well known, that the dispositions of the mind, like the features of the body, are conveyed down from father to son, and, as the common observation is, run in the blood ; and therefore the first duty that parents owe their children, is to convey health, and strength, and a good constitution of body and mind to them, as far as it is in their power so to do, by a proper care of their own health, and a conscientious abstinence from all excess and vice of every kind.

And when that is done, the next care they owe their children, is to provide for their health and strength, by proper nourishment.

The parents are not to think they have done enough, in bringing their children into the world in as good a condition as they could. That, although not the least, is however but the first part of their duty. The next is, to support the good constitution they have brought into the world, by proper nourishment, and care of their health. And to this purpose God Almighty hath impressed a strong instinct of love and tenderness for their young, upon all the creatures. And this love is attended with so much delight and complacency in the tender offspring, as is a natural relief and compensation for all the trouble of education, and even for the pains of travail ; agreeable to our blessed Saviour's observation, (John, xvi. 21.) A woman, when she is in travail, hath sorrow, because her hour is come ; but as soon as she is delivered of the child, she remembereth no more the anguish, for joy that a man is born into the world. And that women may have wherewithal to cherish this joy in their hearts, and to support these tender objects of their love with delight, God Almighty hath furnished them with breasts, filled with the most proper food in the world, for the nourishment of their young; and hath annexed a very uncommon degree of pleasure to the administration of it, and as uncommon a degree of pain and danger, to the withholding of it from the poor infant; so that this is as plainly a law of nature to all mothers, to suckle their own children, as it is possible to conceive any law to be attended with immediate rewards and punishments, as it is obeyed or transgressed.

As to the rewards that attend the observance of this law of nature, possibly few women that hear me, know any thing of that matter; as having never tried the natural pleasure there is in administering the breast to their own helpless infants; unless perhaps their physicians might, at some time or other, have prescribed it to them for a cure or recovery. But as to the punishment that attends the withholding of that nourishment from their issue, I do not doubt but that most mothers that hear me, may be sufficiently acquainted with it; since it is known, that repelling the milk by art, always occasions fevers, and a variety of other dangerous disorders, which often end in the death, and always in the danger, of the unnatural mothers; and not unfrequently make their lives miserable. And all these evils they endure to avoid the discharge of a delightful duty, which they owe to God, and to their own flesh and blood; and to which they are urged, by an innocent and exquisite natural delight, and by one of the strongest natural instincts in the world; so that we may apply to the women of our age that bitter complaint of Jeremiah, (Lament. iv. 3.) Even the sea-monsters draw out their breasts, they give suck to their young ones: the daughter of my people is become cruel like the ostriches in the wilderness.

This is one of the effects of that false politeness which hath undone the world. How much better would it become us to imitate the simpler manners of those seemingly rude nations, where all women think themselves indispensably obliged to this duty*, from the highest to the lowliest and think themselves sufficiently authorized in doing so, from the example of the brute world around them! It is true, this duty, as it is attended with much pleasure, so it is also attended with a good deal of care and trouble; but then it is so chiefly to the poor, who are forced to undergo it all themselves; and yet these are almost the only people that discharge it; and even these own, that the pleasure of it greatly exceeds the pain; and it is plain it must be so, both from the goodness of God, and the preservation of the creatures, which must otherwise perish. And this is clearly evidenced from the joy and complacency expressed by the poorest creatures, in the performance of it. And the reason of this is evident; the breast is one of the most nervous and delicate textures of our frame, and wonderfully fitted by the Author of our being, for those fine sensations which the soft and tender infant-organs, are as well fitted to produce; the natural consequence of which is, love, joy, and complacency in the instrument of that innocent happiness; and love makes toil not only tolerable, but delightful: and, if women of better condition would but once suffer themselves to be governed in this point, by the dictates of their duty, I am satisfied, that to them it would be doubly delightful! inasmuch as they could easily be relieved by the assistance of servants, from every thing offensive and vexatious in that parental office, and then, nothing would remain in the discharge of it, besides the natural pleasure that attends it: and this, without any regard to the joys of a good conscience, would be abundantly its own reward. Or, say it were not, where is there any duty in life, that is not attended with some uneasiness? and if that could excuse from the discharge of it, there would be no such thing as virtue in the world; merit and demerit, praise and dispraise, would be taken away from the earth! and then idleness and industry, courage and cowardice, would be reduced to one value; and temperance and chastity would be placed upon the same level with dissolution and drunkenness. And therefore if women have any regard to the discharge of duty, in a point of so great consequence, both to their own health and happiness, as well as to the health and happiness of their children, and the good of mankind; they are, in the ordinary course of things, indispensably obliged to nurse their own children at their own breasts, if they are fitted so to do, and their health will allow it. And how much more rational and eligible is this, than to expose them (as is now the common practice) to the neglect and cruelty, to the vices and distempers, of mercenary women, who have no regard to them, from any other tie but that of interest! And, forasmuch as they often find their account in the death of the infant, more than in its life and health, there is no question, but the prospect of those perquisites which attend a new nursing, often tempts them to many inhumane methods of getting rid of the incumbrance of one infant, to make way for another they expect more advantage from. And, on the other hand, if they find their account in the life of the present child, (as, God knows, their whole subsistence often depends upon it,) then are they too much tempted, never to let him die: I mean, to impose another upon you, when he doth. And, by this means, the spurious issue of idlers and vagrants, the dregs of stews and brothels, are substituted in the place of your own legitimate offspring, and divide the inheritance with the brethren; or perhaps come single, and alone, into the enjoyment of all that fortune, which you have toiled out your lives to gain; it may be, to the loss of your own souls. And, no question, but this is often the case, when the apparent children of good men, and good women, who have been well principled, and carefully educated, in the fear of God, betray such profligate, perverse, abandoned dispositions, as are no way to be accounted for, upon any natural principles, other than their being the secret issue of other parents, from whom they have derived the hidden seeds of so much villainy and corruption.

To all this may be added another motive of great importance to all mothers; the early engaging the tender affections of their issue in their favour, which is perhaps the best security of their duty. It is well known, that nursing hath a natural tendency, and (if either are not very abandoned) must, in some measure, create a mutual endearment between parents and their children, now too little seen in the world. Children are generally observed to retain an uncommon affection for such nurses as have treated them well, until they are laughed out of it; nor is it altogether without reason, that, in some countries, the being nursed upon the same breast, is thought a natural foundation of relation.

And thus much for the duty of mothers, in providing for the health and strength of their children by proper nourishment. I now proceed to the duty of the father; for neither is he exempt from his portion of the parental care, in this point, since it is equally his concern; and, therefore, as the immediate administration of nourishment is incumbent on the mother, it is the duty of the father to make a sufficient provision for her support in the administration of it; and, by all possible marks and methods of tenderness and good-nature, to relieve, and make her as happy as he can, in this most important article of the conjugal care. And this is no more than what instinct inspirith many of the inferior creatures to do. And, if naturalists rightly inform us, it is to this we chiefly owe all that harmony that fills our fields, and our groves, at the approach of spring; God Almighty having so appointed it, that the toil of incubation should be relieved by sprightly music; that, whilst the hen sits upon the eggs, she should be relieved under that painful and tedious confinement, by the songs of her mate; and where the male is not endowed with a power of relieving her toil in this delightful manner, then we are assured, he divides it with her; and is frequently seen to force her from the nest, that he may succeed to his portion of the trouble.

And, besides all this, where the care of incubation will not suffer the female to take her usual range in search of food, her mate takes care not only to provide it seasonably for her, but also to administer it in the tenderest manner. And, surely, what instinct inspirith the lower creatures to act, in a point so necessary to their preservation, reason, good-nature, and affection should yet more strongly direct, in beings who boast of higher endowments, and superior excellence.

And thus much for the duty of parents, in providing for the health and good constitution of their children.

PROV. XXII. 6.

Train up a child in the way he should go; and when he is old he will not depart from it.

THE next duty that parents owe their children, is, to give them good instruction.

The care of the body, however important, is yet but a lower concern. It is true, as it is the instrument of the soul, care should be taken to make it as usefully subservient to it, in its operations, as is possible. And, forasmuch as this is not to be done without health and a good habit, therefore we owe the same care to the body on these accounts, that a musician doth to his instrument; because if that be neglected, if it be either broken or abused, or if the strings be of an undertone or texture, it will never answer the ends of his art, but will often send forth a disagreeable discord instead of a delightful harmony. For this reason, the first and great care in life should be, to join a sound mind to a sound body; and to preserve both in their perfection. Now, forasmuch as the mind is believed, by many wise men, to come into the world a perfect blank, free from all characters of good or evil, and capable of any; and, forasmuch as knowledge and virtue are its health and strength, therefore the first duty in life is to impress right notions and good principles upon it in the beginning; and for this reason, you are first to impress a strong awe of Almighty God upon the minds of your children; of that God who made all things in heaven and in earth, by the word of his mouth, and can destroy them again at his pleasure; of that God who knoweth the secrets of our hearts, and seeth the thoughts afar off; and there is not a motion in our minds that is hid from him, but he will punish all evil thoughts, as well as evil actions, with dreadful vengeance! and, on the contrary, will reward every act and every intention of virtue, with excess of happiness! And when your children know all this, your next care is to teach them, as far as they are capable of learning, what virtue and goodness are; and on the contrary, what those wicked actions are which offend God, and provoke his wrath against us; and then inspire them, by all possible methods, with the love of the one, and the abhorrence of the other. The virtues which they are first to be taught, are, to love, and do all good offices to all around them; to pity the miseries and misfortunes of all they see in affliction, and to be charitable to the poor. And all this most children are capable of learning, even before they can speak; whereas the contrary to this is the practice of most parents, or at least, of those to whose care they commit their children. Wrath, revenge, and cruelty are the first passions children are taught to exert; if they fall, the ground is to be beaten in revenge; if any one offend them, they are taught to stamp and clench their fists, and roar out some expressions, even of inarticulate rage, against them; if birds, or other poor creatures are brought to them, to divert them, they are to be abused and killed. And thus, instead of being early instructed in meekness and compassion, in humanity and good-nature, they are taught resentment, and wrath, and cruelty, in their very cradles. Vices which, in all probability, the best instruction in the world will never be able to unteach them thoroughly, for the rest of their lives; and so they become monsters of oppression and inhumanity to all they deal with.

The sentence of the Arcopagus, one of the wisest assemblies of Greece, or of the world, is well worth our attention on this head; they condemned and passed a severe sentence upon a child, who diverted himself with putting out the eyes of quails; considering that action as a mark of a most detestable disposition, which, if it were suffered to grow up with impunity, would be pernicious to a great number of people.

The next virtue that children are to be taught is, veracity; that is, to tell the truth upon all occasions: and this is a virtue in which they will be more easily instructed, because it is a virtue to which all children are naturally disposed, and from which most of them are warped with difficulty. And to confirm them in this disposition, they are to know, that this is a virtue which God Almighty hath a peculiar regard for; that he delighteth to be called the God of truth; that mercy and truth are his great attributes! that none shall abide in his tabernacle, none shall dwell in his holy hill, but he that speaketh the truth from his heart. On the other hand, they are to be taught the utmost dread and abhorrence of a lie: that the devil is a liar, and the author of it; but that God Almighty hateth and detesteth it; that he hath declared by the mouth of Solomon, that lying lips are an abomination unto the Lord; and that he that speaketh lies shall not escape. And whereas most lies are told to hide faults, every fault that is confessed with ingenuity, and sorrow for having committed it, should be forgiven; but a lie should never be forgiven, but corrected with double chastisement, and for this plain reason, because it doubles every fault that is committed, by adding known falsehood to it. This, I say, is what children should be taught; but the very contrary to this is too often what they are taught. They are threatened and flattered into falsehood, as soon as they are capable of being guilty of it. And almost the first sentence a child learns, after he can speak, is a lying excuse for his nurse, or his servant. If he fall or be hurt by their negligence, he is to deny it to death. If they have given him any food that makes him sick, he is to deny it stedfastly, although the lie should cost him his life. I believe there are few that hear me, who have not known several, and heard of many more instances of children, who have lost their limbs, and been cripples all their life long, by this corruption of their attendants. But how many thousands have lost their lives in this manner, is impossible to say. And indeed, if they only lost their limbs and their lives, the evil would be in some degree tolerable; whereas this early habit of lying depraves the mind beyond any other whatsoever! and betrays children into so much impudence and effrontery, as makes them hardened to every virtue, and obstinate in every vice; and of consequence must end, too often, in their eternal ruin.

To this we owe that steadfastness in falsehood, conspicuous in the characters of some men; men that allow themselves in the vilest and most villainous falsehoods, that can any way contribute to increase their gain, or hide their guilt; to mask and disguise their hypocrisy, and raise the reputation of their righteousness! and though they should be instantly detected and exposed even to numerous assemblies, this makes no change in their conduct; for the hypocrite's whole life is one continued lie; you may confute, but you cannot confound him. They receive your correction with such a placid composure, with such a meekness and humility in hypocrisy, that you can scarce believe your senses to their disadvantage; how is it possible such meek, such disinterested, such sanctified men, should be villains? and indeed, it would be hard to account for it, were we not informed by the spirit of God, that the great father of lies can, upon occasion, transform himself into an angel of light.

Another duty which children should be early taught, and which perhaps will be the best guardian of their veracity, and every other virtue, is an awful regard and high veneration for the name and honour of God! for this will establish a high sense of the divine power and majesty in the minds of children, when they understand that his name is not to be mentioned but with awe and reverence. And yet, God knows, the direct contrary to this is the practice of the world; and the very first words children are often taught to pronounce, is some profanation of the name of God, in a curse or an oath.

The fear of the Lord (saith Solomon) is the beginning of wisdom: children are influenced into duty by the impressions of fear, even before the use of reason; and therefore, the fear of God should be inculcated as early and as deeply as possible; as the surest means to inspire them with caution and consideration, which are the sure foundations of wisdom and virtue, and the best guardians against error and impiety; whereas, when children have got early habits of profaning the name of God, they immediately lose all sense of fear towards him; and with that, all sense of religion and virtue! and so become utterly profligate, and abandoned to all vice and villainy! insomuch that I believe, there scarcely ever was one instance of any child, who was early allowed to curse and swear, that ever became a good man, to the last day of his life.

The next virtue in which I would have children instructed, is humility. The virtue which, of all others, will best prepare them for all the cross accidents and calamities they are sure to meet with in life, will give them the truest sense of their own corruption, and weakness, and vanity; and of consequence, will dispose them to contentment and resignation, under all the dispensations and chastisements of the divine providence. And this is a virtue, which the modesty of their tender years will incline and enable them to practise with ease; whereas in the common course of education, they are carefully initiated into the contrary vice, and are taught pride with as much diligence as if it were the most important duty in life, and, as if the delay of so excellent an institution were of dangerous consequence, they take care to begin with it betimes, and instruct them in it as soon as they are capable of discerning their own figure in the glass; and then is the imagination of the poor young creature bewildered with all the gaieties that vanity can invent; laces, ribbons, feathers, fineries, and fopperies of all kinds and colours are crowded together to adorn the tender clay; and the imagination of one, if not both parents, is stretched, to dispose and vary all these to advantage, that the poor little pageant may, by all means, be early taught to set a right value upon its person; and to distinguish itself from other children, whose parents have less fortune or foppety than its own. The consequence from all this is, that so fine a creature cannot bear to go into a cold dirty school, or mix with a herd of tattered children; and so is kept at home, for fear of spoiling its fine clothes, or its fine complexion. And by this means, its little head is in a very little time so entirely filled with such fine ideas of dress, and fashion, and vanity, that there is no room left for any thing good or useful ever after. If the child be of the other sex, it is odds but she is committed, perhaps trusted entirely to the care of an ignorant and fantastic servant; who, if she hath the good fortune to be born a foreigner, is from that sole advantage, without the recommendation of any one useful talent in life, too often thought qualified to educate children of the highest condition; and will take special care never to spoil the fine eyes of her pupil either with work or reading; never to molest her mind either with the low troublesome knowledge of family affairs, or with the severities of religion and virtue; will teach her to speak a foreign language with great ease and volubility, perhaps without knowing how to read her own; and, what is infinitely worse, will be too apt to unteach her the awkward unfashionable virtues of modesty and reserve; will let her understand, that blushing is the highest crime she can be guilty of; and that she ought to be ashamed of nothing, but being out of countenance, or out of fashion; in a word, will make her a complete, perhaps a perverted woman, before she knows what it is to be a child.

If the child happen to be of the male kind, it is odds, but a French tutor will do as much by him. I would here by no means be understood to mean any reflection upon that great nation, which hath produced so many men of eminence in every branch of useful knowledge. I censure nothing but our own folly, in too often choosing the meanest of that nation for the most important office in life, the education of our children. These are men who, from their skill in outward ornaments, are too often absurdly chosen to infuse inward accomplishments; men who will carry their pupils by a short road through coffee-houses, play-houses and assemblies, into what they call the knowledge of the world; without passing through the tedious round of old and obsolete books and languages, and the severe discipline of study; and without encumbering their fine heads with the lumber and pedantry of arts and sciences. Such is that detestable education by which many of the best fortunes and families among us are too early corrupted and cramped, to the reproach and calamity of their country! Men well known, and sufficiently distinguished in all places of public resort, except the church, the senate, and the courts of justice; for in the first of these they are rarely seen, at least to any good purpose, and in the rest as rarely heard. And although some, by the force of a better genius, and the influence of the divine grace, may break through the prejudices of so unhappy an education, yet these are but few and rare, in comparison of the mighty numbers that are utterly undone by it.

Another virtue that should be early and carefully taught children, is justice; and that equity and honesty in our dealings, which is prescribed by this virtue, is so very agreeable to the first rudiments of reason, that children are very early capable of it. And to give them a high veneration for this virtue, (which is the shield of right, and the bond of peace,) they are to be taught that it is of high value in the sight of God; that justice and judgment are the habitation of his throne; and that he hath in his holy word promised great and lasting blessings upon those that practise this virtue from the heart. That God blesteth the habitation of the just; that they are under his immediate care and protection; that he hath promised that no evil shall happen unto them: and that he will deliver them from trouble.

On the other hand, they are to be inspired with the utmost detestation and abhorrence of all fraud and iniquity in their dealings. They are to be taught, that every degree of these vices are marks of the meanest and basest minds! that there is as much villainy in defrauding a school-fellow of a taw or a trifle, as in robbing him of any thing of greater value; for if a child be allowed to do injustice in a trifle, he will be much more tempted to it when he can gain considerably by it. And therefore he is to be taught, that this is a vice which will render him despicable, as well as hateful, in the eyes of the world; and doubly odious in the sight of God; that false weights and false measures are an abomination to him; that if any man defraud his brother, God hath declared himself an avenger of all such: that he hath declared that neither thieves nor extortioners shall inherit the kingdom of God. Your children are to be early and carefully taught, that nothing under heaven can justify any degree of fraud or iniquity in our dealings! that no pretence, even of good intentions or pious purposes whatsoever, can sanctify wicked means; that we must by no means do evil, that good may come; and that the spirit of God hath expressly declared of all that do so, by the mouth of his holy apostle, that their damnation is just. That God himself hath declared by the mouth of his prophet Isaiah (Isa. 8.), that he hateth robbery, though it were for a burnt offering. And, above all, they should be carefully taught, that of all robberies, they are the most heinous, the most hateful, the most abhorred of God, who have the spoils of the widow and the orphan for their object. The helpless orphan, the sickly, the aged, the desolated widow: O Lord, righteous and just, how just are thy judgments, which thou hath pronounced against their oppressors in thy holy writ! Oppress not the widow, nor the fatherless, nor the poor, saith Zachariah (Zach. vii. 10.) And he observeth of all that do so, that they made their hearts as an adamant stone, lest they should hear the law, and the words which the Lord of Hosts hath sent in his spirit by the former prophets. Therefore came a great wrath from the Lord of Hosts; therefore it came to pass, that as he cried, and they would not hear; so they cried, and I would not hear, saith the Lord of Hosts.

Woe to thee that spoilest, and thou wast not spoiled (saith Isaiah, xxxiii. 1.); and dealest treacherously, and they dealt not treacherously with thee. Rob not the poor (saith Solomon, in the xxii chapter of his Proverbs, Rob not the poor) because he is poor: neither oppress the afflicted in the gate: for the Lord will plead their cause, and spoil the soul of those that spoiled them.

God, of his infinite mercy, deliver this audience from this guilt, and from the vengeance due to it; through the merits and mediation of Jesus Christ.

SERMON CXVI.

BY PATRICK DELANY, D. D.

PROV. XXII. 6.

Train up a child in the way he should go; and when he is old he will not depart from it.

IN a former discourse upon these words, I proposed to consider the duty of parents to their children, in the following order:

First, That Parents are obliged to take care of the health and constitution of their children.

Secondly, That they are to give them good instruction.

Thirdly, That they are to correct them in their faults.

Fourthly, That they are to shew them good example.

Fifthly, They are to make a proper provision for them, as far as they are able.

And, lastly, They are to pray to God for them.

Under the first of these heads, I shewed it to be the previous duty of all persons that entered into the married state, to take care that their constitutions were not impaired by intemperance, or excess, or vice of any kind; nor their minds infected with evil habits; inasmuch as evil dispositions are found, by experience, to be propagated as well as evil constitutions; and although it be a reflection of sufficient dread and disquiet, to be the author of a miserable infected race of wretched mortals; yet it is infinitely more so, deliberately to diffuse vice and villainy among mankind, and entail them upon late posterity; to be the founder of a race of fiends.

In the next place I shewed it to be the indispensable duty of mothers to nurse their own children, if their health and constitution will allow it; that this is indisputably a law of nature, and, as such, guarded with evident and sufficient sanctions; the observance of it attended with the reward of signal pleasure and happiness to the parent, and the transgression of it, with dangers and punishments of various kinds.

The next duty of parents, which I considered in my last discourse, was, that of giving their children good instructions; and the first part of this duty, I told you, was to give them early and strong impressions of the awe and veneration of that great Being, that made heaven and earth; that searcheth the secrets of the heart, and seeth the thought afar off; the Almighty Author of sure and unerring vengeance to the wicked, and infinite and unspeakable rewards to the righteous! and then, gradually to explain and inculcate the several virtues that will entitle them to his favour; and inspire the utmost abhorrence of those vices that will draw down his vengeance upon them.

The chief of these virtues, I told you, were mercy, humility, truth, and justice; which are the nobler and more immediate transcripts of his own perfections; the great guardians of peace upon earth, and good-will towards men! and, under some of these heads, I shewed you the pernicious practice of parents and servants, in early imitating, and carefully instructing children in many of the contrary vices; wrath, revenge, cruelty, pride, lying, and profaning the name of God, in unhallowed oaths and curses.

I concluded with an earnest exhortation to parents, early and carefully to instruct and exercise their children in the principles and in the practice of justice, which is the shield of right, and the bond of peace; to teach them that nothing under heaven can justify any fraud or iniquity in our dealings, that no pretence of good intentions, or pious purposes, whatsoever, can sanctify wicked means.

Having thus considered the principal virtues in which children are early to be instructed, I now proceed to consider those, which may, I think, be properly called secondary or ministerial virtues, as being subservient to virtues of greater consequence, and higher excellence than themselves; and the chief of these are temperance, obedience, modesty, civility, and industry.

As to the first of these, I am well aware that temperance is, and hath ever been, accounted a cardinal virtue; nor is it any part of my intention to debase its dignity; but only to observe, that as it is subservient to higher purposes than bare abstinence from excess; and is indeed necessary to the exercise of every other virtue; therefore I think it may not improperly be termed ministerial; and it is certain, that wise men have ever esteemed temperance so necessary both to health and virtue, that some have gone so far as to enjoin it strictly to the breeding parent; that so the child may come into the world in some measure influenced by this habit, or at least, properly prepared for it. All physicians agree, that the plainest and simplest foods are best fitted to young and tender stomachs, and are attended with less danger of surfeit and excess, and of consequence are more safe and salutary; and all philosophers agree, that temperance is the truest foundation of every virtue and good habit in the mind; and if so, it is evident to common sense, that this foundation cannot be laid too early; and therefore parents cannot be too careful in avoiding all sweetenings and seasonings, all heightenings of taste in their children's food, which cannot fail of having ill effects upon their health, and giving them an early turn to luxury, the inlet of every vice, and every corruption, to which the human nature is prone! luxury, our national reproach and ruin! to which we owe, among infinite other evils, the immeasurable use of that too fashionable and pernicious plant which weakens the stomach, unbraces the nerves, and drains the very vitals of our national wealth; to which nevertheless our children are as early, and as carefully enured, from the very breast, as if the daily use of this liquor were an indispensable duty which they owed to God and their country.

The next ministerial virtue which children should be early taught, is obedience; and it is sufficiently known, that this is always the first duty inculcated by that order of men, which hath hitherto been most eminent for the education of youth. Children, obey your Parents in all things, saith the apostle; for this is well pleasing unto the Lord. And doubtless, nothing can be more agreeable to the God of order, and fountain of all virtue, and all felicity, than this submission of children to their natural superiors and guardians; which is the best early guardian of their health, the best security of their virtue, and source of their happiness; it being evident, that in the ordinary course of things, nothing can be more reasonable, or of greater use to children, than a ready undisputing submission to the will of their parents: they being, from the advantage of more age and experience, better judges of what they ought to do or avoid. And therefore this obedience should have no limitation or reserve, except where the parent is found to command something contrary to the law of God; in that case, and in that only, the child's obedience is to be dispensed with; in all others to be steadily and uniformly exacted, without admitting the least debate or hesitation; than which nothing can be of worse consequence, either to the peace of the parent, or the virtue and well-being of the child; the same spirit that is restive to the authority of the parent, will in time be refractory to that of the magistrate, and rebellious even to that of Almighty God; and will at the same time, in all probability, degenerate into an offensive rudeness, or an unsocial sullenness to the rest of the world. And therefore parents should subdue this spirit early and effectually, if they expect their children should become good sons, good subjects, or good Christians. And the true way to do this is, by carefully avoiding all cruel, unjust, and wicked commands, and exacting a severe and steady obedience to all others. And these, in a prudent and good parent, must often be such as will shew the child his own interest and happiness, in the obedience he yielded to them; although neither of these, neither his interest nor his happiness, should ever by any means be made the rules or measures of his obedience (because there are infinite instances, in which it is impossible he can either discern or judge of them); no, this must be entirely resolved into the parent's right of rule; the natural pleasure of a dutiful submission to their authority; and the comfortable assurance of a blessing from Almighty God, upon their cheerful and conscientious obedience.*

Another virtue that parents are carefully to cultivate in their children, is modesty. By modesty I mean, not that outward demureness and artifice of face; that affected guise and phrase of humility, which impudence often assumes, and hypocrisy always: the mask of fraud, and harbinger of deceit! that meek unblushing assurance, which distinguishes the smooth and saintly Pharisee; that smooths his phrase, and humbles his eyes, with all the arts, and to all the purposes of delusion; of whom the Psalmist so justly observes, that there is no faithfulness in his mouth; their throat is an open sepulchre; they flatter with their tongue. No; true modesty arises from a true sense of decency and duty, and best shews itself in a becomingness of behaviour, and due deference to the rest of the world, according to their several relations and stations in it; equally removed from fawning and from falshood: and of this we need say little more, than that it is at once the greatest ornament of youth, and best guardian of virtue. It is that natural check, which it hath pleased God to lay upon every thing, that is either vicious, or unruly, or even indecent in our nature. And of how much value this virtue is in the eyes of Almighty God, is evident from the care which he hath taken of it in the very formation of our frame. The flushing of the blood in the face, upon the consciousness of having violated this virtue, or even upon the least apprehension of being in danger of violating it, is one of the most amazing phenomena among all the wonders of our make: for what is this, in effect, but God Almighty's declaring to us, that we shall never offend against this virtue, without publishing our shame to all around us? what is it, but making every drop of blood in our bodies the guardians of it? and this in a manner, equally astonishing and inexplicable! flashing the blood into the face, by channels that never were found out; and by a power that never was or will be accounted for: and the plain reason why this virtue is so guarded, is of such mighty importance in the sight of God, is this; it is the guardian of every virtue; it is in the mechanism of our frame, what prudence is in our minds, the power that sways, and guides, and governs, all the other virtues. Take away prudence from the mind, and there is no virtue left: take away modesty from our make, and the consequence will, in effect, be the same: this once removed, the mind becomes the easy prey of every passion, every vice, and every evil tendency in our nature. This once removed, every spark of evil, before latent in the soul, blazes out into a flame, and devours all worth and virtue before it: and therefore there is not a more lovely, or more important, office of the parental care, than to be strict and diligent guardians of the modesty of their children; than to keep them at the utmost distance from every thing that hath the least appearance even of indecency, and much more of impudence, impiety, or immorality of any kind. And yet the very contrary to this is too notoriously the practice of many parents; who take a monstrous, or, to speak more properly, a hellish pleasure, in teaching their children the worst words, and most vicious and impudent forms of speech, as soon as they are able to speak.—Folly (saith Solomon) is joy to him that is destitute of wisdom: and is it possible there can be a greater excess of folly, than for parents thus to delight in the destruction of their own children? This is so shocking a conduct, that it is incapable of aggravation: and therefore I shall only observe of it, that these men act as if they were afraid their children's own natural inclinations, their parents' example, and the corruptions of the world, would all come too late to make them reprobates! to make them ripe for perdition! and therefore they take early pains to establish their guilt, and to insure their damnation betimes.

Another duty parents owe their children is, to teach them that civility, which is commonly known by the name of good manners—an accomplishment which introduces youth more early, and to more advantage, into the world, than any other whatsoever; and oftentimes recommends them more effectually to the favour and protection of the great, than many other qualities of more inherent excellence; because it is often the only one by which they can be obliged or served. In one word, it is an easy, a natural, and an universal introduction to the regard of mankind; and if it be supported by real worth, cannot fail to fix us in their esteem.

And this civility, which we call good manners, is a duty founded at once, both in justice and necessity.

No man is self-sufficient, but hath frequent and endless occasions for the assistance and good offices of others; and no man is so strictly tied down by any law either of God or society, to do good offices to others to the full extent of his power, but that he hath at the same time a right to some returns of gratitude and acknowledgment. And in this conduct, in requesting the favours and good offices of others with a becoming deference; in a readiness and cheerfulness to do good offices to others, with a thankfulness for being so employed; and, lastly, in a thankful and ready acknowledgment of all good offices done to ourselves; in these consist the essentials of civility, and what we truly and properly call good manners: the courtly phrase, the courtesy, and the bow, and the friendly salutation, are but its outward garb, indication, and ornament. Let me be understood upon this point, which is, in truth, very little understood in the world. Although every man hath a right, from our natural equality, to a fair unoffending treatment from every other, yet no man hath an absolute right to the aid of others in any exigency; and therefore, when he wants it, he is obliged to sue for it, in a modest phrase, and submissive demeanour; and when he hath received it, he is to return thanks, in a style suitable to the favour received; and, therefore, the man that is void of good manners, is at the same time void both of gratitude and justice; he expects what he hath not a right to; and he pays not what he owes. So that ill-manners is in truth a lower kind of immorality; it is injustice and dishonesty in a less degree; and, if it be neglected there, may soon rise, and become conspicuous in a higher.

Another virtue in which children are to be carefully instructed, and to which they are to be early inured, is patience (which I shall beg leave to consider in this place as a ministerial virtue). Now patience is a virtue, which teaches us to bear evil with equanimity, and humble resignation to the will of God: by whom all events are governed, and without whom not so much as a sparrow falleth to the earth. Forasmuch then as it is well known, that all evils are increased by impatience, and abated by equanimity and resignation; therefore it is obvious at first sight, of what importance the value of patience must be, in a world encompassed with evil.

The instances under which this virtue is to be exercised are endless as the calamities of life; and therefore it cannot be too early, too often, or too earnestly inculcated. However, I shall at present content myself with recommending one small part of it to the consideration of all parents and tutors; and that is patience of solitude: early to habituate their children and pupils to bear being alone.

The advantages of this habit are obvious, and need barely to be mentioned. First they will by this means learn to think, to reflect, and converse with their own thoughts and hearts. Secondly, they will soon get the better of those instinctive fears of solitude, which, however wisely impressed, (in aid of that period of life which most needs the protection and care of others,) are too apt to degenerate into timorous superstitious; which impair all the powers of reason, and often make life a load. And, thirdly, it will guard them from those infinite evils which men daily run into, to banish solitude, and kill time; such as evil conversation, and idle pursuits and habits of all kinds. And this, we are told, a wise man of antiquity laid so great a stress upon, that, being asked, what he had gained by his philosophy? he answered that he had learned to converse at home, and not be beholden to others for good company.

Another duty in which children are early to be instructed and exercised, is industry in some honest and useful occupation; the children of poor parents, in some rudiments or lower branch of some useful trade, as the foundation of a future livelihood; and the children of those of better condition, in endowing and adorning their minds with those habits of knowledge and virtue, which will best become their station and condition in the world, and make them a blessing to all below them.

“The whole life (say the Chinese philosophers) depends upon care and industry; the year on the spring; the day on rising early. He who in his youth is not diligent and assiduous in his studies, when old age cometh, will be a fool, and find himself empty-handed; he who in spring will not till, in autumn will not reap.”

Early industry is the best security in the world against vicious habits: when this is neglected, men easily become a prey to sloth and idleness; which are the parents of every vice, and the bane of every thing good and excellent.

And here I cannot but take notice of that noble institution of Solon, that great Athenian law-giver, which decreed, that every child that refused or neglected to support his parents, when age or infirmities called for their assistance, should be branded with infamy, and deprived of all the privileges of society; but with this limitation, provided the parents took care to breed up their child to some useful trade or occupation; which if they neglected, their children were then acquitted of all obligation to provide for them in their need.

And thus I have done with that part of the parents' duty, which consists in instructing their children, and forming them to those virtues which may be called the lesser morals, but are at the same time the sure guardians of the greater.

PROV. XXII. 6.

Train up a child in the way he should go; and when he is old he will not depart from it.

HAVING, in some former discourses, laid before you the several parts of the parents' duty to the children, and explained very particularly the several virtues, both primary and ministerial, in which they were to be early instructed and exercised; I now proceed to consider the means necessary to be made use of, in order more effectually to inculcate and confirm those virtues in their hearts.

And, first, all parents are particularly to remember, that as soon as their children have passed through the first rudiments of learning, and are able to read, they should then be carefully taught some short system of the Christian religion, such as that excellent summary of Christian doctrines and duties contained in the Church Catechism; not only to get them by heart, or rather by rote, as the common custom is; but in a rational intelligent way; and, in order to this, the questions and answers should be varied and explained, and the children should be obliged to give the meaning of them in other words; and, at last, to add the proofs from scripture. And this they will be enabled to do, by the help of some short and useful explanation of the catechism, published for that purpose; one particularly, by a late most reverend and excellent prelate, formerly your teacher in this place; but, above all, the scriptures are to be read frequently and constantly; those parts especially and primarily, which contain an account of the wonderful works and judgments of God; such as the creation, the deluge, the destruction of Sodom and Gomorrah, and the deliverance from the Egyptian bondage; and above all, the life and miracles of our Blessed Saviour, and his apostles. For these being in their own nature extraordinary, and at the same time conveyed to us in the noblest, the most instructive, and the most delightful relations this world was ever blessed with, will be read with pleasure, and remembered with ease; and will at the same time give your children strong and awful notions of the infinite power, wisdom, and goodness of God; together with a deep veneration of his justice and judgments upon presumptuous and impenitent sinners: and, in consequence of this, will impress a strong awe and dread of offending and provoking the divine wrath and indignation against us.

After this, they are carefully to peruse and revolve those solemn and devotional parts of the holy scriptures, which set forth, in most moving and exalted strains the mercy, and might, and majesty of Almighty God; such as the psalms of David, the prophecies of Isaiah, and the life, suffering, and submission of Job: and, lastly, they are to be well and often instructed and exercised in the Ecclesiastes, and proverbs of Solomon, which contain at once the plainest and the wisest precepts that ever were delivered for the conduct of life, both with regard to this world, and the world to come. These are to be perpetually perused, and perfectly remembered; and by being so, will be a sure and lasting fund of direction, consolation, and support, on all occasions, and throughout all emergencies in life.

And thus I have gone through those fundamental duties of erudition and instruction, which parents owe their children. For the rest, this city hath the advantage of so many excellent schools for their further improvement, makes it unnecessary to pursue this subject any longer. Only thus much give me leave to observe to you, that as good school-masters are the greatest benefactors to mankind, and the worst rewarded for the good they do, of all mortals; paying an uncommon regard and return to them, for the advantages your children receive from them, as it is your duty, so it is likewise greatly your interest; and the fruits of it will be repaid sevenfold into your own bosom.

I have now considered at large, how your children are to be gradually through the whole series of Christian and moral duties; and have only to add, that, when they are early and long practised in them, the motions of duty and virtue will then become as easy and as familiar to them, as those of nature: or, to speak more properly, custom will make them nature; and they will practise them with as little difficulty, as they walk or breathe.

The next duty that parents owe their children is, to correct them in their faults. And this is a duty wherein parents, from their great fondness for their children, are often exceedingly faulty: and yet, in truth, the neglect of correction is faulty, even upon the score of fondness; for true tenderness and love to children should oblige parents to provide early and carefully, that they might be miserable and afflicted as short and as seldom, and happy as often and as long as possible. And the true way to effect this, is to fix good habits; and either to prevent or to root out evil habits as early as possible. For this reason, if children are not to be won to goodness by kindness and indulgence, (which I own is much more desirable,) they are to be compelled to it by severity and discipline; and when they have once got a good habit, it will, from that moment, be easy to them. On the other hand, if they are not to be kept back from evil by exhortation and advice, they are to be deterred from it by threats and punishments; for, as naturalists observe of young trees, that stubborn, crooked plants are not to be straightened but by fire; so stubborn, perverse dispositions are often not to be amended but by warm and severe correction; and that from the very beginning. One correction, and that perhaps a light one, will deter a child from doing an ill thing at first; but, if you suffer him to get a habit of doing it, perhaps twenty corrections will not break him of it: so that children are to be early corrected, out of pity and tenderness. For what parent, that loves his child, would not rather correct him for a fault once, than let him go on until he found himself under a necessity of correcting him fifty times for it, and perhaps to no purpose? And therefore Solomon rightly observes, (Prov. xii. 24.) that he that spareth the rod, hateth his son; but he that loveth him, chasteneth him be- times. From hence we learn, that pa- rents should correct their children early, even out of love and pity to them. And the same wise man again adviseth, (Prov. xix. 18.) Chasten thy son while there is hope, and let not thy soul spare for his crying. That is, chasten him early, while there is hope of his reformation; for if you let him go on in vice, your correction may come too late. Again he tell us, (Prov. xxix. 15.) The rod and reproof give wisdom; but a child left to himself, bringeth his mother to shame. The mother is here particularly mentioned, be- cause children are mostly ruined by the false and ill-judged indulgence of the mothers: nay, you ought to correct your children early, as well for your own ease, as for their amendment: for be- sides the pleasure of seeing your children grow up in goodness and virtue; is it not a great happiness to yourselves to be saved the trouble, and vexation, and disquiet, of giving your children frequent and re- peated corrections, when they are grown headstrong in vice? And therefore Solo- mon again most excellently adviseth, (ver. 17. of the same chapter,) Correct thy son, and he shall give thee rest: yea, he shall give delight unto thy soul.

But, perhaps, the child is weak and sickly, and therefore must not be cor- rected, for fear of spoiling his constitu- tion. This is the common excuse for ruining all the children in the world; and it is as shameful and ill-grounded, as it is common: for the sure way of destroy- ing the best constitution under heaven, is by leaving it at the mercy of peevish and ungovernable dispositions; by making it a prey to all the unruly passions, and hu- mours, and appetites of a perverse mind: and therefore the only way to preserve a weak constitution, is by subduing the froward unruly mind, that tears it to pieces, to the discipline of reason and virtue. Moreover, it should be consi- dered, that if this be not seasonably and effectually done, the diseases and ail- ments of headstrong children can neither have the aid of proper food or proper physic to relieve them; and therefore all necessary correction is to be early applied, even for the interest of their health and quiet: although, in truth, if correc- tion were dangerous to such a constitu- tion, it were infinitely better, that a per- verse child should actually die under it, than that he should be suffered to become a son of perdition: to grow up into a monster of vice and iniquity, to plague his parents and the world, and to gather to himself wrath against the day of wrath, and the revelation of the righteous judgement of God.

The next duty that parents owe their children, is to set them good example; of which I shall now say no more than this, that your children will always be- lieve, that you think that to be the best which you practise yourselves; because you do it of choice; and if you did not think it best, why should you do it? and therefore, as it will be cruel in you to correct them for those vices which you yourselves not only teach, but tempt them to, by your example; so it will be vain, and impossible for you to reform them by it. For this reason, if you have any regard for their well-being in this world, and their salvation in the next, you will be infinitely careful not to lead them in the paths of perdition; not to guide or go before them in the ways of sin, which go down to the chambers of death.

The next duty that parents owe their children, is to make a proper provision for them, as far as they are able; and the Apostle tell us, (1 Tim. v. 8.) that he is worse than an infidel, that neglecteth this duty. And the reason of this decla- ration is evident: this is a duty which even the heathens thought themselves obliged to from the laws of nature; and therefore that Christian that neglects it, is, in that respect, worse than a heathen.

Now by making provision for your children must be understood, such a pro- vision as may enable them, by the help of an honest industry, to become good and useful men in the world; for what can be a more lamentable consideration to parents, than to reflect, that by their idleness and extravagance, they have ex- posed their helpless issue to misery and contempt, and to all the temptations of poverty and want? But, on the other hand, parents are by no means obliged to provide endlessly for their children, as many of them do : to heap up so much wealth, as may make it needless for their children to be either virtuous or industrious, in order to get a comfortable livelihood, is surely a dangerous provision, and such as never can be a duty. And, certainly, much less are they obliged to provide such fortunes for them as may tempt them to luxury and excess, to vanity and extravagance ; because that is providing, not for their support, but for their ruin, both of body and soul.

There is one thing I must recommend to parents, as a point of great importance, to their own as well as to their children's happiness ; and that is, in regard to their settling them in the world, in marriage. Many unhappy marriages are laid to the charge of parents, and, I fear, with too much truth. A discreet parent thinks himself obliged to settle his child advantageously ; but that is the point wherein they so often fail ; for, by advantageously, they generally understand, richly and honourably ; whereas riches and high rank easily may, and often do, bring many miseries along with them. There ought to be a strict examination of the heart, on such occasions, whether they can appeal to the All-seeing eye for the integrity of their intentions, and whether avarice or ambition may not be more the motives of their conduct than a reasonable prospect of happiness to their issue : for if any degree of these mix with their intentions, it will taint them before God ; and naturally tends to the mutual misery both of the parent and of the child.

Many things ought to be carefully considered, before such an union is completed. And as perfect obedience is required of the children, parents should be very cautious in their commands ; and impose nothing upon them (particularly in relation to marriage) but with a proper regard to their true interest and happiness ; which is not possible to be attained in the conjugal state, without true worth and virtue in the associate ; which are not always the attendants of wealth and honour. And even where these excellencies are attended with those temporal advantages, the parents' choice is to be urged with the utmost tenderness and indulgence ; inasmuch as there may be latent and well-grounded dislikes, which (too often) children can neither conquer nor explain.

When this is done, then, whatever may happen from the parent's misapprehension of things, they will have a clear conscience, and no room to reproach themselves : nor can they justly be reproached.

There are some parents such tyrants, that all the world must condemn them. I do not speak to them, for I fear they are incorrigible, and I hope their number is small ; but I address myself to those who appear more reasonable ; but although they act with less appearance of violence, may be as guilty ; and by insinuations and artful address prevail over fearful and modest minds, and obtain a consent, when they have not courage or assurance enough to resist or contend on such an occasion. This has been the unhappy case of many a young woman ; and is, in effect, as cruel a case as can be well imagined ; inasmuch as it frequently turns the humble and dutiful disposition of children into their destruction.

The last duty that parents owe their children, is to pray to God for them ; forasmuch as without the assistance and protection of the Divine Providence, all your endeavours for the well-being of your children, will be ineffectual, and all your counsels vain. You may inculcate the best precepts with the utmost care and diligence ; but you will never do it to effect, without the assistance of the Divine Grace : Paul may plant, and Apollos water ; but it is God who giveth the increase. You may take as much pains as you will to establish your family ; but remember always, that except the Lord buildeth the house, their labour is in vain that build it. Therefore you are to pray earnestly, humbly, and incessantly to Almighty God : to that God who giveth wisdom to the simple, that he would inform the understandings, and direct the hearts of your children in the ways of his laws, and the works of his commandments : that he would remove far from them vanity and lies ; that he would make them a clean heart, and re- new a right spirit within them: that he would inspire them with charity and mercy, with truth and justice, with humility and meekness, with honesty, industry, and sincerity in all their dealings: that your sons may grow up as the young plants, strong and upright, and fitted for the noblest works of the architect: and, and that your daughters may be as the polished corners of the temple, at once both ornaments and supports to the church of God; that your children may grow up good Christians, good wives, good husbands, good parents, good friends; that after the example of their blessed Lord and Redeemer, they may grow up in wisdom, as in years, and in favour with God and man: that they may go on from strength to strength, useful citizens to their country, subjects to their sovereign, and servants to their God; guardians of religion and virtue of every kind to all around them, until they are gradually fitted and finished into living temples of the Holy Ghost; the present pillars and ornaments of the earth, and future inhabitants of heaven.

The Duty of Children to their Parents.

EXOD. XX. 12.

Honour thy father and thy mother, that thy days may be long upon the land which the Lord thy God giveth thee.

ALL the precepts of religion respect either our duty to God, to our neighbour, or to ourselves; that is, the duties we owe to God, as creatures of his goodness, and dependants upon his providence; the duties we owe to mankind in the several relations of life; and the duties we owe to ourselves, in order to make us answer the ends of our being, and enable us to discharge the duties we owe to God and to one another; consequently, the duties we owe to ourselves are but secondary and subservient to those; and therefore our Blessed Saviour, being asked by the learned Pharisee, Which was the great commandment in the law? he answered, Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy mind. This is the first and great commandment; and the second is like unto it, Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself. Now the law of God considers mankind as members of one great community; and therefore every member of this community is our neighbour; that is, one to whom we owe all the duties of a social creature, all the offices of humanity. But, forasmuch as the duties of this general tie were not sufficient to answer all the engagements and ends of life; therefore it hath pleased God to superadd to these, particular engagements and obligations, absolutely necessary to the order and well-being of society: and of these, the duty of children to parents hath justly obtained the first place; because all our other duties to mankind begin and are founded here. It is from a right deference to the authority and institutions of parents that we learn to become good men, good neighbours, good friends, and good subjects, as well as good sons. In one word, it is here we ordinarily learn all the offices of a social and rational creature, in our whole commerce with mankind: and therefore it is, that God in his great wisdom, when he had prescribed the duties relating to himself, in the decalogue, immediately subjoins that which respects our parents, Honour thy father and mother, &c.

And this is agreeable to the very order of nature, forasmuch as parents are, next to God, the authors of our being, God indeed is properly our father, and earthly parents do but convey to us that being which God produces; but the consequence from this is, that although we owe more absolute and unlimited obedience to God, the fountain of our existence, yet we are to honour our parents, as his substitutes upon earth.

But forasmuch as this duty is not founded barely upon our existence, but is deduced with more force and greater evidence, from the advantages of early support, and early institution, derived to us by the care and affection of our parents; therefore all those that are to us in the place of parents, and in that relation eminently contribute to our well-being, have the fullest and clearest claim to paternal honour. And such are, among others, our teachers and spiritual pastors; from your parents you derive your being; from these, your well-being. From God you derive your immortal soul, with all its excellent faculties; from these you derive, under God, all that cultivation and improvement in virtue and knowledge, which are the glory even of immortal spirits.

In the next place, your governors are to you in the place of parents, because they are the fathers of their country; and the well-being of the community hath the same dependance upon their paternal care and vigilance, that particular houses have upon the prudence and affection of the masters of families. And indeed all government, as it is originally derived from paternal authority, is in truth no otherwise to be considered than as an enlargement of that authority; so that magistrates, succeeding into the place and office of parents, are to be regarded as public fathers, on whom the power of life and death, originally vested in parents, is now devolved. And as this is agreeable to the scripture-account of the origin of nations in general, divines have observed, that it seems to be more particularly evidenced in the common and successive name of the kings of the Philistines, Abimelech; which is a compound of two Hebrew words, Abi-Melech, my father the king; plainly shewing, that the title of king was only an appellation of honour, originally given to the father of the family.

Having thus shewn who they are to whom we are to pay honour and obedience, from the obligation of this precept, I proceed, in the next place, to explain the first branch of this duty enjoined in my text; namely, the duty of children to their parents.

First then, we are to honour our natural parents, or those whom the providence of God, or the constitution of our country, have substituted into their place. And this we are to do in the following instances: first, in reverence; secondly, in obedience; and, thirdly, in a grateful retribution of all the benefits we have received from them.

First, I say, we are to honour our parents by reverencing them. Now, reverence is an awful love, mixed with a fear of offending, which arises from respect and duty: not such a slavish dread as drives from the presence of those in authority over us, but such a filial and affectionate awe as fills us with veneration and esteem, and will engage us to attend to the monitions, and conform to the conduct, of our parents; and, at the same time, to abstain religiously from every thing that might give them the least trouble or disquiet. And this inward veneration is wont to shew itself both in our words and whole demeanour. First, in our words; for, these, as they flow from a mind tenderly and dutifully affected, will naturally carry with them all the indications of veneration and affection that sounds can express; and will, at the same time, be submissive and few. Respect is a natural restraint upon us, which, from fear of giving offence, ties up the tongue from uttering any impropriety or indecency to our parents, even when we are obliged to reason and remonstrate against their conduct. Such is that earnest intercession of Jonathan to his father Saul, for the life of David his friend—his friend that was as his own soul: (1 Sam. ch. xix.) Let not the king sin against his servant, against David; because he hath not sinned against thee, and because his works to thee-ward have been very good. Nay, we have an instance of an undutiful son in the gospel, who, although he did not obey the authority of her father, did not, however, dare to profess his disobedience; but, on the contrary, gave him good words, and a dutiful appellation, saying, I go, Sir, although he went not. And, certainly, the tribute of respectful language is the least that can be paid to those who have taught us to speak; and therefore the rude returns of wicked children to their parents are so detestable in the sight of God, that he hath in his law denounced a punishment against this crime, equal to that of blasphemy against himself. He that curseth his father or his mother, shall surely be put to death. (Exod. xxi. 17.) And (Prov. xx. 20.) He that curseth his father or mother, his lamp shall be put out in obscure darkness.

Again, the inward veneration due to parents is wont to shew itself in our whole demeanour. The humility of the mind naturally expresses itself, as in modesty of speech, so likewise in lowliness and submission of gesture; bowing the head, and bending the knee, upon every proper occasion.

An extraordinary instance of this is to be found in the demeanour of Joseph to his father. (Gen. xlviii. 12.) Highly exalted as he was in the court of the greatest monarch upon earth, he thought it no lessening to bend before his aged father, and pay him all the marks of submission and duty; nay, and he did this at a time when, the text assures us, Jacob's eyes were dim, and could not see; and consequently, when he could not be upbraided by his father for want of due respect, and probably would not have been blamed by any other mortal: for ~~who~~ could have been so vain as to censure the conduct of one who was at that moment in the highest reputation for wisdom and prudence of all mortals then alive? or, if their vanity could have carried them to censure his conduct, their fear of Pharaoh's first minister would certainly have obliged them to keep their thoughts to themselves. Yet, under all these circumstances of his father's blindness, his own exalted station, unrivalled wisdom, and uncontrouled power, Joseph's affectionate and dutiful heart would not suffer him to dispense with the least form of respect and veneration to his aged parent: for we read, that when he brought his sons from between his knees, to present them to his father, he bowed himself with his face to the earth. And surely there is not any one circumstance of his grandeur that reflects half so much lustre upon his character as this single instance of filial humiliation. When I consider him upon his knees to God, I regard him as a poor mortal, in the discharge of duty to his Creator, of adorable majesty and infinite height above him. When I behold him bowing down to Pharaoh, I consider him in the dutiful posture of a subject to his prince, to whom he was indebted for the highest exaltation and honour. But when I see him bending to the earth, before a poor, old, blind, decrepid father, I behold him with admiration and delight: how ~~does~~ that humiliation exalt him! A father, to whom he was so far from being indebted for a great fortune, or an honourable support, that, on the contrary, his father was obliged to him, as far as a father could be, upon both these accounts. He had no estate to settle, at least none worth Joseph's regard; nor had his son any inheritance to hope for from him, but his blessing; and that he thought he ought not to receive but in the lowest posture of humiliation and reverence. A demeanour, God knows, very distant from the principles and practice of the present age, who have no notion that any thing can be meant by a parent's blessing, but some mark of their bounty, or settlement of their fortune; and for this reason the best of parents are regarded as little better than an incumbrance upon the son's estate, and a bar to his happiness: and therefore it is no wonder if they are treated with no more respect than is absolutely necessary to secure the inheritance; I mean, so much of it as the wisdom of their ancestors hath left unsettled; otherwise, it is much to be feared, that rudeness and neglect would, (and in fact they do,) for the most part, fill up the place of reverence.

And this want of duty to parents is the effect of another and much greater want, the want of good principles, the want of a right sense of religion, and knowledge of the scriptures: for surely, if men were acquainted with the terrors of the Lord denounced against undutiful children, they could never allow themselves in the least instance of disobedience or disrespect to their parents. The eye that mocketh at his father, saith Solomon, and despiseth to obey his mother, the ravens of the valley shall pick it out, and the young eagles shall eat it. And as this is often literally true in the calamitous end of abandoned children, whose carcasses are, in the field of battle, whither their disobedience carried them, exposed to ravens, and vultures, and other birds of prey: or else upon gallows and gibbets, to which their villainies have brought them; villainies committed in contempt of the monitions and exhortations of their parents! the same sad fate is also frequently fulfilled upon undutiful children, in a metaphorical sense, in the deplorable ruin, and actual loss of eyes, brought upon such wretches by other nooks and vermin; by creatures of much greater prey, and surer destruction, than the ravens of the valley and the young eagles put together.

I have often admired it as a glorious instance of discipline in the Jewish commonwealth, that an undutiful child was to be stoned to death by the people: that so every one should be obliged to punish a crime which every one was obliged to abhor. But then it must be observed, that the parents had no right to bring the child before the magistrate, in order to this public condemnation, before they had first privately chastised him: for that was the letter of the law, (Deut. xxi. 18.) If a man have a stubborn and rebellious son, which will not obey the voice of his father, or the voice of his mother; and when they have chastened him, will not hearken unto them; then it was that he was to be brought before the magistrate, accused, condemned, and stoned to death: so that private chastisement was always to go before that public, that infamous, that dreadful execution.

This, my brethren, was the appointment and law of God, to his own people the Jews; and was, without question, the wisest institution that ever obtained in any nation; as it is the noblest monument of that wisdom and virtue, by which the Chinese think themselves distinguished above the rest of the world, at this day! the mighty veneration to parents enjoined by their laws, and the severe and exemplary punishment of undutifulness and disobedience. In China, if a father charges his son with any crime before a magistrate, there needs no other proof; he is immediately condemned. If a son should presume to mock a parent, or lay violent hands upon him, the whole country is alarmed, and the judgment reserved for the emperor himself: the magistrates of the place are turned out; and all the neighbourhood threatened, as having given countenance to so infernal a temper, which must be supposed to have discovered itself upon other occasions; it is impossible, they think, it should have arrived to such a degree of villainy at once. The criminal, in these cases, is sentenced to be cut into ten thousand pieces, and afterwards burnt! his houses and lands destroyed, and even the houses that stood near him; to remain as monuments of so detested a crime; or rather, that all remembrance of so abominable a villainy should be effaced from the earth. Nor are even their emperors, in all their height of power, exempted from the strictest discharge of duty and piety to their parents.

But, further, as we must honour our parents with all the marks of outward reverence; so likewise with all the real effects of sincere obedience.—Children, saith the apostle, (Coloss. iii. 20.) obey your parents in all things: for this is well pleasing unto the Lord. And as this is founded in the law of God, it is also enjoined by the dictates of reason; forasmuch as parents are our natural superiors; and because they are better judges and directors of your conduct, from the advantage of more years and experience, than you can possibly be for yourselves; and although you should in time, from the benefit of a happier genius, or a better education, arrive to greater clearness of judgment and strength of reason than your parents, yet still as long as you continue a part of their family, you are to pay them that obedience that is due to them as masters of their own household; and therefore are never to swerve from their commands, unless they should enjoin something contrary to the commands of God: in that case (and in that alone) your disobedience must be excused from the prior obligation you owe to your Creator, whose commands no mortal can control or dispense with: and even in this case, after you have made all the modest and dutiful remonstrances in your power, you are to obey passively; that is, you are patiently to submit to such chastisement as they shall think fit to inflict for your disobedience. For although they should chasten you after their own pleasure, as the apostle intimates, (Heb. ch. xii.) yet are you to give them reverence. And surely you ought, in common gratitude as well as justice, to bear with their infirmities, who have so often and so long borne with yours.

But there is one instance, wherein obedience to parents is of more importance to children than any other in life, and yet where they too often fail to pay it; and that is in the article of marriage: for, as long as children continue a part of their parent's family, (which must be till they think fit to dispose otherwise of them,) they are absolutely in their parent's power, and have no more right to dispose of themselves than they have to dispose of the parents' fortune or inheritance, or any of their goods; and therefore we find the parental authority of so great extent in the law of Moses, that the daughter who made a vow unknown to her father, was not allowed to ratify it without his consent; as you may read, Numb. xxx.

But the institutions of the ancient Romans carried this point a great deal higher, and made children dependant upon the parental authority during their whole lives; nor could the highest honours or authority in the commonwealth exempt them from it. A father in Rome could call down his son from the rostrum, in the midst of his harangue to the people, to punish him for any misdemeanour: he could command him in the same manner from the senate, or from the head of his legions. Nor did the people, the fathers, or the army, dare to interpose in his defence: they considered the duty to parents as a prior obligation, which nothing subsequent could cancel. And doubtless this was one reason why the Roman marriages continued so long sacred and undisturbed; because they were never made, but with advice and deliberation of their parents. And, indeed, the contrary conduct is an instance of disobedience, that commonly carries its own punishment with it: and it is to be hoped, there are few children to whose final account this sin will be placed, because I am persuaded there are few that have been guilty of it, who have not had reason to repent very sincerely of it to the last day of their lives. And the reason of this is evident: the persons that take the eyes of young people most, are such as are skilled in the courtly forms and fashions of the world: such as have laid themselves out to dress and dance, and acquire such superficial and shewy accomplishments, as are too often at the greatest distance in the world from modesty and good-nature, and good sense; and, above all, from solid principles of true religion and virtue, which are the true foundations of all conjugal accomplishments.

Prudent parents well know, that the true conjugal attractions arise, not from outward ornament, but inward excellence. This is a law established in morality, and is in exact analogy to that great law established in nature; which teaches us, that the attractions of bodies are not in proportion to their surface, but their solid contents. Prudent parents well know, that such accomplishments as either arise from, or tend to establish true worth, can alone render any pair happy in an union that must last for life. This, I say, all prudent parents very well know; and therefore are best fitted to make a right choice for their children; but still with this caution, that they do not offer violence to their inclinations, by forcing them to marry against their will. For the rest, it were infinitely better, that perverse children should actually die in the disappointment of their inclinations, than that they should make both themselves and their parents for ever miserable, by an unfortunate and undutiful marriage.

Honour thy father and thy mother, that thy days may be long upon the land which the Lord thy God giveth thee.

In a former discourse upon these words, I shewed you, that this duty of honouring our parents was of great extent; that it comprehended, first, the duty we owe to our kings and governors, who are the

our fathers of their country; secondly, the duty we owe to our spiritual pastors and teachers, who have discharged the best offices of parents towards us, in teaching us true principles of religion and virtue; and, thirdly, the duty you owe to your natural parents, all those whom the providence of God hath placed in their stead; which consists of three parts: first, reverence; secondly, obedience; and, thirdly, a grateful retribution of the benefits that we have received from them.

Under the first head, I shewed you, that the duty of reverence to your parents discovered itself both in words and actions; in modest and respectful language to your parents, and a dutiful submissive demeanour towards them. A remarkable instance of which I shewed you, in the behaviour of Joseph to a poor, old, blind, decrepit father, when he himself was in the highest point of glory and wisdom. (Gen. xlviii.)

Under the second head, of obedience due to parents, I shewed you the great stress that God Almighty hath laid upon this duty; how strictly it was enjoined in the holy scriptures; the blessings promised to it, and the curses and signal judgments of God denounced against the transgression of it in the law of Moses; which placed the crime of disobedience to parents upon the same foot with that of blasphemy against God! that the stubborn and undutiful child was to be stoned to death, like the blasphemer.

I shewed you also, that this duty to parents was in the highest veneration among the wiser heathens; the ancient Romans, in their best days of virtue; and the present Chinese, with whom undutifulness to parents undergoes, at this day, the most dreadful punishments that can be imagined.

I come now to the third thing proposed; which was to shew you, that you must honour your parents, as by reverence and obedience, so likewise by a thankful and grateful return of all the blessings and benefits conferred upon you by them, as far as you are able, and they are in need. And thus the apostle expressly enjoins, (1. Tim. v. 4.) If any widows have children or nephews, let them learn first to show piety at home, and to

requite their parents. The apostle mentions the children of widows in particular, because widowhood is the condition in life most subject to want and distress; and where children, taking the advantage of the weakness of a helpless mother, are most apt to be rebellious and undutiful: the purpose of the apostle in this precept being to imply, from this particular instance, the duty of obedience, and support, and retribution, due from children to parents, whenever the ill state of their affairs requires it; and even when they are least in a condition to exact their gratitude, or punish their disobedience. A remarkable instance of this piety and reverence due to parents is in the behaviour of Solomon to his mother Bathsheba, (1 Kings, ii. 19.) when she came to solicit him in favour of Adonijah; for the text tells us, that the king rose up to meet her, and bowed himself unto her; and sat down on the throne, and caused a seat to be set for the king's mother; and she sat on his right hand. This he did to a widow mother, himself a king, the wisest of all mankind, and then the mightiest monarch of the whole world. He knew the duties of life rose with its grandeur, and gave new lustre to it: his enlarged and generous soul could not bear to have his piety less exalted than his power. And it is well known that there are, at this day, princes in the world, whose veneration for their parents will not suffer them so much as to sit down in their presence. And, God knows, the pious returns due from children to parents are at once the strongest dictates of gratitude and justice, and are but a poor retribution for all the care and expence of education, for all the anxious hours, and sleepless nights, that have been passed in solicitude for our welfare, and in distress for our ill health, and ill conduct. And will you requite all this affection with ingratitude and neglect? will you let them suffer under any necessity which you can relieve, who supported you for so many years of helpless want? will you despise their persons, of whom yourself are a part? Surely, if the ingenuity of nature, and the principles of reason and virtue, are not quite extinguished in you, the love solicitude your parents have long felt for you will exact ample returns from you : if not in equal measure, (which perhaps is not possible,) yet in the fullest, the amplest, the most acceptable that is in your power to make.

The course and compass of God's providence, and his methods of establishing and evidencing the measures of reciprocal duty, is no-where more remarkable than in the mutual obligations between parents and their children (I say the course of God's providence is no-where more remarkable, than in the measures of duty and obligation established between parents and their children); the child comes into the world naked and helpless, and, from himself, more destitute of the natural means of security and support, than almost any of the inferior creatures. In this exigency, the parental care and tenderness steps in to his relief; supplies all his necessities, and relieves all his wants; bears with all his untowardly dispositions, at an age when he is neither capable of being corrected, or convinced; and not only provides the properest food for him, when he is incapable of providing any for himself, but likewise administers it when he is incapable of feeding himself; bears with all degrees of his folly and impertinence; listens to all his trifling and idle enquiries, not only with patience but with pleasure; till they gradually conduct him to health, and strength, and knowledge; but the child is not long arrived at this perfection of his nature, before his parents begin to fall gradually into the same infirmities, through which they but lately conducted and supported their children; and to need the same assistance which they lately lent. And, first, they begin to grow sickly; and then they call for the aid of that health which they cultivated and took care of in their children. The loss of cheerfulness and good humour commonly succeeds the loss of health; the old parents are uneasy, and fret at all about them. and now is the time for children to return all that tenderness and patience to their parents' peevishness, without sourness or reproof, which their parents had long lent them in all their childish perverseness, at an age when they were not capable of being corrected. In the next place, the old parents grow troublesomely talkative and (as youth is too apt to think) impertinent; and dwell eternally upon the observations and adventures of their times, and earlier years. Remember, you also had your time of being talkative and impertinent, and your parents bore with you; but, with this difference, you asked them silly and trifling questions, and they now tell wise and useful observations. But are troublesome, because they tell too often. The answer to this is very obvious; if your parents bore with your folly, you may well bear their wisdom: and although, perhaps, they talk more than is necessary to inform you of present things, yet their conversation turns mostly upon things past, perhaps past many years before you came into the world, and, consequently, such as they must know a thousand times better than you; or, though they should talk more than is necessary to inform you, they do not talk more than is necessary to inform your servants, or your children, who are now come to an age of asking many questions; and, therefore, Providence hath well appointed, that their grandfather or grandmother are now in an humour to answer them all, and to supply them with a store of useful observations which they want; nay, which they want to hear over and over again; which they want to have inculcated a thousand times; and which, without this assistance, would require a course of years to acquire for themselves. So that this humour of talkativeness, which is commonly thought so troublesome in old people, hath its use, and is most excellently appointed by Almighty God. But, say it were not, the children, in bearing with it, do but barely return their parents what they long since owed them.

In the next place, the strength of the old parents fails them, and they cannot walk without a support: but, sure, you will not let them want one! How many years did they bear you in their arms! How many more did they lead you when you would be, and saved you from falling, and from danger! And will you now suffer those old limbs to totter and fall to the earth, which so often supported and saved yours, when they were weak and tender, and unable to support and save themselves? Certainly you will not;

you cannot at once be guilty of so much cruelty and ingratitude. In the last place, the understandings of the old parents begin to fail, and the strength of their minds doth not long outlive the strength of their bodies; but decays gradually, till they become again children; their teeth fall, and their tongues fail, and they are once more infants; and are confined to their beds, as they were at first to their cradles. This is the last stage of life, and here they demand all that care, and compassion, and tenderness, at your hands, when they are just going out of the world, which you called for at theirs, when you first came into it.

Thus is the course of nature fulfilled, and the circle of God's providence completed. And what child, that had the least remains of gratitude or goodness, would not be delighted to pay off this great debt of nature, to pursue this round of filial duty, in a conscientious discharge of all the good offices they owe their aged parents? Nay, what child, that had any goodness, would not regard this retribution as his greatest honour and happiness? What child, that had any goodness, would wish to live longer in this world, than whilst God inclined his heart to this delightful and glorious branch of his duty? For, surely, it is in this respect, more than in any other whatsoever, that Solomon's observation is verified, when he tells us, that fathers are the glory of their children.

And here we see, in part, the reason of the reward of long life promised in the text to dutiful children: for, as nothing so naturally shortens the lives of parents, as the misery and distress brought upon them by the disobedience and impiety of their children; and, on the other hand, nothing so greatly contributes to the peace and happiness of parents, and, of consequence, to their health and life, as the obedience and piety of their issue; nothing can be a more suitable reward of that piety than length of life: and surely the blessing of long life, annexed to the duty of honouring the father and mother, is no-where so complete, is no-where so perfect a blessing, as when the child hath the happiness to pay off the great debt of gratitude to his aged parents, to return some part of what he owes to them, for support and correction, for affection and tenderness, for example and instruction; and, in one word, for all the blessings of a religious and virtuous education. A debt for ever to be paid, and never to be discharged; and therefore, Homer, in his usual strength of just and fine thinking, mentions it as a calamitous circumstance in the death of a young hero, that he was cut off in his bloom, before he had made any retribution to his parents for his education and support—ἀλλ' τοιαυτὴ θρηνηὶ φίλους ἀνέθηκεν.

Nay, although a parent were faulty, and failed in any or all these instances, yet still humanity calls upon us to compassionate their infirmities; and generosity should prompt us to upbraid them with our goodness, and to pay where we did not owe. There is an instance of heathen piety in this point, that Christians should blush at: T. Manlius was ill treated, and turned out of doors, by a severe father, who was soon after called to an account by the tribune for this, and some other part of his conduct. A day was appointed for his trial, and every one concluded his life was lost. The son heard of his danger, and, without saying a word to any mortal, went secretly to the tribune, and enquired about it. The tribune answered, that what he had heard was truth; and that a principal part of the accusation against him was a cruel treatment he, his son, had received from him. Upon this, Manlius puts a dagger to the tribune's breast, and vowed immediate death to him, if he did not that moment drop the prosecution. The tribune, in terror of his life, solemnly swore he would, and did accordingly; and the next day reported the whole truth to the assembly; and the father was acquitted for the generosity of the son. How few sons are there now in the world who would make as generous a return to the tenderness and fondness of their fathers, as this son did to the cruelty of his!

There is also a remarkable instance of filial piety in the history of China. In the reign of the Emperor Yuen Ti, a mandarin was condemned to death; and was guilty enough to deserve it. He had the good fortune to have a daughter affectionate and dutiful to him, beyond the ordinary measures of filial piety; who addressed the Emperor in his behalf, presenting a memorial to him, wherein she offered herself a slave for life, to save the life of her father. The emperor, struck with so extraordinary an instance of piety, pardoned the father, and left his daughter in her freedom (Churchill's Collect, vol. i. p. 164.) And this was the more remarkable, inasmuch as daughters are little regarded by the Chinese, and often exposed.

There is one instance of filial obedience in the Scriptures, and of the great regard which God hath to it, both of a very extraordinary nature. Jonadab, the son of Rechab, had laid his commands upon his sons, that neither they, nor their descendants should drink wine, or build houses, or till the earth for ever; but that they should lead a pastoral life, and dwell in tents. This command of their father both they and their children so religiously obeyed, for many generations, that, in the days of Jehoiakim, the son of Josiah, they gave a public proof of their piety to their parent in the temple, and in the presence of the prophet, as you may read in the xxxvth chapter of the prophesy of the prophet Jeremiah, the 1st and the following verses. And although these commands of their father Jonadab had no strict claim to their obedience, either from the law of Nature or the law of God, but might well enough be dispensed with consistently with both; yet God (to shew the regard he hath for piety to parents) was graciously pleased to reward their obedience in a very extraordinary manner; as you may read in the forecited chapter, at the 18th and 19th verses. And Jeremiah said unto the house of the Rechabites, Thus saith the Lord of Hosts, the God of Israel; Because you have obeyed the voice of Jonadab your father, and kept all his precepts, and done according to all that he hath commanded you; therefore, thus saith the Lord of Hosts, the God of Israel—Jonadab, the son of Rechab, shall not want a man to stand before me for ever.

And thus we have gone through the several parts of a child's duty to his parents, and have shewn you the great regard that Almighty God beareth to filial piety. I have shewn, that you are to honour your parents in words and actions, with expressions of respect and reverence, and with a modest and submissive behaviour, with a dutiful obedience to all their lawful commands, and a grateful retribution of all the blessings and mercies you have received from them: remember the blessing of long life promised by God to your obedience, and assure yourself that blessing, well used, will end in a blessing of life everlasting. On the other hand, remember the dreadful impression pronounced upon neglect, and impiety, and disobedience to parents. Remember whose eye it is that the ravens of a valley shall eat, and whose light it is that shall be put out in obscure darkness; in obscure darkness in this world, and eternal darkness in the next; even his, that curseth his father or his mother; and his, that mocketh at his father, and despiseth to obey his mother. Nor are these curses due only to him that insults and abuses his parents, but also to him that slights and neglects them; for so we read, (Deut. xxvii. 16.) cursed is he that setteth light by his father or mother: and all the people shall say, Amen. But if all this cannot move you, if you have no compassion for your own immortal souls, have some pity upon your afflicted and aged parents. (I speak this to an audience*, which I hope is, I am sure ought to be, more sensible in this point, than any other of a different condition in the whole world.) My own experience (in this place*) hath fully informed me, of the infinite, the unspeakable concern of parents, for the well-being of their children, and their much more unspeakable sorrow and affliction for their miscarriage. I have seen such joy rising in the eyes of a happy parent, upon the receiving a glad account of his son's conduct, as hath infused new transport into my own heart; and on the other hand, I have seen such distracted looks, such fixed distress, such tears of anguish, from the eyes of unhappy parents, as have pierced my heart. If your parents' grief make this impression upon the breasts of strangers, can you be insensible of it? Is there in nature a greater instance of cruelty, than to give calamity and affliction where we owe joy and transport, and who could pay it with double happiness to ourselves? Was ever any instance of humanity devised like that of making those wretchedly miserable, who have rendered the business of their lives to make us wretchedly happy? Murder is, in every instance, and under the most alleviating circumstances of passion and provocation, a most heinous and detestable sin; but, the bringing down a parent's grey sorrow to the grave, is murder in its dreadfullest shape! I have often viewed the condition of executioners, who are forced, from the misery of their circumstances, to inflict the necessary severity of the law upon the basest of mankind. I should die to think of punishing my own parent, although he were a malefactor; but to punish an innocent and a good man, to punish an innocent and a good woman, my tender parent, and my best friend: and that too with such anguish as is not in the power of tyranny—O God! deliver all that fear thee from so exquisite a calamity!

If any of you that hear me have been guilty of this sin, make haste to repent of it; for, surely judgment is gone out against it; and nothing less than a thorough repentance, the repentance of our whole lives, can arrest the vengeance due to it. If any of you are in a course of vice or idleness, or in any purpose of disobedience or displeasure to your parents, let this single consideration stop you short. Will you indulge your own idle purposes, or vicious pleasures, or obstinate perverseness, at the expense of your parents' happiness? Will you live idle and wanton, to make them labour under affliction and sorrow all their days? Will you add murder to iniquity? If vice were attended with no other evil; if neither poverty, nor disease, nor infamy waited upon it; if there were no such thing as a heaven or hell hereafter; if neither death nor damnation pursued it; the single consideration of misery to your distressed, afflicted parents should make you dread in every instance, and shun it in every shape. Which that we, may all

By PATRICK DELANY, D.D.

The Duty of Servants to their Masters.

EPHES. vi. 5, 6, 7, 8.

Servants, be obedient to them that are your masters according to the flesh, with fear and trembling, in singleness of your heart, as unto Christ: Not with eye-service, as men-pleasers; but as the servants of Christ, doing the will of God from the heart; With good-will doing service, as to the Lord, and not to men: Knowing, that whatsoever good thing any man doth, the same he shall receive of the Lord, whether he be bond or free.

SERVITUDE seems to have been originally founded in the natural inequality in the abilities of men: for as some men, from the advantage of greater prudence and more extensive knowledge, are fitted to direct and preside in the conduct of affairs; so others, for want of those advantages, and through a natural incapacity of providing and directing, were obliged to submit themselves and their concerns to the guidance and discretion of other men. And as this difference of abilities occasioned as great a difference in the possessions of men, upon the establishment of property in the world, from hence also arose another reason of servitude; forasmuch as some men being entirely destitute of property, or at least such a portion of it as was sufficient for their support, were forced to let themselves out to hire, and give their labour in exchange for the necessaries of life. And as these compacts were originally established for life, (or at least too quickly became so,) with a power of arbitrary correction and chastisements in the master, even to maiming and death; the insolence and cruelty of inhuman masters made the condition of servants a state of unspeakable misery for many generations: and the natural consequence from such ill treatment and inhumanity, on the masters, was an idleness and neglect on the side of the servants, and an utter disregard of their master's interest, whenever it was consistent with their own safety; together with secret resolutions of revenge, upon the first opportunity. And hence it is, that in all the ancient comedies, which are the truest representations of life, the business of the slave is, always to corrupt the son and defraud the master: that is, to injure him in his two nearest concerns; not without violence to his person, whenever he can find any pretence for a disguise to execute his vengeance with impunity.

In this condition Christianity found the world; and as it is the business of that excellent institution to correct the errors of mankind, and improve their manners; to banish violence and villainy, and introduce peace and good-will in their stead; the world has been gradually humanized and improved by it, as in every other instance, so likewise in this of dominion and servitude. That excellent religion which teaches us, that humility, and mercy, and love are the distinguishing badges of our Christian profession, could not fail to teach us the duty of treating our fellow-creatures with gentleness and humanity, and inspire us with an utter abhorrence of that cruelty to our Christian brethren, which would ill-become us to the beasts that perish; nay, and would be criminal even there. And hence it came to pass, that the laws of perpetual servitude, and the power of life and limbs, were gradually relaxed and taken away; and mankind restored to their native and original freedom, and social rights. And although many of them cannot yet subsist out of a state of servitude, yet are they under no necessity of continuing in it, for any longer term than they themselves have consented to: so that, if they cannot live in absolute freedom, they have at least what is next to it; for to have it in our power to change our masters after a determined time, and cease to serve whenever the condition of our affairs will allow us, is in the next degree to full liberty. In the mean time, the lives and limbs of servants are as well secured to them, at least in this part of the world, as their masters to them; and to deprive them of either is, in the eye of the law, equally criminal. But then, on the other hand, that masters should not be put in a worse condition, by the diminution of their powers and prerogatives over their servants, the Christian religion hath now bound all the duty and fidelity upon the consciences of servants, which before were only the effects of restraint and fear. Hence it is, that St. Paul, in the words of my text, enjoins servants to pay all kind of observance to their masters, from the motives of a good conscience, and a sense of duty towards God; assuring them that an honest discharge of their duty in this point is highly acceptable in the sight of God, and will have its reward. Servants, be obedient to them that are your masters according to the flesh, with fear and trembling, in singleness of your heart, as unto Christ: Not with eye service, as men-pleasers; but as the servants of Christ, doing the will of God from the heart: With good-will doing service, as to the Lord, and not to men: Knowing, that whatsoever good thing any man doth, the same shall he receive of the Lord, whether he be bond or free.

Now, the business of this discourse shall be, from these words of the apostle, to explain and enforce the duty of servants in all its parts; which I shall endeavour to do, in the proof and enforcement of the following propositions.

First, Servants are to obey their masters; and, secondly, they are to be faithful to them.

First, I say, they are to obey, their masters. And this necessarily arises from the nature of servitude; for the very condition of that compact is, that one man shall submit his will and actions to the discretion and direction of another: and therefore a servant is supposed to have no will of his own, where his master is concerned; but to submit himself entirely to the will of his master, and to obey all his lawful commands.

By lawful commands are meant all such as are not contrary to the laws of God, or the community: and the reason of this is evident; because all mankind are under prior obligations to God and society, and therefore all other engagements must yield to these; and, whenever they happen to be inconsistent with them, they immediately cease, and become null and void. Therefore, if your master should command you to lie or steal, to defame or defraud, or commit any vice or villainy whatsoever, there you are absolutely to disobey him; because God hath commanded you not to do any of these things; and the apostles have taught us, that we ought to obey God rather than men. But as long as the master's commands are within the bounds of religion, and the laws of the land, so far the servant is obliged to submit, and pay entire obedience to them; and this he is to do with fear and cheerfulness.

First, He is to obey with fear! Servants (saith the apostle,) be obedient to them that are your masters according to the flesh, with fear and trembling. Now, where men find themselves obliged to a dutiful and conscientious obedience, it is unavoidable but that they must be afraid of giving any offence, or provoking to anger and resentment, by neglect and disobedience. Fear is a natural restraint upon the giddiness and perverseness of our nature: it awakens all our caution and diligence, and makes us attentive and observant: it makes us careful to understand the directions of our superiors, and diligent to execute them. And therefore we may say of it in this case, as Eliphaz does to Job, Is not this thy fear, thy confidence? The sense of a proper awe upon our minds gives us the best assurance of our having a due regard to the commands of our superiors, and the discharge of our duty. Besides this, fear is the great principle of prudence, as well as industry: it awakens the abilities of the soul, sets them to work upon their proper objects, and urges them to their proper ends. Almost all knowledge, as well as discipline and virtue, are founded in fear. The fear of the Lord, saith Solomon, is the beginning of wisdom; a good understanding have all they that do thereafter. And as the fear of the highest authority naturally leads us to the highest and most excellent wisdom (the knowledge of the laws and will of our Creator); so the reverence we owe to the inferior degrees of it leads us to proportionable degrees of discretion and prudence in the conduct of our lives. And therefore servants are to be awfully observant and obedient to the commands of their masters, not only for conscience sake, but likewise on account of that improvement of their own minds and manners, which such a reverence and fear of authority will naturally inspire. But,

Secondly, Servants are to obey with cheerfulness; with good-will doing service, saith the apostle: and therefore they are carefully to avoid all that sullen and surly behaviour which renders their persons hateful, and their best services disagreeable. A sourness and restiveness to the commands of superiors is a sure indication of inherent pride, that disdains subjection; and is much better fitted for insolence in power, than obedience in subjection. And this spirit of insolence is so frequently to be met with in servants, that a man who makes right reflections upon it will find infinite reason to bless the good providence of Almighty God, by whose wise appointments so many turbulent and malignant spirits were placed in a condition of the lowest subjection; who, had they been raised to dominion and rule, would have been the greatest monsters of oppression and tyranny that ever the world produced. Histories of all ages are full of examples to this purpose: and that this is the sense of mankind upon the point, may be collected from the proverbs of all nations, which have not failed to observe upon the remarkable insolence of persons raised from a low condition to any heights of fortune. And this is so apparent in a thousand instances, that (as Sylla is said to have seen many Marius's in Caesar) some men of good understanding have been confident, that they have observed many Neroes in a common footman, or day-labourer: and therefore persons of this character, instead of indulging their innate pride, in insolence and sullenness to their superiors, should endeavour, to the utmost of their power, to subdue it to the dictates of their duty: and remember, it was the great goodness of Almighty God, to place them in that low condition of life, where the malignity of their nature would have the least room to exert itself; and where they have avoided much of that guilt, and that punishment, which higher degrees of power and influence would have devolved upon them. And this motive to modesty and submission in servants will be much strengthened by considering that pride and stiffness will af-ways expose them to ill treatment. A modest demeanour, joined to a readiness to execute the master's commands, is such an indication of a good mind and good will to their service, as naturally wins their affection, and inclines them, in return, to do you all the good offices in their power; and to make the yoke of servitude sit as light and easy upon you as they can; whereas the contrary behaviour will always excite them to such degrees of rebuke and correction, as perhaps you can very ill bear; and yet are obliged in conscience to submit to, whether they be just or unjust. Servants, saith St. Peter, in the 2d chapter of his first epistle, at the 18th and following verses—Servants, be subject to your masters, with all fear, not only to the good and gentle, but also to the froward; for this is thank-worthy, if a man for conscience towards God endure grief, suffering wrongfully: for what glory is it, if when ye be buffeted for your faults, you take it patiently? But if, when you do well, and suffer for it, ye take it patiently; this is acceptable with God. From hence we learn, that servants are not only obliged to submit to the just corrections of their masters, but likewise to such as are the effects of frowardness and ill temper. And as nothing is so apt to sour the temper of the best masters as sullenness and insolence in their servants, so nothing is more apt to bring unjust correction upon them; because it makes every thing they do disagreeable, however right in itself; and urges the master to lay hold on all opportunities and pretences of subduing and mortifying that evil spirit by the sharpest and severest correction. Whereas, on the other hand, humility and meekness have the happiest effects upon the dispositions of all they deal with: they turn the edge of the sharpest rage; they are like wool-sacks to the fiercest instruments of war; their yielding softness abates their violence and subdues their force. Meekness is, in this respect, like charity; for as it beareth all things, so likewise doth it cover a multitude of sins. A soft answer (saith Solomon) turneth away wrath: but grievous words stir up anger. And again, By long forbearance is a prince persuaded, and a soft tongue breaketh the bone.

That is, gentle and modest replies soften the most hardened and obstinate dispositions; and descend, as the Psalmist expresses it, like oil into the bones. Modesty and humility are as the grave ground in a picture, which sets off the fairest colours, and shews all the figures to greater advantage. Modesty, in a servant, places all his actions in the best light; and inclines the most froward and perverse masters to bear with their infirmities, and put the best construction upon all their conduct.

But farther, Servants are not only to submit to the correction of their masters, but they are to profit and become better by it; for amendment and reformation are the end of all correction: and therefore servants must not think they have done enough, when they have listened calmly to the master's rebuke, or submitted patiently to his chastisement; for all this is to no purpose, unless they are amended by it. And therefore they are to observe, and reflect carefully upon the reasons and circumstances of their miscarriage and misbehaviour, whenever they have committed a fault; and make serious resolutions of more care and better conduct another time. For example: this was the effect of sloth and idleness. Thy conceit brought upon me. Had I listened to good advice, I might have avoided this mischief; and so on. And forasmuch as the business of most servants lies within a very narrow compass, the sum of their employment being a train of the very same low offices repeated every day, with very little variety; it is evident, that as there is but a very moderate degree of capacity required to enable them to know their duty, so likewise as moderate a degree of care and diligence will enable them to discharge it as they ought; and therefore, whatever excuse there may be for the first committal of faults, there can be none for the frequent repetition of them, especially after correction; for even brute beasts will learn to shun those actions that are attended with punishments, even against the instinct of nature. They will learn to fly from meats and drinks that are naturally very agreeable and desirable to them: and therefore, for reasonable creatures to commit the same faults to which they can have no natural instinct after frequent rebuke and correction, is in truth to become more than brutal; to act even below the beasts that perish. And therefore it is no wonder, if the common end of such incorrigible creatures is utter ruin and destruction. The master grows weary of correction, and lets them go their own way; and their own way being the way of vice and villainy leads directly to infamy and the gallows. And indeed, this is also God's way of dealing with incorrigible sinners: for whom he loveth, he chasteneth; but when chastening hath no effect for their amendment, he delivers them over to a reprobate sense.

And thus much in proof and explication of the first proposition I laid down; namely, that servants are to obey their masters.

I come now to the second proposition I proposed to speak to; and that was, that servants are to be faithful to their masters.

And this faithfulness is of two sorts: the first consists in an honest discharge of duty to them, in every thing they employ you about, to the best of your abilities. If in bodily labour, you are to labour in their service as far as your health and strength will allow: if in the abilities of your mind, you are to serve them to the best of your understanding, without injuring their affairs by sloth, or delay, or negligence: and this kind of fidelity is opposed to eye-service.

The next sort of faithfulness consists in being true and just to your masters in every thing committed to your trust: and this fidelity is opposed to fraud and theft.

First, I say, you are to serve him with an honest diligence, without idleness, neglect, or delay: and this the apostle requires, when he enjoins servants to be obedient to their masters, not with eye-service, as men-pleasers, but as the servants of Christ, doing the will of God from the heart. That is you are to employ yourselves diligently in your master's service, not barely whilst his eye is upon you, and you are apprehensive of being chastised for your idleness; but at all times; even when he is least likely to see or to punish your neglect. And this you are to do in discharge of a good conscience, because you are paid for it: your time and strength are no longer your own, when you are hired; they are your master's; and to be employed in his service; and consequently you cannot employ them as you please, but as he directs: nor can you misemploy them, or withhold them from him, without manifest fraud and injustice. Robbing a man of the time he hath bought of you is just as wicked as to rob him of his money, or his goods, or any other purchase he hath paid for. The injustice is exactly the same in both; and therefore the apostle saith, you are to be obedient to your masters, not with eye-service, as men-pleasers; but as the servants of Christ, doing the will of God from the heart; that is, you are to discharge the duties of your service out of a sense of conscience, in full assurance that in so doing you do what God requires of you; for God requires justice in all your dealings, and will severely punish the neglect and violation of it: and therefore, although your master doth not behold your idleness, God sees it, and will require a severe account of it; and you can no more escape his vengeance than you can avoid his sight: besides, it has pleased God so to order the state of things here below, that diligence and industry are the sure way to health, and credit, and prosperity in the world.

Idleness is able to destroy the best constitution of body and mind that ever was framed! and I myself have observed beggars, who began in sloth, end in real infirmities, and a ruined constitution. And it is notorious of numbers of people that they lose their limbs for want of using them; whereas all the powers of soul and body are remarkably improved by application and exercise. Milo, who had just strength enough the first day to lift a calf, by constant practice of lifting him every day, became at last to have strength enough to lift him, even when he was grown up into an ox: and the greatest prodigies of wisdom and science that ever appeared in the world had their beginnings in the same low rudiments of knowledge with the rest of mankind. Men are born, in the general, nearly equal: instruction and industry, culture and diligence, make the great distinctions between man and man. Industry is of so excellent a nature, that it will scarcely suffer any bounds to be set to our improvement; nor is it possible to say, to what strength of body and mind unwearied application will carry us at the last! and therefore Solomon most excellently advises, Whatever thine hand findeth to do, do it with all thy might. A motto, that ought to be graved in characters of gold, over the shops of all artists, as well as the closets of the studious. Solomon well knew the worth of diligence, (and perhaps none but the wisest man that ever lived was acquainted with its full value,) and therefore he is large in the praise of it: He becometh poor that dealeth with a slack hand; but the hand of the diligent maketh rich. Again, The hand of the diligent shall bear rule; but the slothful shall be under tribute. The soul of the sluggard desireth, and hath nothing; but the soul of the diligent shall be made fat. And again, Scest thou a man diligent in his business? he shall stand before kings; he shall not stand before mean men. And therefore, if you will not be diligent and industrious for your masters' sakes, be so at least for your own; to acquire such habits as will strengthen your body and your mind, and raise you to credit and prosperity in the world: and, what is more, will keep you out of idleness, the great parent of vice and wickedness of every kind, which will clothe you with infamy and rags, and bring you to certain ruin at the last; will destroy you, body and soul.

The last duty required of servants is faithfulness to their trust; that is, an honest care and management of all goods and things committed to their charge, without fraud or waste. And this is of all others the highest and most important part of the servant's duty; because his own conscience, and his master's interest, are more nearly concerned in it than in any other: it being oftentimes in the power of a wicked servant, by one hour's wilful villainy in this point, to ruin the best master and wealthiest man. And therefore the apostle, in the words of my text, enjoins servants to be obedient to their masters, in singleness of heart; that is, with an honest and upright mind. And (Titus, ii. 9.) he directs that bishop to exhort servants to be obedient to their masters, and to please them well in all things; not answering again, nor purloining; but shewing all good fidelity. And under this head of purloining are to be reduced all frauds of every kind, all bribes, all false weights and measures, by which the servants are profited, and the master is injured; in short, all possible ways whereby servants are wont to make gain, or interest, or friendship for themselves, to the loss and damage of their masters: for all these ways of gain are downright frauds and thefts, and are but the more criminal, as they are contrived with more subtlety and security: nay, this sort of cheating is much baser, and more villainous, than common stealing; because you do not only defraud your master but you likewise break faith, and betray your trust at the same time: you add treachery to theft! and therefore this villainy is doubly hateful to God and man.

The other way of being unfaithful to your master is by wasting his goods, although without profit to yourself, or suffering them to be embezzled by others; and this is, in effect, and in the consequences of it to your masters, the very same with wilful fraud and theft. For what matters it to your master whether he is injured or ruined by your fraud or by your negligence? So that the breach of trust in you, and the evil to your master, is exactly the same in both. He trusted you with his substance, and you have betrayed him to his damage; it may be, to his ruin.

As the world is constituted, it is impossible to live or transact our affairs in life without confiding in somebody or other, upon a thousand occasions; and on whom can you depend with so much security as on him that eats of your bread, and is bound by all the ties of duty and conscience to be faithful to you? And what advantage would it be to masters, to be secure that their servants would not themselves cheat them, if at the same time, through their idleness or negligence, they suffer others to defraud them? And therefore, he that suffers his master to be injured through his fault, although without profit to himself, betrays his trust, and is as criminal in the sight of God, as if he had injured him for his own gain;

nay, rather, he is more criminal; for he that injures his master for his own profit hath some plea, some pretence for his villainy, and some temptation to it; whereas he that injures him without any advantage to himself hath no pretence, not so much as the excuse of a temptation for his wickedness; and therefore such a one takes to himself the most scandalous and detestable character in the world, that of being wicked for wickedness sake.

And here I must take notice, that there is one kind of waste wherein servants are more frequently faulty towards their masters than any other; and that is, waste of food, and this is of two sorts; one is, when they suffer any meats or drinks, under their care, to perish, be lost, or become useless, through their negligence. Now every waste of this kind is a grievous wickedness; inasmuch as, besides the injury to the owners, it is despising the Divine bounty and beneficence; and, in effect, trampling the gifts of God under foot. Which is surely a most shocking complication of insolence and ingratitude! and one would think our blessed Saviour Jesus Christ had effectually guarded against this guilt at the close of that glorious miracle, whereby he fed so immense a multitude with five loaves and two fishes (St. John, ch. vi.); for when he had done so, he gave express orders to gather up the fragments that remain, that nothing be lost. Although this food was produced in all the abundance of Divine munificence, and with all the ease of Almighty power; yet care was taken by the very Creator himself, that not the least part of it should be abused to waste.

The next kind of waste which servants are too frequently guilty of, is the abuse of meats and drinks committed to their care, to the purposes of riot and excess; to make themselves useless to all the duties of their station, it may be, to their own, and to the ruin of others: nay more, oftentimes to the intoxicating the servants of others, so as to make them also useless at best; and too often even destructive to the houses, and limbs, and lives of their masters and mistresses intrusted to them. How dreadful a guilt is this, thus to pervert the purposes of the Divine beneficence! Negligent waste is trampling the gifts of God under foot; but riotous waste is turning his blessings into curses; into curses upon yourselves and others! To how many excellent purposes might those wastes of excess, now so pernicious, be applied! to lighten the labours of life; to soften the bed of sickness, to make the widow's heart sing for joy. What infinite evil doth waste commit! what infinite good doth it prevent, and pervert; and the authors of it, how extensively are they, how effectually, how emphatically wicked!

But there is one point wherein the fidelity of servants is more eminently required than in any other whatsoever, and yet where they are wont to abuse and betray their trust more than in any other: and that is, the care of their master's children. I shall omit a thousand instances of misconduct and abuse, and instance only in two. The first is, that abominable custom among servants, of teaching children vice and wickedness, as the first rudiments of knowledge. And this is so notorious, that, take any child you meet, and it is odds but the first sentence or word he learnt to speak, was either an oath or an ill name: and if servants are taken to task for this villainy, they answer, there is no manner of harm in it, because the poor child does not know what he says. Perhaps he does not; but yet it is more probable that he does; for it is certain, that children often understand words even before they can speak them; and if they do speak some ill words before they understand them, I dare say, it will not be your fault if they continue long in that ignorance; for the same corruption of mind that prompted you to teach them those ill words, will also prompt you to make them understand what is meant by them, as soon as you can; and not only understand, but practise too. Ye wicked creatures! little do you consider, that the first impressions made upon children, always sink the deepest, and last the longest, and are hardly possible to be effaced from the mind. And therefore Solomon rightly advises, Train up a child in the way he should go, and when he is old, he will not depart from it. And the observation is full as true, I am afraid, more so, if you train him up in the way he should not go. Shame is the great guardian of youth, the great barrier that secures them from sin and wickedness; and if that be early taken away, a flood of vice will break in upon them like a torrent, and overwhelm the whole man. Alas! little do ye consider what you will have to answer for at the great day of account, who, in return to all the care and kindness of a good master, have destroyed, perhaps, his only child, and turned the innocence of an angel into the guilt of a devil. I would to God, that, in order to deter servants from this abominable practice, there were laws to make all crimes of this kind punishable by the most tormenting death that ever was invented; and yet, when that was done, it would make but little atonement for those infinitely greater torments of hell, to which those wretches had betrayed so many helpless and innocent infants.

The second instance I shall mention of the infidelity of servants to the children of their masters, and too often to themselves, is flattery; a vice which is founded in the worst corruption of a wicked heart, and is the greatest destroyer of every virtue in the soul; it is a rank manure which raises nothing but weeds in the best soils. Nor is this all; for as it raises and feeds the worst weeds, it kills the best plants, and suffers nothing good and salutary to live near it. A flatterer always puts me in mind of those filthy beasts mentioned by many naturalists, whose way of destroying all that will endure them is by licking them to death.

And thus I have done with the several parts of the servant's duty; and the sum of all that God requires of him, is this; first, that he be obedient to all his master's just commands; that is, such as are not contrary to the laws of God, or the laws of the land: but he is not to obey him in any thing that is evil; therefore he is not to swear, or lie, or defraud, or commit any sort of vice or villainy, in obedience to his master; because God has forbidden him to do any of these things; and he is to obey God rather than man.

Secondly, He is to obey his master with fear. And this will make him cautious and observant; will check the natural pride and perverseness of human nature, and bring him, by degrees, to discretion and prudence; for all wisdom, and all virtue, begins and is founded in fear.

Thirdly, He is to obey cheerfully, with good-will doing service; and therefore he is carefully to avoid all pride and insolence, all short and sullen answers. These are the faults that make servants hateful, and render every thing they do, disagreeable, and expose them to the wrath and vengeance of their master; whereas modesty and cheerfulness recommend both themselves, and every thing they do; and place all their services in the best light.

Fourthly, They are to submit to the corrections of their masters, whether just or unjust; and not only to submit to them, but to amend by them. To be incorrigible even in neglect (and much more in guilt) is a most shameful character; and seldom ends but in utter ruin.

Fifthly, Servants are to use an honest diligence in the discharge of their duty; and this, in opposition to idleness and eye-service; and this they are to do, first, for conscience-sake towards their masters, because God requires it of them: and, secondly, for their own sakes, because diligence and industry are the sure means to health, and credit, and prosperity in the world.

And, in the last place, Servants are to be true and just to their masters, and faithful in the care and discharge of all trusts committed to them (especially the care of his children); and are neither to injure or defraud them themselves, nor to suffer others to do so; because all the injury you do your master, if it be for your own profit, is theft; and the worst of all thefts, because it is attended with treachery and breach of trust; and if it be without profit to yourself, the injury to your master, and the breach of trust in you, is still the same; and you are at the same time more inexcusable, because you commit wickedness for wickedness sake.

And now, my brethren, when you have discharged all these parts of your duty, the next thing incumbent upon you as good Christians, is to be content with that low condition of life in which it has pleased God to place you? and you will be content, if you consider, that God governs the world; and that all his appointments are the appointments of the wisest and the best of all beings. And therefore, whatever state of life he assigns us, must be the very best that could be assigned us. Had you been placed in a higher station, how can you tell what pride and insolence, what vice and villainy you had been exposed to, which might have ended in the destruction both of your body and soul? And therefore, instead of repining at your condition, you are to bless God, who hath not left you into so great temptations as wealth, and power, and grandeur are, but delivered you from evil. If you suffer from a severe master, consider, that although you might not have deserved chastisement at his hand, you have deserved that, and much more, at the hand of God; and what is it to you, by what instrument it pleases God to execute his correction upon you? And this you know, that if, when ye do well, and suffer for it, ye take it patiently, this is acceptable with God. Consider moreover, that although your condition is subject to many inconveniences, yet, in the midst of these, it has one great and peculiar advantage; and that is, that you are freed by it from some, if not all the great anxieties of life. For what is all that, for which the sons of men toil and disquiet themselves in this vale of misery, but a little food and raiment, and a convenient shelter from the wrather? and two of these the very worst of you have ready provided to your hands, at your master's expence, without any care or trouble of your own; and many of you have all three. But what above all gives the great and distinguishing advantage to your condition is this: that as you have less to be anxious for in this world, you have less to be answerable for in the next; to you less is given, and of you less is required. What are all the power, and wealth, and dominion of this world, but so many great stewardships, of which the owners must give a severe account to their great Lord and Master at the last day? And what man in his senses would wish to have a long and heavy account upon his hands at the great day of judgment? Do but imagine a mighty potentate, summoned together with his meanest vassal, to the great tribunal of God; and the question fairly put to him, What hast thou done with all that wealth and all that power I committed to thy charge? Give an account of thy stewardship. Alas! where is that mighty man upon earth, that could give clear and satisfactory answers to these questions? Who would have wealth, who would have power, who would have a great estate, who would have an empire, upon these terms? Whereas, when the poor servant is questioned, if he has been a good man, his accounts are short, and his answers are easy: Lord, I have served thee, and been faithful to my master; I had but little, and I did my diligence gladly, to give of that little. And the Lord shall answer, Well done, thou good and faithful servant; thou hast been faithful in a few things; I will make thee ruler over many things: enter thou into the joy of thy Lord.

To which blessed sentence, God, of his infinite mercy, grant we may all be happily entitled, through the merits and mediation of Jesus Christ. Amen.

SERMON CXXI.

By PATRICK DELANY, D.D.

The Duty of Masters to their Servants.

EPHES. vi. 9.

And ye, masters, do the same things unto them, forbearing threatening: knowing that your Master also is in heaven; neither is there respect of persons with him.

THE apostle having, in the foregoing verses, directed the duty of servants, and urged them to a conscientious discharge of it, from a sense of duty towards God, and the rewards that would await their fidelity from his hand; proceeds, in this verse, to enjoin the masters to do the same by them. Now, by doing the same, is not meant doing the very same things, but doing the same reciprocal duties; that is, as servants are to be faithful and just to their masters, and to perform all parts of their duty towards them, from a regard to conscience, and the rewards of a future state, so likewise are masters to do the same unto them; that is, to perform all the parts of their duty towards their servants, from the same motives and principles. Forbearing threatening: or, rather, as the original word signifies, remitting their threats; that is, not always executing the harsh declarations they have made, or resolutions they have taken up against them; but refraining and receding from the severe sentences they have denounced in their wrath; remembering, that they also have a Master in heaven, whose will they also violate, and whose commands they disobey; and yet, should he execute his just vengeance upon their transgressions, should he be extreme to mark what is done amiss, who might abide it?

From the words thus explained, the business of this discourse shall be, to lay down the duty of masters to their servants in all its parts; and this I shall endeavour to do in the explanation and proof of the following propositions?

First, Masters are to do justice to their servants.

Secondly, They are to correct them in their faults.

Thirdly, They are to set them good example.

Fourthly, They are to allow them means of instruction in their duty towards God, and leisure to perform their duty.

And, lastly, They are to encourage them in well-doing.

First, I say, masters are to do justice to their servants; and this justice consists in two points; first, in not exacting immoderate and unreasonable labour at their hands; and, secondly, in an honest payment of their wages.

First, You are to require no more than an equal and moderate portion of labour from your servants: unlike those cruel Egyptian task-masters, who, as the text expresses it, made the children of Israel, to serve with rigour, and made their lives bitter with hard bondage; and at last proceeded to that extremity of cruelty against them, that they exacted the same hard measure of work from them, without allowing them the materials necessary to the performance of it. Ye shall no more give the people straw to make brick: let them go and gather straw for themselves; and the tale of the bricks which they did make heretofore, you shall lay upon them; you shall not diminish ought thereof; for they be idle. — For they be idle; the common cry of all cruel and unmerciful masters, at the same time that their poor vassals are labouring out their lives in their drudgery. A righteous man (saith Solomon) regardeth the life of his beast; but the tender mercies of the wicked are cruel. A man that hath any degree of goodness or humanity, hath compassion for the beasts that perish; and, although they were made for his use, cannot bear to see them labour out their lives in pain and misery; much less can he bear to behold his own fellow-creatures, who were made in the image of God, and are, by nature, his own equals; much less can he behold them, panting and toiling to death in his own service; much less can he hasten their death, and make their lives bitter with hard bondage. This is the conduct of the righteous; but the tender mercies of the wicked are cruel. And indeed there cannot possibly be a surer indication of abandoned corruption, of a disposition depraved to the last degree, than an hardened cruelty to those that are under our power! for he that has put off mercy, the noblest, the loveliest likeness of Almighty God here below, must, of necessity, put off all virtue and all goodness along with it. But let such wretched creatures remember that there is a God, who heareth the voice of the poor, and the oppressed, when they cry unto him, as he did the distressed Israelites, when they groaned beneath their bondage; there is a God that will visit their cruelty, as he did the cruelty of those merciless task-masters, with signal judgments, and severe vengeance.

I know it is a received opinion among many ignorant creatures, who are doomed to slavery, that they are never to cease from their toil in the presence of their masters. This my own experience has led me to observe; and, therefore, it is the duty of all masters, in that case, to let them know, that they do not expect incessant labour from them; forasmuch as no constitution can bear it: and if, at any time, the necessity of their affairs requires uncommon labour and application at the hands of their servants, it is their duty to devise, to contrive, all possible relief and refreshment for them under it, as well as to allow them double relaxation after it. God knows, a state of servitude is a state wretched enough, in its best circumstances; and, therefore, a good man should endeavour to lighten the burden, and, instead of adding to the calamities of life, should make it his study, by all possible methods, to ease and relieve them, to the utmost of his power.

The next point of justice that we owe to servants is, to pay them their wages honestly.

And, if justice be rightly defined, a virtue that gives every one what of right belongs to him, the virtue is never more itself, is never practised in greater perfection, than when it is employed in payments of this kind; for if the price of servitude be not a right, what is? If a man hath not a just claim to what he has earned by the sweat of his brow, there is no such thing as a just claim in the world. And yet it is but too notorious, that many men are so regardless of justice, as well as humanity, in this point, that they do not scruple, first, to screw down their servants' wages to a poor pittance, and then defraud them of that pittance. Little regarding the solemn commands of God to the contrary, and the just judgments he has denounced against this cruel injustice. The wages of him that is hired, saith Moses, (Levit. xix. 13.) shall not abide with thee all night until the morning. And again, (Deut. xxiv. 14, 15.) Thou shalt not oppress an hired servant, that is poor and needy; at his day thou shalt give him his hire; neither shall the sun go down upon it, lest he cry against thee unto the Lord, and it be a sin unto thee. Here we see, that we should be so far from defrauding our servants of their hire, that we are not to withhold the payment of it, even for one day; for, as the text saith, he is poor, and setteth his heart upon it. We cannot tell how strongly his necessities may call for it that moment; nor can we tell how much he may suffer for want of it; it is a trifle to us, but it is his all. It is the price of many long and anxious hours; and, therefore, he setteth his heart upon it. It is like Jacob's purchase of Rachel, dearly earned, and dearly loved: it is a happiness that cometh but seldom, and, therefore, it is inhuman to delay it; and much more to rob and defraud him entirely of it. A master, that had any humanity, would take delight to make his poor servant happy, as soon and as often as he could; and would regard the robbing the labourer of his hire, as the cruellest and and most monstrous robbery in the world. But this is not all; for oppressing the labourer in his hire, however this be done, whether by defrauding him, or delaying payment, or screwing him down to such a miserable price as will not afford him the common comforts of life, or paying him in goods, which he must sell at half-value; all these, the last of these especially, is a crying sin, and one of the crudest oppressions that ever was heard of; and, therefore, it is no wonder, if God, by the mouth of his prophet Malachi, denounces a speedy vengeance against so much cruelty: And I will come near to you to judgment, saith the Lord (Mal. iii. 5.); and I will be a swift witness against the sorcerers, and against the adulterers, and against false swearers, and against those that oppress the hireling in his wages. And, certainly, if we had but a moderate degree of good-nature, joined to common honesty, we should be so far from oppressing the hireling, by diminishing his just demands, that we should rather add to them: we should take delight to see our poor dependents thrive and prosper, and become happy under us. For, surely, the most glorious power and use of wealth is, to diffuse joy, and health, and happiness wherever we come. That noble emblem of Nebuchadnezzar (Dan. iv.) should, in some measure, be that of every man of power and wealth in the world. A flourishing fortune should, in this respect, resemble a flourishing well-grown tree; as it grows great and strong, as the leaves thereof are fair, so should the fruit thereof be much; and it should be meat for many; these are its noblest uses; to relieve and to refresh, to protect from storm and tempest, and project a salutary shade and shelter all around it. And yet some of the great trees of our earth are, in the very reverse of this character, of so malignant an influence, that they keep down and kill all that come under them; and, for that reason, should, like the fruitless tree in the gospel, be cut down; why cumbereth it the ground? And, indeed, it may but too truly be said of them, not only, why cumbereth, but also why curseth it the ground? And, no doubt, in the just judgments of Almighty God, they are oftentimes not only cut down for that reason, but also cast into the fire.

The second duty masters owe their servants is, to correct them in their faults; and this they are to do, not in such violence, and heat of passion, as may unsettle their reason, and carry their correction to excess; nor yet with such a stoic calmness, as might make it be mistaken for deliberate cruelty; but with a temperate degree of just and reasonable resentment, and such as may convince their servants of the evil and error of their conduct. For servants are at all times apt enough to imagine, their masters only correct them to gratify their own ill-nature, or ill-humour, without any regard to their amendment; and, therefore, some pains should be taken to remove this prejudice, and to satisfy our servants, that our reproofs are meant for their good; and that we take much more pleasure in seeing them do their duty as they ought, than in punishing them for the neglect of it. And this will make the duty of servants to their masters, like the duty of mankind to Almighty God, at once an happy, and a reasonable service. But, if this will not do, as God knows, many of them are insensible to all rational methods of conviction, then sharper and severer methods are to be made use of; and, indeed, some servants are of such rough and intractable dispositions, so haughty, and so hardened, that they are not to be subdued otherwise than as we are told a great captain subdued rocks by fire and vinegar. But, although severity be necessary sometimes, care should be taken never to use it, but when it is necessary; and, therefore, that teasing vexatious humour of some masters is carefully to be avoided, that dwells eternally upon a fault, and delights in perpetual taunts and insults, upon the conduct and character of such as are in subjection to them. This, as it is hateful and inhuman, so likewise it is a servile disposition; and is a sure argument of an abject mean mind.

But to proceed.

The point where servants have most need of correction and admonition, and yet meet with least of it, is in relation to their duty to God. Men are apt enough to chastise neglect and error in the conduct of their servants, as far as it regards their own concerns; but the concerns of Almighty God, the interest of religion and virtue, are of less moment with them. And yet, in reality, the dishonour done to Almighty God, and the eternal ruin of the meanest mortal, consequent to that dishonour, are, in themselves, of infinitely more importance than all the concerns of this world put together. Will any loss of this world bear any comparison with the loss of an immortal soul! or any mortal gain weigh against that of saving a soul alive! And, therefore, when masters are immediately on fire for every transgression and neglect of their own will and pleasure, and, at the same time, cold and unmoved at the greatest enormities against the righteous and unerring will of God; it is a sure sign that they have great regard to their own interest, and very little for the glory of God, and the salvation of souls. And, indeed, this is the great and crying complaint in the conduct of masters! their utter disregard of the religion and virtue of their servants! And, to this lamentable neglect, so extensive and universal, is owing the present general corruption among the lower part of mankind. It is notorious, that servants are, at this day, the most abandoned and profligate part of the creation! and, when these marry, or, which is much more frequent, become parents by their crimes, their wretched issue are brought up without any sense of conscience, or fear of God; for how should they inspire any sense of religion into their children, who are utterly void of it themselves? And thus the lower part of mankind go on from ignorance to iniquity, and are, at this moment, arrived to such an unspeakable degree of corruption as is amazing to behold, and dreadful to think of; such as were sufficient to draw down God's heaviest judgments upon the land; so that we may cry out against this nation, as Isaiah does against the Jews, in the first chapter of his prophecy, Ah! sinful nation, a people laden with iniquity, a seed of evil-doers, children that are corrupters! They have provoked the Holy One of Israel unto anger; they are gone away backward. And to what is all this abomination, all this dreadful mass of iniquity, so justly to be ascribed, as to the neglect of masters? Their conniving at the profaneness and irreligion of their servants, and entirely neglecting, either to exhort them to virtue and goodness, or to oblige them to a constant attendance upon the service of God. And, surely, masters of families would never be so careless in an affair of this consequence, did they consider what a severe account they shall give of this conduct at the last. All masters of families are governors and rulers in their own houses; and it is the duty of rulers to watch over the conduct of all persons under their care; especially those parts of it that are of the last consequence to them; and, therefore, as all rulers should be the ministers of God for good, so should they likewise be a terror to evil works. That this was David's sense of the matter, appears from the 101st Psalm, where he solemnly professes, that he will employ none but the righteous in his service, and will not allow any wicked persons to be parts of his family. He that walketh in a perfect way, he shall serve me. He that worketh deceit shall not dwell within my house. He that telleth lies, shall not tarry in my sight. And, as this is the duty of all masters, as much as it was David's, so likewise is it no less their interest; and this upon two accounts; first, with regard to their children; and, secondly, with regard to their fortune.

First, With regard to their children; for, as few parents have leisure, or are able wholly to take care of their children themselves, there is often a necessity of committing them to the care of servants; and it is certain, that, according as those servants are either wicked or well-inclined, the child is early initiated, either in the ways of virtue, or in the ways of vice; and, as earlier habits last longer, and are harder to be defaced, if parents have any regard either to the happiness of their children in this world, or their salvation in the next, nothing ought to be of nearer concern to them than to commit them to the care of virtuous and religious servants in their tender years.

As to the other point, surely nothing can be more the interest of all masters of families, than that all their servants should make a conscience of their business, and should perform all parts of their duty to them in singleness of heart, as unto Christ. And therefore, the sure way to make them good servants, is to make them good men and good Christians; and the sure way to make them good Christians is, besides what hath been already urged, to shew them good example, which was the third thing ⁷ proposed to speak to.

Masters should set their servants a good example. Example sways the whole world, and either ruins or reforms it, as it is good or evil! as kingdoms are influenced by the example of the prince, and armies by the example of their captains, and all societies of men by such as have authority over them; families naturally fall into the imitation of their fathers, and servants are led insensibly into the manners of their masters. A good example is like a light set up on high, to guide mankind in the ways of salvation and truth; and, therefore, our blessed Saviour commands his disciples, and in them all Christians, Let your light so shine before men, that they may see your good works, and glorify your Father which is in heaven. The light of a good life is, indeed, a silent, but it is at the same time a strong, a living, and almost an irresistible exhortation to goodness; its native beauty attracts the love and admiration of all that behold it; and what men admire, they imitate. And if good example hath force enough to draw men to the imitation of it, alas! ill example hath yet a stronger and mightier influence ; it prevails even against exhortation and instruction ; and it is vain for an ill man to exhort to virtue and goodness as long as his practice contradicts his precepts ; for it is much easier to ruin by example than to reform by precept ; as it is far easier to pull down than to build up. And, therefore, it is vain for a lewd, a profane, an idle, and drunken master to expect a modest, a sober, an industrious, and a pious family. And, indeed, how can a wicked master so much as expect that a servant should be faithful to him, for the little pittance he receives from him, when he himself is so notoriously ungrateful and unfaithful to God, in return for all the blessings of life ? If you expect your servants should be honest and good men, let them see you go to church constantly, and behave yourselves with becoming humility and devotion when you are there ; let them see you act honestly and conscientiously in all your dealings ; let them not observe you habitually careless to retire into your closet to your morning and evening devotions ; or rather (not merely to insist upon negative goodness, or ceasing to do evil) let them observe you religiously careful to call your whole family together, to join with you in the worship of God ; let them never hear a loose expression, a rash oath, or a profane jest out of your mouths ; Let your light so shine before them, that they may see your good works, and then will they be naturally led to glorify your Father which is in heaven. And, surely, there cannot be a more lovely, there cannot be so lovely, so glorious an employment in life, as that of leading in the ways of salvation and truth, and conducting to eternal happiness. Captain of our salvation, is the most glorious title that ever was conferred even upon the Son of God ! and, if so, certainly the contrary to all this, the conductor to vice and villainy, the leader to death and destruction, is the dreadfullest employment, as well as the most hateful character in life.

But, fourthly, as masters are to admonish servants in the ways of their duty, and to set them good example, so likewise are they to allow them means of instruction, and leisure to perform their duty towards God. And this may be done at small expence, both of time and money, by allowing every member of your family a Bible and Prayer-book, together with the Whole Duty of Man ; and, if that be too great an expence, allowing one of each to the family in common. And, as the rates of these excellent books are, by the pious charity of some good men, reduced very low, this is an expence that most families can well bear ; or, if any are yet so poor as not to be able to go to this small expence, I am satisfied that, by a modest application to their parish minister, such an invaluable treasure might be easily obtained ; and, when it is obtained, a very small portion of leisure allowed to the servants for reading and contemplation, at proper seasons, will be sufficient for their instruction in that which should be the great business of life, their duty both to God and man ; and this may be done on holidays, and other seasons of leisure ; or, if an hour or two were now and then allowed to servants for this very purpose, as an extraordinary reward of diligence, possibly it might turn to very good account. And, be assured, one hour thus employed will bring a blessing upon all the rest. Or, if this be more than the necessary business of your calling will allow, (as I am satisfied it is not,) the Sabbath is the Lord's ; let that, at least, be allowed your servants, for their instruction in the ways of salvation and life ; and let it not only be allowed, but see that it also be employed in hearing of sermons, and attending upon the public worship of God ; and, above all, take care they are not withheld from the service of God, by being employed in the service of your luxury, vices, and vanities, as is too often the case of cooks and coachmen ! and, if they are sometimes withheld by the necessary duties of their place, be it your care to see those omissions made up by a diligent attendance at other seasons.

The last duty of masters is to encourage their servants in well-doing.

Rewards and punishments are the great springs and wheels that set the whole world in motion ; there is hardly any thing to be done in life without the aid of one or both of these. And forasmuch as there is a pride in human nature that often sets itself against correction, and is restive to reproofs, but pliant and yielding to the least expressions of kindness, it is frequently found, that applause and encouragement have more influence upon us than correction and punishment. Pride is like the rust that seizes and stiffens the spring of an engine, and checks its motion, so that no force can set it to work; but kindness is like oil, which smooths and supple the machine in such a manner that the parts move of themselves. And this gentle method of dealing with our fellow creatures is God's own method of dealing with mankind; who, we are assured, doth not afflict willingly, nor grieve the children of men; who delighteth not in the death of a sinner, but rather that he should turn from his wickedness, and live; and chooses rather to lead us to repentance by his goodness, than to drive us to it by his wrath. And, as prudence and humanity prompt us to take this method of exciting our servants to duty, so justice and equity require, that when they have excelled in it they should be rewarded and encouraged to the utmost of our power; for the same motives that excited them to excel are the best engagements upon them to continue in well-doing. And, God knows, when a servant is truly faithful and diligent in the discharge of his duty, all the encouragement in our power is justly due to him. And, to speak reasonably upon this head, when a man lays out his whole time and care in our service, and makes it the study and business of his life to consult our happiness and our interest, how can such a servant be too much encouraged? or rather, how can he be rewarded enough?

And yet, after all, I am sensible there is one objection to this doctrine, which I do not well know how to get over; and that is, that the greater part of servants will not bear to be encouraged, but are wont to grow so insolent, as soon as their masters have shewn any uncommon regard to them, that they immediately become intolerable, not only to their fellow-servants, but even to their masters themselves. For it is the nature of servile spirits to be either low and creeping, to a fault; or imperious and proud, beyond bearing; and, in truth, I am at a loss what to say upon this head, or what method of conduct to prescribe in relation to such dispositions as these, unless we imitate the conduct of Almighty God, who resisteth the proud, but giveth grace to the lowly. If servants always found that they constantly rose in their master's favour in proportion to their modesty and humility, and, on the other hand, found that every degree of pride threw them into as great a degree of disgrace, this, joined to proper instruction and admonition, would probably have happy effects upon their dispositions. But, in truth, the great evil, which is the foundation of all this pride and perverseness, is the want of a right sense of religion and virtue. If they once knew that humility would make them amiable in the sight of God and man, and that pride would render them detestable to both, they would soon study to obtain the one, and to avoid the other; would earnestly seek after the ornament of a meek and quiet spirit, which, in the sight of God, is of great price; and, above all, they would remember these two fine observations of Solomon, one in the 29th chapter of his Proverbs, and the other in the 16th chapter: A man's pride shall bring him low, but honour shall uphold the humble in spirit. Pride goeth before destruction, and a haughty spirit before a fall. And these proverbs I would recommend to all servants to bear about them, like jewels of inestimable value, and repeat them with their prayers, as the surest charms, not only to preserve them in their places, but likewise keep them in favour both with God and man.

But there are two instances of encouragement, which I have not yet mentioned; and those are, the regard that should be had to the merits of a good servant in the last wills of the masters, and when the servant is past his labour.

As to the first of these: Forasmuch as the small pittance which is paid to servants, under the name of wages, is, God knows, but a poor reward for fidelity and diligence, it is the duty of a master to remember a good servant in his last will; to make the best provision he can for him, against that time when it will be no longer in his power either to reward his fidelity or relieve his wants; and, therefore, I would have a dutiful and conscientious servant always considered in the next degree to a dutiful child, and before a child that was undutiful; agreeably to the wise man's rule, (Prov. xvii. 20.) A wise servant shall bear rule over a son that causeth shame, and shall have part of the inheritance.

As to the second point; to wit, the regard due to a servant when he is past his labour; I think there cannot be a greater instance of cruelty and inhumanity, than to suffer an aged servant, who hath spent the vigour of his youth and health in our service, to be reduced to misery and want, when his infirmities have disabled him from further labour. Humanity would prompt us to take some care, even of a brute, in the same circumstances; for a brute, that had laboured out his strength in our service, that he might not want pasture and shelter for the poor remains of his life; and, surely, much more should it oblige us to take some care of our poor fellow-creatures, of an aged and a faithful servant, in the decline of life. Methinks I hear the old servant crying out to his master in this condition, as David doth to his God in the 71st Psalm; Cast me not away in the time of age; forsake me not when my strength faileth me.

The cases of sickness, or accidental loss of limbs, in our service, which disable from labour, fall also under this head; and are rather more calamitous than the case of old age; and, consequently, call at least for equal compassion and humanity at our hands; and, therefore, the cruelty of those masters is never to be forgiven, who make the misery and misfortunes of their servants, reasons for casting them off. With what face can such creatures cry out to God in their own calamity, as David doth in his distress, Turn thee unto me, and have mercy upon me, for I am desolate, and in misery! O: go not far from me; for trouble is hard at hand, and there is none to help me. Therefore, my beloved brethren, be ye merciful, as your Father, which is in heaven, is merciful, and fail not to shew all the pity and compassion to your poor servants which you yourselves hope for, and will have need of, at the hand of God, your great Lord and Master.

And thus I have done with the several branches of the duty of masters to their servants; and have shewed, I hope, to your satisfaction, first, That you are to do justice to them in paying them their wages punctually and honestly, and not laying more labour upon them than they are able to bear.

Secondly, That you are to correct them in their faults; and that in such a manner as is most likely to avail for their amendment, especially such faults as are committed against the law of God; such as lying, swearing, profaneness, lewdness, and all vices and immoralities whatsoever; and this you must do, as well for their salvation-sake, as also to guard your children from the infection of their manners, who, if your servants are corrupt, will hardly escape being tainted by them.

Thirdly, I shewed you, that you were obliged to set your servants good examples, by honesty and conscience in all your dealings, and by an exemplary life of piety and virtue.

Fourthly, That you were to allow them proper means of instruction in their duty to God and man; the use of Bibles, and other books of devotion, and a proper portion of time to peruse them; the Sabbath, especially set apart for this end, is not only freely to be allowed them, but care is to be taken that it be employed by them in hearing sermons, and attending upon the public worship of God.

And, in the last place, as you are to correct your servants in vice and error, so are you to encourage them in well-doing; to support them when they are past their labour; and make the best provision you can for them at your death: and the consequence from all this will be, that your lives will be easier, and your business be infinitely better done, than otherwise they ever would, or ever will be.

And now, my brethren, if ye know, all these parts of your duty, happy are ye, if you do them.

And, indeed, you ought to do them from the sole motive mentioned in my text, knowing, that ye also have a Master in heaven, neither is there respect of persons with him. The little temporary distinctions of lord and master are calculated only for this world; for, in the world to come, all titles shall vanish, and all distinctions cease, and mankind shall be reduced to their original equality: high and low, rich and poor, the master and the servant, all shall be summoned before the great tribunal of God! all shall appear alike, without precedence, and without distinction, other than what their merit shall give them in the sight of God: with regard to every thing else, equal, as in the grave they rose from.

Good God! how strangely, how entirely, and how sadly will the state of things here below be reversed and changed at the great day of account! when the mighty men of the earth shall be stript of all their ornaments and honours, and the title of good and faithful servant shall be the highest and noblest distinction! Then shall the sons of vanity see themselves reduced to a level with their meanest slaves; and not only so, but shall see some of those slaves placed high above them. How will their proud hearts be mortified, to behold those poor wretches, wretches whom they would now scarce vouchsafe to look down upon, exalted to high degrees of honour and eminence, and themselves reduced to the lowest condition of misery and contempt! so low, that those very slaves shall pity them! so low, as, perhaps, to beg a small charity from the meanest of their creatures; as the rich man in the Gospel, who was clothed in purple, and fared sumptuously every day, was reduced to beg relief by the hand of that wretched creature, whose sores the dogs licked at his gate! to beg, that Abraham would send Lazarus to dip the tip of his finger in cold water, to cool his tongue. How many haughty masters will be reduced to the like sad estate at the last day; sung to their slaves, and sung, as he did, to be denied; and receiving, instead of relief, the same severe return, Thou, in thy life-time, receivedst thy good things, and this, thy slave, evil things, at thy hands; but now he is comforted, and thou art tormented!

Therefore, my beloved brethren, let you loins be girded about, and your lights burning, and ye yourselves like unto men that wait for their lord. Oh! set not your hearts upon the little temporary distinctions of lord and master, but remember that your Master is also in heaven; neither is there respect of persons with him. Remember, that the meanest slave upon earth is upon the same foot of natural equality, and of equal acceptance in the sight of God, with the mightiest monarch in the universe: all equally the sons of God, and heirs of everlasting salvation. What are all the wealth and power of this world upon which we so vainly value ourselves? What are they but great stewardships, of which the owners shall give a severe account at the last day? What then is the great business of life, but to provide, that we may behave ourselves so in this account, that, at the last, we may be found in the character of that faithful and wise steward in the Gospel, whom his lord shall make ruler over his household, to give their portion of meat in due season. Blessed is that servant whom his lord, when he cometh, shall find so doing. But, if that servant shall say in his heart, my lord delayeth his coming, and shall begin to beat his fellow-servants, and to eat and drink, and be drunken, the lord of that servant shall come in a day when he looketh not for him, and at an hour when he is not aware; and shall cut him asunder, and appoint him his portion with the unbelievers.

From which dreadful and intolerable doom, God, of his great mercy, deliver us! that hear me; through the merits and mediation of Jesus Christ, our only Saviour. Amen.

The Duty of paying Debts.

ROM. xiii. part of verse 8.

Owe no man any thing, but to love one another.

THE apostle, having in the foregoing verse enjoined us to render to every one their dues—Tribute to whom tribute, custom to whom custom, honour to whom honour; subjoins as an enforcement of the same precept in other terms—Owe no man any thing. He first expresseth the precept positively; Render to every one their dues; and then, to enforce it yet stronger, he varies his phrase, and lays down the same precept a second time, in negative terms—Owe no man any thing—Owe no man any thing, but to love one another; i. e. discharge every engagement, every obligation you are under, to every man, in every relation of life; take care you owe no man any thing but love and good-will; for that is a debt, which, though you always pay, yet you will always owe; that is an obligation that never ends but with your life.

The precept here delivered is general, and extends to every instance of social virtue; but the business of this discourse shall be to apply it to one particular duty, which is as little practised, and perhaps less taught, than any other; I mean the duty of paying debts; a duty of as great consequence to the well-being of society, as any other whatsoever; as comprehending under it one great and important branch of commutative justice; and yet as utterly and as openly disregarded, as if neither the laws of God, nor man, nor nature exacted it of us. And therefore, to awaken you into a right sense of this duty, I shall consider the evils that attend the neglect of it, both as they regard the debtor, and as they regard the creditor.

And, first, with regard to the debtor.—Nothing is more manifest than that carelessness in contracting debts, and negligence in discharging them, is one of the most unhappy characters in life, and such as draws more evils after it, than can well be counted or conceived; that spirit, as it is the effect, so it is the cause of extravagance. Money borrowed is so much clear gains to a thoughtless mortal that has nothing but the gratification of his pleasures at heart; and with how much more ease, and less interruption, this may be done, the better. The consequences of such a conduct are reflections, which can only proceed from that wisdom which they openly despise, or are utterly incapable of. This, of necessity, gives them up a prey to the artifices of wily villains, that lie in wait to deceive; for there are those in the world whose whole business and purpose of life is to watch and to feed the follies of such extravagants: they give by ounces, that they may receive by pounds. They are in the condition of the husbandman, who commits his seed to the earth, in prospect of a good harvest, greater or less, according to the richness of the soil. They well know that the persons they deal with are bad computers, and worse accountants; and therefore nothing is more easy than to impose upon them in the value of what they vend, or the quantity of what they receive. And if they should at any time happen to be restive, and suspect they are defrauded, the men of the world know very well how to bring them down again to their own terms: they manage them as skilful warriors subdue strong towns; they starve them into compliance: they know it is but holding their hand, and refusing to feed their extravagance, to make them subscribe to any conditions they think fit to impose.

How far do these ^{ye} ^{nstl} ^{ten} outdo the folly of Esau! He sold ^{it} his birthright to gratify a real and craving want, and yet he sinned in selling it; but these men sacrifice theirs to such wants as are false and fantastic; to appetites that will not be satisfied, or at least ought not to be indulged: nay, they oftentimes sacrifice their health, as well as their inheritance, even to wantonness and fulness. The truth of it is, men of this character are, for the most part, in a worse condition than that of Solomon's horse-leech, that hath two daughters, crying, Give, give. Wine and women, play and pleasure, are the daughters of the horse-leech, less limited in their number, but not less craving, wasting, and insatiable; and whoever suffers them to fasten on him is effectually undone. If men contracted debts for the necessities of life, which they could no otherwise procure, they were excuseable; but to purchase needless, nay perhaps pernicious vanities, at the hazard of health, and fortune, and liberty; at the hazard of every thing that is good and valuable in life, is folly past forgiveness : and yet if it were only a folly, it might be borne with. But, in truth, this habit of running thoughtlessly into debt draws many other worse habits after it : lying, swearing, cheating, and all kinds of vice and villainy are its sure attendants ; nay, sometimes, even murder, and an open defiance of public justice, as hath been seen in more than one unhappy and dreadful instance. It is like that evil spirit in the Gospel, who, when he hath gotten possession, taketh with him seven other spirits more wicked than himself ; and they enter in, and dwell there ; and the last state of that man is unspeakably worse than the first.

A spirit of extravagance, long used to be indulged, cannot bear to be restrained or refused : and if it may not be gratified in the usual way, yet gratified it must be, at any rate. If credit be checked in the common course, new channels must be cut, and new sources opened ; and this must be the work of falsehood and fraud, and every wicked artifice that can be devised. By this means the mind becomes corrupt and depraved to the last degree, and the man is gradually fitted for the conversation of fiends. Nay, this sin is as stupid with regard to this world as other sins are with regard to the next ; it sacrifices all the solid and lasting satisfactions even of this life, to small, present, momentary gratifications, without the least thought of the dreadful consequences that await them ; and it ends, even in this world, as other vices do in the next, in the loss of liberty and happiness, and the calamities of a dreadful confinement among cursed spirits : for a gaol is, indeed, another hell upon earth, and the best emblem of that mansion of misery ; where you are surrounded with nothing but sin and affliction ; where abandoned wretches become yet more abandoned by society and example ; by the conversation of miscreants more vile than themselves ; by mixing with the most corrupt and profligate part of mankind ; inflaming their past guilt by new and greater enormities every day ; living in utter defiance of God and goodness : and, for the most part, dying either in a hardened impenitence, or the horrors of despair. And yet this is the end to which the young, the gay, the pleasurable part of mankind are hurrying on, with as much eagerness, as if they thought it impossible ever to be attained too soon. And, indeed, if this were only the pursuit of youthful folly, the evil were in some degree to be endured, because age and experience would be sure to abate it ; but, in truth, it is often the vice of every age, and every condition in life—wherever pride and vanity reign, there extravagant aims are pursued, and fantastic distinctions sought after, at the hazard of every felicity and security in life. Turn your eyes upon the world, and you will behold one half of mankind living apparently above their fortune ; and what is living above their fortune, but living to sure destruction, both of themselves and family, as well as all those they deal with ? One man is above making use of the limbs which God hath bestowed upon him, to convey him where his business calls ; and so rides in a coach for a few months, at the hazard of wanting shoes for the rest of his life, when his folly hath reduced him to his feet.

Another, who hath wherewithal to purchase a house, every way convenient and suited to his circumstances, cannot be content without magnificence, and rooms of state, which are of no use, but to be looked at : these are not to be attained without a foreign fund ; and, just when the building is at the point of being finished, his creditors come and take possession of it, and he and his family are turned out of doors—and, perhaps, without clothes enough to cover their nakedness, or hide their shame ; it may be, too, without knowing how to be sheltered from the inclemency of the weather, or where to seek for a morsel of bread. This is oftener the case, in effect, though not exactly in the circumstances now mentioned, than is commonly imagined ; nor are the instances few or rare, of persons utterly undone by living beyond their fortune. In this condition, abandoned at once by their friends, and by the fund or income by which they subsisted, deserted by every thing but their pride, whither shall the unhappy wretches turn themselves ? Their vanity sets them above all honest industry in a low way ; for that, for the most part, remains with them like a running sore that drains their vitals: and either urge them to starve in an honourable way, or drive them to violent and desperate courses for subsistence, till they end in infamy. And although such a creature is little to be pitied upon his own account, yet is his fall often to be lamented, on account of many others that are involved in his ruin. An honest friend that was drawn in to be bound for him, and is undone by his munificence; or an innocent family that were too young to be partners in his folly, and yet must share his fate, and are given up by it to prostitution or poverty; or an honest and kind parent, who expended more than he could well afford, to bring his son with more advantage into the world: perhaps, too, a virtuous and valuable woman, innocent of his pride, and yet crushed in his fall; though, it is to be hoped, this rarely happens, the wife being too often the great incentive to the husband's vanity; and, of consequence, less to be lamented in the ruin in which she is involved. These, and a thousand such like calamities, are the necessary and unavoidable consequences of profusion and extravagance; of carelessness in contracting debts, and negligence in discharging them; these are the evils which thoughtless mortals draw upon their own heads, and those of their nearest friends, by vanity and unthrift. And yet, great and various as these are, they are few and inconsiderable, in comparison of those brought upon the rest of mankind by the same cursed spirit.

Every one knows that the whole business of trade, by which nations grow great and happy, is carried on by men of diligence and industry, of fortunes, for the most part, too small (at least, at their first setting out) to support them in indolence; and that their profit arises principally from quick returns. It is plain, from hence, that running in debt with tradesmen, and neglecting to pay them in due time, is utterly ruinous to the whole business of trade and commerce; and absolutely destructive of the very principles upon which it is built, and by which it subsists; and yet this is a crime every day committed by men of fortune and quality, with as little remorse as they eat and drink; and, if the tradesman demands his money, it is odds but he is either threatened, or turned into a jest: the son of Sirach's wise observation is here every day verified; The rich man hath done wrong, and yet he threateneth; the poor is wronged, and yet he must entreat also. If threats will not rid these men of their importunate creditors, then are they to be deluded with fair words, and plausible excuses, to pay attendance from day to day, to the loss of more time, and neglect of more business; than perhaps the debt is worth; and so the first injury, instead of being repaired, is doubled. And yet the gentleman debtor, the author of this evil, is so far from repenting of it, that it is odds but he vaunts his wit and dexterity in doing it. As a madman (saith Solomon) who casteth firebrands, arrows, and death; so is the man that deceiveth his neighbour, and saith, am I not in jest?—And, indeed, it is scarce to be conceived how any man can deal more destruction and ruin around him, than by deceiving and breaking faith with the fair trader; for it is well known, his credit, his whole subsistence, depends upon keeping his word, and being strictly punctual in his payments and his promises; and, if he fail in these, he is undone at once. And how is it possible he should not fail, if the gentleman he deals with fail him? He hath no way of raising money but by sale of his goods; and, if those to whom they are trusted will not pay him, it is impossible he can pay his creditors; and, if he do not pay them, it is impossible but he must be ruined, and, perhaps, many more with him. For traders are linked and dependent of one another; and one man's fall throws down many more with him: the shopkeeper is in debt to the maker or the merchant; and these again to the journeyman, the farmer, or the foreign correspondent; and so the ruin becomes complicated, and extended beyond imagination; insomuch that the failure of one man here may affect many others in the remotest regions of the earth; may reach at once from west to east, and from east to west again; and yet the fine gentleman, that thus scattereth firebrands, arrows, and death around him, shall cry, with great complacency to himself, and, perhaps, with great applause from his companions, Am I not in jest? shall pride himself in having imposed upon the credulity of an industrious honest man, (with the added insolence of a contemptuous name,) and appointed him to come for payment the next day after he is gone out of town. And, after all, to what purpose all this fraud, and falsehood, and delusion! none in nature, but to have wherewithal to feed their folly and extravagance; to have to throw away upon a horse, or an harlot; or to pay a play debt—debts of honour as they are called, but, in truth, debts of infamy! debts, which it was infamous to contract, and which it is villainous to pay, to the injury of the honest trader. A gamester, a sharper, that undoes you with false dice, or sleight of hand; a wretch, whom it is a scandal to converse or so much as to be seen with, such a miscreant shall be paid off, though to your utter ruin: every engagement, every security in life, shall be sacrificed to discharge him; whilst the fair dealer that supplied you with the necessities of life is left to rot in a gaol, for the food that fed you, and the clothes that covered you. Can any thing be conceived more monstrous? or is it possible to imagine how human nature can be sunk into a greater degree of corruption than this?

These are the practices of the loose and libertine part of mankind; and, indeed, what better can be expected from that vicious and thoughtless extravagance in which they live? But there is also another race of men, opposite to these in all other respects, who agree perfectly with them, in not paying their debts, and yet are much more criminal on that score; I mean the needy and covetous rich, who cannot pay, either because they have made a new purchase, or because they will not break a sum for which they receive interest. A greedy purchaser is one that will run in debt with all mankind; and, if he can help it, will pay for nothing but houses or lands; nay, by his good will, he will not pay for these, otherwise than by the profits that arise from them. The thoughtless libertine is a man that spends more than he hath, and therefore cannot pay; the greedy purchaser is a man that spends nothing, and hath a great deal, and will not pay, because he would have more: these are the greatest monsters in nature; compositions of covetousness and cruelty! who oppress and distress every one they have to deal with; who will pay no man themselves, and yet suffer no mortal to owe them a penny; they rack their tenants, and grind the face of the poor; they drive away the ass of the fatherless, (saith Job,) and take the widow's ox for a pledge; they cause the naked to lodge without clothing, and they have no covering in the cold; they are wet with the showers of the mountains, and embrace the rock for shelter: men group from out of the city, and the soul of the wounded crieth out. These men are the pest of society, and infinitely worse than robbers upon the high roads: they rob, not from necessity, but from the insolence of power and plenty! in the spirit of calm cruelty and determined villainy! and, to complete their character, they rob oftentimes even under the shew of friendship, with impunity, and without remorse: neither can you guard against them; neither can you bring them to justice when you are injured. And here the condition of the creditor is indeed deplorable; if the tradesman be importunate for his money, he is sure to disoblige; if it be kept from him for a considerable time, he must of necessity be a great loser, because he is deprived of the advantage of turning it in trade all that while. Whereas, if it had been paid him when it ought, he might reasonably hope to have doubled it before that day. And yet, as the case now stands, he has not the advantage of receiving so much as the common interest for it; nay, not only so, but if he lets it lie above a certain number of years, he loses the principal. It is to be presumed, that one reason why the law allows no interest for book-debts, is, because the trader cannot afford to let his money lie out so long as to derive any advantage from it by way of interest; for the interest of money is but a trifle, in comparison of the advantages it may turn to in trade; and therefore the law, to lay tradesmen under a necessity of calling in their money betimes, allows them no interest for it while it is out. But still the difficulty remains how to call it in, since every one knows that the expences of a law-suit may very easily exceed the debt; and, at best, you must of necessity be a loser even by gaining your cause. If indeed the law, at the same time that it prohibited book-debts from bearing interest, had contrived some cheap and easy method of recovering those debts, tradesmen had been well dealt by; but to take away the interest of their debts, and the principal, after some years, and yet leave them no way of doing themselves justice, but at the hazard of their ruin, hath the appearance of great hardship. For, besides the excessive expence of law-suits, the ill-will that such an attempt is sure to draw upon the tradesman is a weight which few men of that rank are able to bear. The man he goes to law with, and all his friends and dependents, are sure to become his mortal enemies from that moment. The debtor, in that case, seems to think himself obliged to abuse the tradesman, and blast his credit as much as in him lies, to justify himself in using him so ill; and blasting a tradesman's credit is the sure way to ruin him at once. It is finely observed of an excellent writer, that credit is to the tradesman what honour is to the gentleman; to a man that is truly such, his honour is as dear as his life; to the trader, credit is as life itself, for he cannot live without it. Few of you would knowingly and deliberately involve yourselves in the guilt of murder; and yet you effectually do this, when you blast the reputation of an honest dealer; for defamation is death to such a one; his bread depends upon his credit, and if he be robbed of it he must starve; and, certainly, stabbing a man to the heart is a much less cruelty than starving him to death. Nay, you are as cruel to your own honour in this case as you are to the tradesman's credit and life; for honour is a strict and nice regard to every virtue in life, and more particularly to truth and justice. And therefore a man of honour that is neither true nor honest, is a contradiction in terms; a man that allows himself in any degree of fraud or falsehood has actually degraded himself from his dignity, and has no more title to the honour than he has to the estate he has forfeited.

But, suppose the tradesman's reputation so well established as to bear up against the load of calumny that is thrown upon him on these occasions; suppose him able to bear the double burden of calumny and a law-suit; yet what will all this avail him? The debtor is a peer, or a parliament-man, or protected by those that are; his person is privileged, and his estate settled; and, if neither of these will do, he bids defiance to the very execution of the law; and you attempt it at the hazard of your life. These are the difficulties that shopkeepers and men in business are forced to struggle with, and too often sink under: and if, in the number of so many bad paymasters as they have to deal with some should be so far touched with compassion or remorse, as not only to discharge what they owe, but likewise to pay interest for it, beyond the obligation of the law, this is reckoned an uncommon mark of liberality and Christian heroism; whereas, in truth, a dealer that is kept out of his money a considerable time, hath no sufficient reparation made him by being paid both the principal and the interest in the end; because both together will be far from amounting to the profit he might reasonably propose to have made by it in trade all that time. For sure no man in his wits would run all the hazards and troubles of trade, who could propose to make as much advantage by the common interest of money as he might expect from dealing with it. And this is a new reason why men should be careful to pay tradesmen in time: because though no accident should hinder you from paying them in the end, yet your clearing off the original debt, together with the legal interest which that sum ought to bear, is far from doing justice to the tradesman, for the damage he has suffered in being kept out of his money so long. So that, when you think you have made him ample amends for detaining what was due to him, you have in truth injured him.

And thus I have endeavoured to lay before you the several evils that arise from running thoughtlessly into debt, and from delaying to pay when it is in our power. And yet this is a vice so universally practised, and so little thought of in the world, that I cannot quit the subject without making some application of what has been said, to all orders and degrees of men that allow themselves in it.

SERMON CXXIII.

By PATRICK DELANY, D. D.

Owe no man any thing, but to love one another.

IN a former discourse upon these words, I laid down the duty of paying debts, together with the evils which attend the neglect of it, both as they regard the debtor, and as they regard the creditor. The evils to the debtor, of being imposed upon either in the quantity or value of what they take up upon trust; and the great evil of making expence easy, and, in consequence of that, ruin insensible and inevitable. To the creditor, the delay of payment in due time draws endless inconveniences and evils after it; loss of time, and trade, and credit, and, in consequence of these, inevitable, and, it may be, extensive and complicated ruin. I now proceed to make some application of what has been said, to all orders and degrees of men that allow themselves in the violation or neglect of this duty. And, first, let me ask the thoughtless spendthrift once again, what can be the consequence of his running in debt with all the world, but utter ruin both to himself and others? If the persons you deal with are honest and indigent, how can you answer it to your humanity, to bring misery and destruction upon the most pitiable and most deserving part of the creation? to destroy those by your extravagance, which even cruelty and tyranny would be tender of? What is most provoking, and indeed insufferable upon this head, is, that those who allow themselves in this conduct often pass upon the world under the character of good natured men; and you shall often hear it said of such a one, that he is nobody's enemy but his own. But the real truth is, that every vicious man, whatever he may be in his intentions, is, in effect, an enemy to the society he lives in; and more particularly a vicious good-nature is one of the cruellest characters in life. It is kind only where it ought not: it is kind to every vice and every villainy; it is indulgent to every thing but honesty and innocence; and those it is sure to sacrifice wherever it comes. A good-natured villain will surfeit a sot, and gorge a glutton; nay, will glut his horses and his hounds with that food for which the venders are one day to starve to death in a dungeon; a good-natured monster will be gay in the spoils of widows and orphans. Good-nature, separated from virtue, is absolutely the worst quality and character in life; at least, if this be good-nature, to feed a dog, and to murder a man. And therefore, if you have any pretence to good-nature, pay your debts; and, in so doing, clothe those poor families that are now in rags for your finery; feed him that is starving for the bread you eat, and redeem him from misery that rots in gaol, for the dainties on which you fared deliciously every day. And, besides the good you will do to others by those acts of honesty, you will do infinite good to yourselves by them. Paying of debts is, next to the grace of God, the best means in the world to deliver you from a thousand temptations to sin and vanity. Pay your debts, and you will not have wherewithal to purchase a costly toy, or a pernicious pleasure. Pay your debts, and you will not have what to lose to a villainous gamester. Pay your debts, and you will not have wherewithal to feed a number of useless horses, or infectious harlots. In one word, pay your debts, and you will, of necessity abstain from many fleshly lusts that war against the spirit, and bring you into captivity to sin, and cannot fail to end in your utter destruction, both of soul and body.

On the other hand, if the men you deal with, and are indebted to, are rich and wily, consider they supply your extravagance with no other view but to undo you; as men pour water into a pump, to draw more from it. Consider, they could not afford to trust you, if they did not propose to make excessive gain by you; and if you think at all, think what it is to lose a fortune by folly; to purchase superfluous and pernicious vanities, for a short season, at the hazard of wanting necessities for the tedious remainder of a mis-spent life. Time, which sweetens all other afflictions, will perpetually sharpen and inflame this; as the gaiety and giddiness of youth go off, the wants of age will become more sharp, and more inconsolable, to the last day of your lives; and severe reflection will double every calamity that befalls you. And therefore the son of Sirach well advises, (Ecclus. xviii. 33.) Be not made a beggar by banqueting upon borrowing; for thou shalt lie in wait for thy own life. And again, the same wise man most excellently observes, That he that buildeth his house with other men's money, is like one that gathereth himself stones for the tomb of his burial; he erects a sure monument, not only of his folly, but of his ruin; and the consequence is the same from extravagance of every kind; but with this difference, that the ruin derived from wine and women is the most dreadful of all others; as it involves you at once in the double distress of disease and want. Who amongst you can at once bear the united racks of hunger, and infection, and an evil conscience; and yet this is what you must feel, although it be what you cannot bear; the torments of hell anticipated! to be deprived of every blessing, and to be immersed in misery.

Thus much for the youthful extravagant. In the next place, let me apply myself to the man of quality, that is guilty of this vice, although these are too often the same persons. If ye will not consider what ye owe your creditors, and how to pay them, I beseech you calmly to reflect and consider what ye owe to yourselves, to your family, to your country, to your king. Was it for this that ye were distinguished above others of the same rank, only to be more eminent in infamy? Was nobility bestowed upon your ancestors as a reward of virtue; and do ye use it only as a privilege for vice? Is superior worth degenerated into superior villainy? If ye had any remains of modesty, ye would renounce the titles and the fortunes of your ancestors, with the virtues that attained them. Ye would blush to take place of a beggar that had virtue. Will ye yet pretend to be better men than others, when ye have renounced your humanity, when ye are no longer men, but monsters? It is not expected of you that you should perform acts of heroism and generosity; that you should reward virtue, and support merit in distress. Alas! these expectations are long since vanished, and seem only the boasts of fabulous antiquity. But methinks it might still be expected of you, that you should do common justice; that you should not be worse than the rest of mankind, because you think yourselves better; at least expect to be called so, and treated as such. Surely it might still be expected of you that you should pay your debts, and keep your promises; and in truth, ye would not be void, either of dignity or dependents, if ye did even this. Mankind are already too much prejudiced in your favour, and would not fail to pay you sufficient regard and reverence, even if you did them no good, provided you did them no mischief. But if ye expect to be esteemed, not only without generosity, but even without justice, ye are indeed unreasonable, and will be sure to be disappointed.

In the next place, Let me apply myself to the wealthy and covetous; these are, of all others, the most inexcusable, in not paying their debts. Men that have made or improved their own fortune by industry are utterly unpardonable in oppressing the industry of others; the least that might be expected from increase of wealth is to do justice with our abundance. This was the express direction of the prophet Elisha, in the 4th chapter of 2 Kings, when he had miraculously increased the widow's oil, he commanded her first to pay her debts out of her abundance: Go, saith he, sell the oil, and pay thy debt, and live thou and thy children of the rest. And the reason of this is evident, the money we owe is not ours, it is the property of other men, in our keeping, and we have no more right to it than we have to the

in their pockets. And although we should make no return to God for his blessings upon our industry, in alms and acts of goodness, surely the least we can do is to do justice to men. What a dreadful reflection is it to turn the blessings of Providence into a curse to ourselves, and all we have to deal with! Men of this character are in the condition of those malignant insects who fret and make sores wherever they come, and then feed upon them; they thrive upon the miseries of mankind, which is absolutely the most detestable character upon earth! and is, next to that of a fiend, the very worst and vilest that can be imagined. Woe unto him, saith the prophet Jeremiah, that buildeth his house by unrighteousness, and his chambers by wrong! (xxii. 13.) Woe unto them, saith Isaiah (ch. v. ver. 8.), that join house to house, that lay field to field, till there be no place, that they may be placed alone in the midst of the earth! living in that character of cruelty which is best suited to a beast of prey, that scatters ruin and desolation all around him. One would think the apostle's precepts were reversed to these men; and that they thought themselves bound in conscience to owe every man every thing in the world but love and good-will. And after all, to what purpose is all this oppression, and iniquity of avarice? To heap up ill-got riches for a curse upon themselves and their posterity, and leave a memory and a carcass equally odious and offensive behind them. They are exalted for a little while, as it is finely expressed in the 24th chapter of Job; They are exalted for a little while, but are gone, and brought low: they are taken out of the way as all other: and cut off as the tops of the ears of corn. They are permitted by the Divine Providence, to fill up at once the measure of their wealth and their iniquity; and, as soon as ever they are ripe for ruin, they are cut off in the fullness of their pride and fortune; and the wealth they have hoarded is like the full ear of corn, which, instead of being gathered into the barn, is trampled under foot, and scattered over the face of the earth; and so becomes a prey to rooks, and swine, and vermin.

In the last place, Let me apply myself to traders in themselves, and desire them to reflect how they pay their own debts: I am afraid, some of them very badly. I have heard of a most wicked practice amongst them, of paying their journeymen and underlings in goods: I call this wicked, because, if those goods are rated at the shop-price, the journeyman is plainly defrauded, since he hath no allowance for the time and trouble he must take, and the hazard he must run in vending those goods. And, whereas he had a right to ready money for his labour, his necessities now oblige him to sell those goods at any price he can get, to the discredit of trade in general, and the real injury of that very person who laid him under a necessity of so doing, who must of necessity suffer by having his goods sold at an under-rate: so that this practice is as ill-judged in the shopkeeper, and as weak with regard to his own interest, as it is wicked with regard to his poor underling. And indeed all bad payment to those they have to deal with, especially the poorer sort, is manifestly injurious to men in business; for the clamour of bad pay, and the discredit that necessarily attends it, generally speaking, begins there. And therefore Solomon's precepts (Prov. iii. 27, 28.) ought always to be strictly observed by them, of all mankind: Withhold not good from them to whom it is due, when it is in the power of thine hand to do it. Say not unto thy neighbour, Go, and come again, and to-morrow I will give, when thou hast it by thee. Although the men you deal with do not know your wants, nor consider your labour and loss of time in seeking your due, and are consequently regardless of you and your necessities, yet you well know the wants of the poor people you deal with, and the injury you do them in making them lose their time in attending upon you; and therefore you are utterly inexcusable in not relieving them from those hardships, when you can do so, barely by doing justice. How can you expect a blessing from God upon your own endeavours, when you are guilty of so much cruelty and injustice to others; when you are guilty of so much injustice to the very men by whose labour ye are supported? A poor man, that oppresseth the poor, (saith Solomon) is like a sweeping rain which leaveth no food, (Prov. xxviii. 3.) Nature hath formed us to compassionate the calamities we endure; and therefore a poor man should as naturally expect aid and consolation from his brethren in the same condition, as the parched and impoverished earth expects relief from the showers of heaven; consequently, when, instead of being aided, he is oppressed by his brethren, and the little remains of his substance are torn from him, he is then in the condition of the earth, ravaged and ruined by the very means appointed by Providence to refresh and make it fruitful; and all its seed, all the means and hopes of a future harvest, swept away with its best mould. A poor man, that oppresseth the poor is the cruellest monster in nature; and it is the just judgment of Almighty God, that, with what measure you mete, it should be measured unto you again. He that doth wrong, saith the apostle, (Col. iii. 25.) shall receive for the wrong which he hath done; as he hath done, it shall be done unto him; his reward shall return upon his own head.

And therefore, my brethren, as ye expect mercy, and protection, and blessing, from God; do justice and judgment to all you have to deal with; and be merciful after your power: for the righteous Lord loveth righteousness; and whatsoever good any man doeth, the same shall he receive of the Lord. So that a man shall say, verily, there is a reward for the righteous; verily, there is a God that judgeth the earth.

SERMON CXXIV.

BY PATRICK DELANY, D. D.

On the great Importance and Wisdom of early Industry.

PROV. vi. ver. 6, 7, 8.

Ver. 6. Go to the ant, thou sluggard, consider her ways, and be wise.—7. Which having no guide, overseer, or ruler;—8. Provideth her meat in the summer, and gathereth her food in the harvest.

It is observable of Solomon, that as he is every where throughout his writings zealous in the praise of industry, so he is no less severe in the reproach of idleness; and yet, at the same time that his indignation is raised against the sluggard, he seems more at a loss how to instruct and reform that unhappy race of mortals than any other whatsoever; men of every other character were capable of improvement from application and industry; but what could be expected from those who were too lazy to put any precepts into practice, however useful and wise? Had he referred them for instruction to the schools of philosophy, many precepts must be learned, and many books turned over; and they must have resolved upon a regular course of study and discipline, before they could attain those habits and that wisdom they wanted; and this he knew would be death to them, even to think of; and therefore the shortest method he could take with them, and indeed the shortest course that could possibly be taken for their amendment, was to remit them for instruction to the ant; where they needed only to look and learn; where, stretched at length by the side of a sunny bank (as proper a situation for sloth as their hearts could wish), they might see all the surprising effects of industry, and learn all the fruits and advantages of it, at their ease, without stirring from the spot, without the expence either of toil or study, and, in short, without any other labour than that of keeping their eyes open.

Here might they behold a little creature labouring under a load of more than four times its own bulk, and conveying it with incessant industry to the common store; and if he fainted, and grew unequal to the task, he might soon have the pleasure to see a good-natured neighbour hastening to his assistance; the loaded ants going in one way, and the unloaded going out another, that they might not obstruct one another in their passage.

In the course of a few days loitering, he might observe the common stock of provision immensely increased; and, what must be a contemplation of great pleasure to such a genius, he might observe, that the labours of the year ended with the harvest; that, when they had no more to gather, they had no more to do, but to sit down and enjoy what they had got; that they had provided convenient coverings for themselves, and granaries for their food, and were under no necessity of suffering the severities of the winter season, but were warmly lodged in the midst of peace and plenty; and never need put their feet out of doors, unless, perhaps, to sun themselves, or their provisions, after a glut of rain; which were no more than a pleasant recreation after so long confinement. And, lastly, he could not but observe, with conscious shame, that he never met with one idler in the whole community; that every individual contributed something to the public fund, and best consulted his own good, by co-operating for the good of the whole.

When the sluggard had observed all this at his ease, one would think it would not be very hard for him to turn it into an useful lesson of life, and to reason thus shortly and pertinently upon it: I also am a member of society, and should I be utterly insignificant in it? was I made to be less important than an ant? or, am I less bound to contribute to the good of the community? is not my own inseparable from it? and shall I not co-operate for the common good? every society hath a fund of wealth, best acquired by honest arts; from whence also arise the other national funds of power, credit, and esteem; should I be insignificant to all these purposes? and can I be happy, and honourable, if I be?

Let me reflect, if I also can have resolution and industry enough to labour out my season like the ant, I shall not only contribute to the public good, but shall also, probably, be able to get myself a comfortable provision for life.—Life also hath its seasons, like the year; the times of health and strength are its summer and its autumn; if I employ these, as I ought, in some useful and honest pursuit, I shall, in all probability, have acquired wherewithal to support me in the winter of life, when the season of labour is over, and when ease and rest will be very agreeable and desirable to me; how infinitely happy shall I be, if I can live to see the day when I shall have nothing to do but to eat and drink, and take my rest?

And here we see the exceeding wisdom of Solomon's proposing the ant to the imitation of idlers, because it is an example that should excite them to industry, even for the interest of their sloth; forasmuch as it instructs us, that a short course of unwearied industry is the surest means to purchase a long vacation of ease and uninterrupted rest.

It is not barely upon this principle, but upon others of more moment, that I shall endeavour to illustrate the wisdom of early industry (the most important of all social duties) to this audience; and when the wisdom of this virtue hath sufficiently recommended it to you, I hope you will need no other motive to engage you in an earnest pursuit and practice of it.

The importance of this virtue to the public needs no proof; forasmuch as it is self-evident, that no man can be an useful member of society who doth not, some way or other, contribute either to its peace, honour, security, or interest; and how can this be done, without a proper exercise and improvement either of the powers of his body, or mind, or both, in some useful pursuit, is utterly inconceivable. And therefore I shall content myself with shewing the advantage of industry to every man in his private capacity.

And, first, Industry is wise with regard to the interests and concerns of the body: we were made for labour, and a certain portion of exercise is absolutely necessary to our health and strength; and the body can no more be preserved in vigour without it, than without its natural food. What the condition of our constitution in paradise might be is not easy to say; but it is evident, that from the moment man was driven from that delightful seat, and condemned to support his life by the sweat of his brow, labour is become necessary to our well-being; and though it was pronounced upon Adam as a curse, and in punishment of his transgression, yet, whether it were to manifest the continuance of that curse upon his posterity, or rather, in the usual course of the Divine mercy, to turn curses into blessings to such as patiently submit to his chastenings, and make a right use of them; thus much is certain, that we are doomed to labour from that day to this! God and nature demand it of us; and, if we cannot be happy with it, we must be miserable without it.

As our constitutions are now mortal and corruptible, it is evident, that, in some part or other of them, we die daily; and when those perishing parts become useless to the strength and vigour of the body, they are a load and incumbrance to it; and if not thrown off by exercise, or otherwise, become matter of disease and infirmity to us: and when they grow so numerous as to corrupt the mass of blood, if we have not strength enough to throw them off in the discharges of gout and fevers, we must sink and die under them.

Now the true and natural way of getting rid of these noxious humours, is, by exciting the body in some useful labour, by which its health and strength may be preserved and improved; and, when the body is in vigour, the labours of life will rather be a pleasure than a toil to it; for the body finds as strong and natural a pleasure in employing its powers to their proper ends, as the mind does in the pursuit of truth, or in the employment of any of its faculties to their proper ends. And, on the other hand, a state of idleness and inactivity is as naturally irksome to a man in full health, when the business of life calls for his strength and industry, as it is to a generous steed to be reined in when he is drawn out to the course. The perfection and happiness of every being, and every thing in this world, consists in the right application and exertion of their powers to the true ends and purposes for which they were ordained; and whenever they are diverted from those ends, or applied to other purposes, they become useless and unhappy. If the body be not employed, it becomes bloated, languid, and enervate: sloth seizes it at first, and all the infirmities of life pursue sloth; and then the languid pleasures of inactivity are followed by the sharp pains of slow and racking distempers: whereas labour, as it is the sure pledge of health, so is it the sure source of all those pleasures that result from it; nay, experience teaches us, that the spirits are raised by exercise into a more constant cheerfulness and vivacity than can be supplied even by the most generous wines: nay, there is a pleasure even in the weariness that succeeds temperate exercise, which far excels all the enjoyments of sloth and if the labours and even the languors of industry be agreeable, surely the refreshments of it must be doubly delightful. It was St. Paul's rule, that, if any would not work, neither should they eat. And this is not only morally just and righteous, but it is naturally so. The end of food is to supply the wastes of the body from labour; therefore, if men will not labour, neither should they eat; and if they will eat, yet they had better not; for they must do it without appetite, and without pleasure; and, after all, when they have taken in their food, it will turn more into disease than digestion. This is the true state and settled rule of life; but there are exceptions to this rule: there are who live only to eat; whereas labour, as it is entitled to refreshment, so it is entitled to health and happiness from that refreshment. What an exquisite relish does it give to the plainest and coarsest food! and what softness even to a pillow of stone! The sleep of a labouring man is sweet, says Solomon; whereas the very rest and ease of the slothful is a burden to him; for it is certain, that as men may eat till the most delicious foods lose all their relish, so they may rest till feathers lose all their softness, till pillows and beds of down can supply them with no one easy spot whereon to recline their languid head ; and, if they chance to dose in that uneasy condition, that sleep, which is a refreshment to a body wearied with labour, can be only an additional grievance to a body that is wearied with rest.

But this is not all ; for as industry procures a stock of cheerful health, without which the good things of this life cannot be enjoyed, so is it naturally fitted to procure a fund of good things for the enjoyment of life ; for all these are the purchase of industry, as the want of them is the punishment of sloth. He becometh poor, says the wise man, that dealeth with a slack hand ; but the hand of the diligent maketh rich—And again ; The hand of the diligent shall bear rule, but the slothful shall be under tribute.—The soul of the sluggard desireth, and hath nothing ; but the soul of the diligent shall be made fat.—The drunkard and the glutton shall come to poverty, and drowsiness shall clothe a man with rags. And therefore, whoever desires to lay up a sufficient store of the good things of this life, for the consolation and support of his old age, let him take care to employ his youth in an honest industry ; for this is the only sure means of procuring those blessings. And if he fails to do this, let him rest assured, that, in the decline of life, he will be pursued by two of the cruellest evils in life, remorse and poverty, fruitless remorse, and unpitied poverty : whereas the diligent shall not only have wherewithal to supply his own wants, but likewise to relieve the wants of others. The slothful (as Solomon expresses it) coveteth greedily all the day long ; but the righteous (i. e. he that exerts an honest industry) giveth, and spareth not. The man that hath raised himself by an honest industry, giveth, and spareth not ; knowing, that, as to the wealth and affluence of this world, there is no good in them, but for a man to rejoice and do good in his life ; and that every man should eat and drink, and enjoy the good of all his labour : this is the gift of God. And therefore, as far as pleasure is preferable to pain, and health to disease ; as far as sprightliness exceeds stupidity, and sound sleep disturbed dreams ; as far as freedom is preferable to servitude, and dominion to dependence ; as far as plenty, and a power of doing good, surpass pining desire and pinching poverty ; so far is industry wiser and better than sloth, even with regard to the concerns of the body.

But, secondly, Industry is wise, with regard to the interest of the soul. Virtue and knowledge are to the soul, what health and strength are to the body ; the same industry is equally perfective and useful, and the same indolence equally ruinous and destructive to both : the same sloth that brings diseases upon the body, brings vices and evil affections upon the soul. I went by the field of the slothful, says Solomon, and by the vineyard of the man void of understanding ; and lo ! it was all grown over with thorns, and nettles had covered the face thereof ; and the stone wall thereof was broken down. The field and vineyard of the slothful are exact emblems of his mind : instead of grapes and olives, instead of the noblest fruits of culture and study, it is over-run with thorns and nettles, and evil weeds of every kind ; with noxious vices, with perverse appetites, and vexatious humours, that tear, and sting, and are equally vexatious to himself, and all around him, without any more distinction than the briars and nettles of his vineyard make between their owner and any one else that walks through them : nay, not only so, but its wall is broken down, its fence of virtue and knowledge is in ruins ; nor has it any thing to defend it from the intrusion and devastation of vice ; it is now an open prey to every invader.

Plato tells us, that industry is as much preferable to idleness as brightness is to rust ; plainly implying, that idleness is to the mind what rust is to metals ; and in truth it is so ; it does not only tarnish its lustre, and make it unfit for use, but it also eats into it. The mind was formed for exercise, as well as the body ; and, if it be unemployed, it will not only grow rusty and dull, but it will also prey upon itself. And though it should not degenerate altogether into the condition of the sluggard's vineyard, though it should not fall into all the ruin and devastation of vice, yet will it never want thorns and nettles, it will never want sufficient supplies of spleen, and evil appetites, to punish the neglect of honest pursuits and useful attainments. The desire of the slothful killeth him, saith Solomon; for his hands refuse to labour. And sure it must be a state of miserable torment, passionately to desire what we see we shall not enjoy, and cannot be at the pains to procure: and it is obvious to observe in the world numbers of men repining to death, every day, at the advancement of others to honour and eminence from the improvement of those abilities which were naturally, perhaps, inferior to their own: and yet all this is but the just and natural reward of honest industry, in proof of that excellent observation of the wise man, (Prov. xxii. 29.) Scest thou a man diligent in his business: he shall stand before kings; he shall not stand before mean men.

Again, Industry is yet farther wise with regard to the concerns of the soul, because a proper improvement in knowledge is necessary to all conditions in life. Every man does not need to be a merchant or a mechanic, but every man should be a man of knowledge, and, if possible, a man of learning, at least, in his own profession. For this reason the ancients, though they had but one Ceres, and one Vulcan, one deity that presided over the labours of the hammer and the plough; yet had they nine Muses, because their aid was useful to men of every character and condition in life. Learning is an accession of new light and new knowledge; and new light and new knowledge will always be useful to inform and guide us to more advantage in every pursuit; and there is scarcely any art so mean and mechanic to which learning might not be both ornamental and useful; there is scarcely one profession in the world where a right application of knowledge would not carry us to uncommon degrees of eminence. And if learning be thus honourable in every other profession, surely where it is itself the principal, if not the sole profession, the want of it must be infinitely reproachful; and yet there is no medium; men must either want it, or take pains to attain it, and hence it is that Minerva, the goddess of wisdom, among the antients, had the epithet of Εργασιας, or the worker, given her, to shew that none but the industrious were entitled to her assistance.

Now, as wealth is to be acquired in youth, for the support of age, so is knowledge also, with more reason:

1st, Because it is an higher and nobler attainment. And, 2dly, because age, which for the most part adds to our wealth, from the accession of avarice, and the retrenchment of the expensive passions, takes away from our knowledge, by impairing the powers of the mind; and that, when we want it most, both for our own credit, and the instruction of others, therefore we should take care to be plentifully provided. Wise men, saith Solomon, lay up knowledge:—well knowing it is the noblest and most valuable treasure they can possibly lay up; and it, as the same wise man observes, the grey head is the beauty of old men, it is beyond all doubt, that wisdom is the glory of the grey head. O! how comely a thing is judgment for grey hairs? (says the wise son of Sirach) and for ancient men to know counsel? O! how comely is the wisdom of old men, and understanding and counsel to men of honour! (Ecclus. xxi. 4, 5.) And therefore, as knowledge is better than ignorance, and virtue than vice; as far as culture exceeds wildness and barbarity, and brightness excels rust; as light is more lovely than darkness, and counsel more becoming the grey head than uninformed dotage; so far is diligence wiser, and better, and more valuable, than idleness, with regard even to the temporal interests of the soul.

In the last place: If diligence be wise with regard to the temporal concerns of the soul, it must surely be much more so with regard to its eternal interest. There are many pursuits that are proper and ornamental in life; there are many of high concern, but there is one only of infinite importance; there are many of excellent use; but there is one only of absolute necessity; and happy, beyond all comparison, wise and happy, are they who have early chosen that better part.—The fear of the Lord, says Solo- beginning, is the beginning of wisdom. And it is observable, that the Hebrew word here interpreted the beginning, signifies either the foundation or the top of any thing; and, in the present application of it, it is strictly true in either sense: the beginning of the Lord is the foundation and the top of all wisdom. That early and prudent caution, which is the parent and the companion of true wisdom, best enters into the mind, and dwells there, from an awe of religion, from the sense of an infinitely wise and powerful Being always present to every motion in our mind, and every action of our lives; and there is not a thought in our heart that is hid from him; and as this is the best principle of that caution and consideration which should conduct our lives, so is the end it aims at, at once the wisest and the noblest pursuit of reasonable beings; if it be wise to lay up early treasures upon earth, where moth and rust doth corrupt, and thieves break through and steal; is it not infinitely more so, to lay up for yourselves treasures in heaven, where neither moth nor rust can corrupt, where thieves cannot break through and steal? If it be wise to lay up early treasures of knowledge, for the conduct of life, for the improvement of our professions and faculties, and for the honour and ornament of our advanced years, to support us with dignity in the decline of life; is it not infinitely more so, diligently to search after that knowledge that will adorn our Christian profession, and treasure up those precepts that will conduct us to everlasting glory, and give us honour in the sight of angels? Thou sluggard, if it be wise in thee to learn of the ant to make provision for the winter of life, for one short and uncertain season, is it not infinitely more so to lay up for all eternity—for a life of endless duration, and inconceivable happiness?

The Folly, Iniquity, Absurdity, and Guilt of Duelling.

Exod. xx. 13.

Thou shalt not kill.

THIS precept being laid down here in general unlimited terms, which, taken in their full extent, equally prohibit taking away the lives of men and of other animals, upon any account whatsoever: the true sense of it must be learnt from comparing this with other parts of the scriptures.

That it was not intended to preclude men from the right of taking away the lives of others, in any circumstance whatsoever, is evident from the 2d verse of the 22d chapter of this book of Exodus; where the thief found breaking up in the night, that is, breaking into your house, or making use of any force to rob you, is permitted to be slain. And from many other parts of the scriptures it appears, that persons guilty of certain crimes are expressly commanded to be put to death; such as the witch, the blasphemer, the murderer, the disobedient son, &c.

That the command was not intended as an absolute prohibition to take away the lives of the inferior creatures, is evident from the grant given to Noah, and, in him, to all his posterity, in the 9th chapter of Genesis; where creatures are given for food in as ample a manner as the herbs of the field were given before; only with this restraint, that the blood was not to be eaten with the flesh.

Forasmuch then as neither criminals nor inferior creatures are prohibited to be slain by this precept, it follows, that nothing is prohibited by it, but murder; that is, the taking away the life of any man unjustly. In this case, and in this only, we are to understand that denunciation of Divine justice to be due. And surely your blood of your lives will I require; at the hand of every beast will I require it; and at the hand of man: at the hand of every man's brother will I require the life of man. Whoso sheddeth man's blood, by man shall his blood be shed; for in the image of God made he man.

When God gave man a right to the creatures for food, prohibiting them to eat the blood with the flesh, in that prohibition he virtually commands them to shed the blood of those creatures, before they made the flesh their food; and as he knew this power and practise of shedding of blood would by degrees harden the mind, and be an inlet to cruelty, even to their own species; he guards in the most effectual manner imaginable against that evil, by a dreadful denunciation of vengeance against all those that should dare to shed the blood of man. And surely your blood of your lives will I require; at the hand of every beast will I require it; and at the hand of man, at the hand of every man's brother will I require the life of man. Whoso sheddeth man's blood, by man shall his blood be shed; for in the image of God made he man. The meaning of all which is, (and so the best interpreters understand it,) that God will arm every living creature, both brute and human, to the destruction of the murderer; as I believe there is scarcely a creature so contemptible, either in earth or air, whom he hath not at one time or other made the instrument of his vengeance on that crying guilt. And, as if all this security were insufficient, he fences in this lord of the nether world, yet farther, with the veneration of his Maker's image stamped upon him. Whoso sheddeth man's blood, by man shall his blood be shed; for in the image of God made he man.

How nobly is this declaration fitted to convey this great document, and impress it deep on the whole race of Adam! that God, the great guardian and governor of the world, watched over the lives of men with so peculiar a providence, that if any man should dare to shed the human blood, sure vengeance should pursue him: that the Divine justice would arm the powers of every living creature to his destruction; nay, would arm his own brother's right hand to his ruin.

And how nobly is the justice and the solemnity of this declaration asserted in the reason annexed: For in the image of God made he man. What less extended vengeance was due to a devoted miscreant, to that sacrifice, arm, that should violate the majesty of the Creator's image, where his goodness, his wisdom, and his power had imaged it: than to have the whole creation in array against him?

Murder is in itself a crime so destructive to society, and so dreadful to nature, that nothing need to be said to aggravate the horror of it to the human mind. But forasmuch as the corruptions of mankind have at length found out a way of perpetrating this crying guilt, in this part of the world, not only always with impunity, but often with applause, have even made it honourable under the fashionable appellation of duelling. My business at present shall be to examine it in this view; and to shew you by God's assistance, that no disguise of name, or power of custom, can make this practice less detestable in the eye of reason, or less criminal in the eye of God.

And in order to do this, I shall inquire, first into the origin of this practice of duelling.

And secondly, into the causes and occasions of it. And, under this head, shall endeavour to shew you, how wicked, how absurd, how pernicious it is, in all its pretences; and how dreadful in its final issue.

And first as to its original, it is agreed by the best writers on this subject, that the practice was in the beginning undoubtedly derived from a principle of humanity; and a tenderness for the lives of mankind. And the best accounts I have been able to collect concerning it are as follow.

When nations happened to fall into contentions, which could not be accommodated by treaty, nor determined by hostility, without infinite slaughter and devastation; to spare the effusion of so much blood, it was sometimes agreed amongst them, to leave the decision of the controversy to the hazard of a few lives. And to agree, that the consequence of such a conquest should be the same as if those nations had contended with all their numbers. Such was that of Paris and Menelaus, in Homer; and

Theseus and Melanthius, kings of Athens and Lacedæmonia. Such also was that of the Horatii and Curiatii in the Roman history, and of Edmund Ironside and Canute the Dane, in the history of England. Nor is this practice wholly out of use in the heathen world, at this day. Such was that between the king of Pegu, and his uncle, about the kingdom of Ava; mentioned by Mandelso in his travels (p. 96.)

And this kind of duelling was, without question, humane and just; forasmuch as it violated no law of God or man; and was in prevention of much greater evil.

The next kind of duelling that we meet with in history was, when two hostile armies being contiguous to one another, either avowedly or tacitly agreed, that a chosen champion of either side should combat for the honour of his country. Such was the duel of David and Goliath, (1st book of Samuel.) Such also was that of Manlius Torquatus, and, after that, of Valerius Corvinus, with two Gauls, who challenged the valiantest of the Romans to single combat. And many later instances of the same kind: and these without question were lawful; because permitted by their commanders, and performed, for the most part, by persons whose lives were devoted to the service of the public, in arms. So that whether they fell in single combat, or in a more general engagement, their lives were equally expended in the service of their country.

* Another kind of duelling, formerly practised in the western part of the world, was either upon accusation of life, or trial of right; and the occasions of them were as follow:

When any person accused another of treason, or any other capital crime, the person accused, if he insisted upon his innocence, had a right to retort the lie upon his accuser, and challenge him to make good his charge by combat. Now this practice, although perhaps not strictly justifiable, yet, however, much may be said in defence of it: because it was a terror to false and malicious accusations; and was, in the person accused, an appeal to Almighty God, for the innocence of his heart. Besides, that public justice seems to be concerned, is not easily admitting that a good subject's life should be taken away, upon a single testimony; which might be grounded either upon mistake, or malice, or corruption. And, on the other hand, as single testimonies should not easily be slighted, those certainly must have most weight which the authors were ready to vouch, at the hazard of their lives. And therefore it is not much to be wondered at, if in ages more martial and less refined, in the reasons and rules of justice, combats of this kind were allowed of by public authority. And of these many instances are to be met with in the histories of France and England.

As to the other points; viz. duels upon trial of right or inheritance, these also were very antient. Such was the duel of Corbis and Orsua, two Spanish noblemen, about the principality of the city Ibes, mentioned by Livy, in the twenty-eighth book of his history. And instances of the same kind are to be met with in our own histories.

Now these were occasioned by such disputes about rights, as were not easily decided by law; and therefore the parties chose to bring the controversy to a shorter issue, by combat: and the law allowed them to do so. And these duels proceeded upon the same principles with those upon accusation of life last-mentioned; and from a persuasion, that God would determine the issue of the combat, according to the rights of the cause.

It was for these reasons, and upon these principles, that duelling obtained and was allowed in the world, from the earliest ages, until the time of the emperor Charles the Vth; who having charged Francis the French king with breach of faith, Francis retorted the lie upon him, and provoked him to single combat; which, however, that wise and valiant emperor thought fit to decline.

From this accident, the high spirit of the Gallic nation (who are not justly chargeable with want of sufficient bravery), in compliment to their prince, and the better to demonstrate that injurious and high provocation he had given the emperor, established the giving of the lie as the highest indignity that could be offered to human nature; and such as every man of honour ought to resent to death; imagining, it would reflect no small glory upon their nation, that the meanest gentleman in France would not put up with an indignity, which the great Charles the Vth endured with patience.

And as that nation have been sufficiently successful in giving rise to many other fashions of less consequence, so likewise hath their example derived this wicked and pernicious practice all over Europe: and, in so doing, been the occasion of more bloodshed in the compass of a few years, than all the duels known in the world from the foundation of it, till that time. Except perhaps such duels as were more antiently authorized in their own country, upon trials of right; till those practices were restrained by St. Lewis and St. Philip the fair. And it is a justice due to the memory of their last great monarch, Lewis the XIVth, to own, that he did, with great wisdom, and a most religious fortitude, repress this practice throughout his own dominions: and, if other princes have not followed his example, it must however be owned that it was not his fault, if this evil hath not found an effectual remedy where it had its rise.

As to the duels antiently in use, they were, as I before observed, founded, for the most part, upon humanity and justice; upon the honour of nations; and upon trials of right, and vindication of innocence; and that too by public authority. And were, in some sort, appeals to Almighty God. Whereas those of the last and the present age, if not in direct opposition to all these great ends, are at least utterly destitute of every one of them, founded upon fantastic and absurd points of honour! points of honour as they are called; but, in truth, points of infamy! nor is it possible it should be otherwise, when they are acted in direct contradiction to the public good, to public authority, to religion, and virtue of every kind; as will appear by examining this matter a little more exactly.

And, in order to do this, give me leave to lay down the following positions, as undoubted truths:

First, That honour, with regard to others, is nothing but the fame of virtue; that is, it is that reputation which arises from the opinion which mankind conceive of our virtue, attended with esteem and regard; the natural consequence, and in some sort, the natural reward of virtue and worth of every kind. Firstly, I say, true honour, with regard to others, is the fame arising from the reputation of virtue; and secondly, with regard to ourselves, true honour is the utmost refinement and perfection of virtue, in the discharge of every duty in life. And this will appear evidently from asking ourselves these two plain questions: First, Why we honour any man? and secondly, Who they are whom we honour? Do we honour any man for cowardice, or theft, or villainy of any kind? no; we honour men for courage, for honesty, for integrity. We honour nothing but virtue and worth: we can honour nothing else: and what is strictly and properly called true honour, in any man, is nothing but refinement in virtue.

For example; a man of honour will not fail to pay a just debt, although the law could not oblige him to it. A man of honour will keep his word, although no man alive could prove the violation of it upon him; nor exact the performance of it. A man of honour will return the pledge committed to his trust, although the owner were dead, and no mortal conscious to it.

And the reason is obvious; a man of honour hath more regard to truth and justice, than he hath either to self-interest or the terrors of the law; truth and justice are the rules and measures of his conduct; and therefore a man of honour will tell the truth, although he be sure to suffer by it; and although he might disguise it without any possible damage or reproach, other than from his own conscience.

Such is a man of honour in his private capacity.

In a public character, a man of honour will pique himself upon discharge of duty to the public, on every just occasion, what danger or distress soever attend that discharge; and although neither danger nor infamy attended the neglect of it. For instance, in the army, a man of honour will not fail to discharge every part of duty incumbent upon him: neither will he let the meanest soldier exceed him in the lowest point of discipline; although possibly he might do so without infamy or punishment.

A man of honour will maintain the post assigned him, although ten thousand dangers and difficulties attended it. Neither will he hesitate to go upon the most difficult attempt, which his duty points out to him, although infinite hazard await it. And so in every other instance. The man of honour is studious to discharge his duty to the public above every consideration, either of danger or advantage, or of whatever consequence to himself; and so in every other condition of life. A man of honour will discharge every virtue proper to that condition, with the utmost exactness, and in the highest refinement: for honour, as I before observed to you, is nothing but the reputation arising from the practice of virtue with regard to others; and, with regard to ourselves, the steady practice of it, in all the refinement it is capable of; especially such virtues as are proper to that peculiar character.

To illustrate this yet farther, in other instances. Honour in a judge is more peculiarly and emphatically a conscientious dispensation of justice, free from all partiality and corruption. In a woman, it is a nice regard to chastity, and the fame of it. In a soldier, fortitude; in a prince, the preservation of his faith, his dominions, and the good of his people. Honour in private life is strict justice, and inviolable regard to promises and engagements of every kind: this is the true notion of honour. Virtue is the standard by which it must be eternally judged; and whoever goes about to separate it from virtue, in any character, or condition, or circumstance of life, doth at the same instant destroy it, and turn it into infamy; for infamy is nothing but the fame of vice; that is, that scandal and evil report which necessarily attend vice and villainy of every kind, in the opinion of all wise and good men.

Let duelling then be examined by this test, whether it be honourable or infamous.

And first, the great occasion of duelling is giving the lie; and a lie is infamous, because it is an imputation upon our virtue of veracity.

Now this imputation is either just or unjust. If the imputation be just, certainly there can be no injury in affixing it. And, as to the indignity that may accrue from such an imputation, the criminal is himself the author of that. You did the injury, and fixed the indignity, when you were guilty of the evil that deserved it. And he that imputeth that guilt to you, doth you no more injury than he that should tell you, you were handsome or valiant, when you were so. And the way to wipe off this imputation, is, to repent, and offend against truth no more.

Well! but your honour is injured, and you must repair it by fortitude. How? injure an honour which hath no existence! what an abuse of words is this? you forfeited your honour the moment you told the lie. And now you would repair that crime, by committing a greater. You would repair falsehood, by murder. But say the imputation is unjust: one would think the natural way of taking off this imputation should be, by manifesting the truth, and letting the whole world see the falsehood of the charge laid against you. And, if this be done, then certainly no infamy rests upon you; but returns that instant upon the author. For then, the lie is, of necessity, and from the nature of the thing, retorted upon him.

But still he hath endeavoured to do you an injury; and perhaps this imputation, although now cleared, hath been of real ill consequence to you: I answer, as to his endeavour of injuring you, he hath infamy for his pains. And if he hath any remains either of equity, or modesty, or good manners, he will take shame to himself for so doing, by a proper submission: if he hath not, he is no otherwise to be accounted of than a bear and a brute! but, however, all brutality is not to be chastised by death. It is sufficiently punished by the natural infamy and contempt that await it. And to them you may refer it. And for this you have an example of sufficient weight in the conduct of Socrates (a man of eminent fortitude) on a like occasion, who being rudely treated by a worthless fellow, as he passed in the public street, took no notice of it: and being asked by one of his companions how he could bear such an indignity from such a miscreant? calmly answered, If an ass should kick at me, would you have me kick again? We have also a like instance in the elder Cato, who, when a beastly fellow spit in his face, only answered, If any one should ask me hereafter whether you have any mouth, I know what to tell him. Thus are trifling indignities to be treated; but if any person hath done you a real injury, the courts of justice are open: and the officers of justice who preside in them are at least as skilful, and as equitable judges of the nature of the injury, and the reparation due to it, as you can be.

Well, but a man of honour scorns to go to law for an abuse, whilst he wears a sword to right himself! what strange language, and how senseless arodomontade is this! a man of honour scorn the rules of justice! Is then contempt of public justice the effect of honour? or rather is it consistent with any degree of it? Honour is the refinement of virtue! is it virtue to despise the public order and peace of society? nay, more, to insult it? honour is the exact discharge of every duty proper to our station. Is not submission to public authority the first duty of every man, of every station in society? and is honour a principle contradistinct to virtue and duty of every kind? if it be, away with it from all civil and religious communities. The king upon the throne is bound by the laws of his country; and is a man of honour exempt from them? is he greater than his prince? this pretence then is stupid, and senseless to the last degree. And therefore there is reason to believe, that generally speaking it is but a pretence: and that the real truth is, that most quarrels of this kind are in themselves so very trifling or scandalous, that the authors are ashamed to let them appear in the courts of justice. And, it so, what folly and madness is it to risk your own life and your neighbour's, upon a point of so trivial or shameful a nature, that it will not bear to be seriously examined by the rules of reason and justice.

But still it may be urged, that honour is (with regard to others) the reputation arising from the fame of virtue; and vindicating an injury done to us is an indication of courage; and consequently is attended with a fame of virtue. I answer, that when courage is a virtue, it is always employed in the discharge of some duty, the neglect of which would be a vice. For courage is not in itself a virtue; it is so only when it is employed in a good cause; otherwise it is heat and rashness. For as it is not the punishment that makes the martyr, so it is not fighting that makes the hero; it is the cause that constitutes both. Nay, even fighting in a good cause is not virtue, unless it be also in discharge of duty. And therefore it was that Manlius the Roman consul executed his own son for fighting with Geminus, the general of the Latins, contrary to his orders; although he came off with conquest: as you may read in the 8th book of Livy. Here the cause was good. He fought with the enemy of his country. The event also was glorious. He slew and spoiled the hostile general, which was the height of all glory in arms. But yet, all this being against duty, instead of being honourable, became infamous; and he died, like the meanest slave, by the hands of the common executioner.

And thus, having shewn you the origin of duelling, the present degeneracy of that practice, and the false pretences of honour upon which it is built, I should now proceed to inquire into the true causes of that fashionable infamy. But this (the time not now permitting) must be deferred to another occasion.

SERMON CXXVII.

By PATRICK DELANY, D.D.

Thou shalt not kill.

IN a former discourse on these words, I entered into a dissertation upon the rise and cause of duelling in the world; in which I shewed you, that it had its original from humanity and mercy. When hostile armies, to spare the effusion of human blood, agreed to leave the decision of their disputes to the combat of one or more chosen champions, on either side; and that it was afterwards allowed in Christian countries, on trials of right and innocence, which could not otherwise be so easily decided.

I likewise shewed you the original of that kind of duelling now in fashion amongst us. That it had its beginning from the lie given by Francis the First of France to the emperor Charles the Vth; from whence, giving the lie became the mortal offence among those who have the assurance to call themselves men of honour. On this occasion, I inquired into the true nature of honour, and shewed you that it was nothing with regard to the world, but the fame of virtue; and with regard to ourselves, a refined sense of virtue, and a strictness in the practice of it, even where no law could punish the violation of it, or witness reproach it. I then proceeded to examine the present practice of duelling by this test. And shall now proceed to examine it further upon the same principle.

I observed to you, in the foregoing discourse, that the mortal offence among duellists was giving the lie. Now it is worth while to inquire, whether their resentment of this offence be owing to a right sense of honour; that is, a high regard to the virtue of veracity, and a just indignation for being thought destitute of it; or whether it be only a resentment of custom and conceit, without any regard to virtue.

For if they act in this case from a principle of honour, that is, from a regard to the virtue of veracity, it is plain they will have the same regard to it, in every other circumstance of life. Whereas the very contrary to all this is remarkable in many of them. And nothing is more notorious in their practice than customary lying and swearing, and breach of promises and engagements of every kind. And surely, he that promiseth to pay a just debt on a certain day, and faileth to do so, otherwise than through unavoidable necessity, both lieth, and is unjust at the same time. And in this sense, how many of these heroes are liars up a record, for breach of word and bond: and yet I do not find it customary with them, to challenge the agent who manageth the prosecution, nor the judge who determineth the cause against them, for wounding their honour.

This then is the case: simple lying, is, in the opinion of these brave spirits, a mortal offence; but when perjury or injustice is added to it, then it becomes innocent, and leaves no blemish or stain upon their honour.

From hence it appeareth, that pride is the fountain of this vice. These duellists, not having virtue enough to be ashamed of doing evil, have yet vanity enough not to bear its being imputed to them. And therefore they would reconcile contradictions. They would be honourable in their fame, although they are infamous in their practice. And the way to be so is, to present death upon the point of their sword to any one that shall dare to taint their honour; that honour, which they have long since forfeited, and have now no more title to than to the money or the estates they have spent. Besides, what but intolerable vanity and impudence can set men so far above all laws, above all government and jurisdiction, as to assume to themselves a right both of judging and executing in their own cause, in direct contempt of all authority, both of God and man? And is the wretch that dare do this a fit member of civil or religious society? or rather should he not be regarded as a monster and outcast of the earth, and banished the society of every thing but chains and dungeons, and the lashes of his own conscience? And therefore if religion and government were no way concerned in this practice, and the influence of it reached no farther than those infamous wretches who are the common authors of it, nothing were more desirable in society than that this profligate race should go on, like the Cadmean brethren, to butcher one another with all convenient dispatch, and rid mankind of such a pest without the trouble or expence of public executions. But till that be done let them be abandoned like lepers, and let no man that would be clear either in his reputation or in his conscience converse with them, upon pain of infamy. And surely Solomon rightly adviseth, to drive such a one from our conversation. Cast out the scorner (saith he), and contention shall go out; yea strife and reproach shall cease.

Another parent of this practice is cowardice. And however strange this may appear at first sight, a little reasoning will clearly evince it to be so. For first, most men, although they have not courage yet greatly affect a reputation of it; that is, such a reputation as may secure them from insults another time. And the way to do this is to seem hot and fiery, and challenge some person of note for the sword; in hopes, that some lucky accident, or the interposition of friends, (which it is in every man's power to procure,) may prevent the ill consequences of the quarrel. And so, they may at once establish their reputation of courage and secure their persons. And all this is plainly the effect of cowardice. And it hath been justly observed by men of experience in transactions of this kind, that outward blusterings are very often only a mask to conceal inward tremblings, and that perhaps on both sides; insomuch, that the words of St. Paul, used upon another occasion, are yet strictly applicable upon this. (2 Cor. vii. 5.) Without were fightings, within were fears.

But duelling is yet more so, considered in another light. For cowardice is nothing but fearing against reason. Whereas a rational fear is no more cowardice than a rational hope is presumption and impudence. Now it is agreed among mankind, that of all the duels that have been fought in the world, much the greater number had been declined, did the persons concerned think they could fairly save their honour in doing so. And this, men of known and approved courage are often heard to declare from their own knowledge, and even in their own case. Now if this be an irrational and unjust fear, then whatever is acted upon this principle is the effect of cowardice. And that it is altogether irrational is evident. For what can be more foolish than to fear infamy from discharge of duty, from obedience to the divine authority, and the laws of the land? for this would be to reverse all the principles and foundations of honour and infamy; to call virtue vice, and vice virtue; and is, literally, to execute that woe upon ourselves which God Almighty hath denounced against all those that call evil good, and good evil. And I appeal to every man of common sense, whether any person that had courage enough to act upon these principles, and to declare to the whole world that he did so, could possibly suffer in his reputation of virtue, that is, in his honour, by so doing? or rather would not rise in both, in the esteem of all wise and good men: nay, whether those very bravoos who extorted this declaration from him, would not, if they had any remains either of virtue or of common sense, reverence him for it in their hearts.

And, God be praised, there is yet so much virtuous courage in the world, that several men of known and approved valour have openly declared against duels; and have refused challenges sent them, in avowance of duty.

And therefore the real truth is, that all those who allow themselves in this practice of duelling, do unknowingly conclude themselves under the basest and most scandalous character in life; cowards to men, and bravoos to God! cowards to the opinion of the idlest, the weakest and the most worthless part of mankind! and bravoos to the great governor of the universe; to the wisest, the mightiest, and the best of beings! They fear what a wise man should scorn above all things, the opinion of the thoughtless, the ignorant, and the insignificant. And they scorn what a wise man should fear and reverence above every thing else in the world, the violation of duty, and the wrath of God: so that this practice is plainly an absurd composition of pride, and folly, and cowardice, and hardened impiety.

But here it may be objected, how it is possible for a man to risk his life out of fear! to this I answer, that nothing is more common in the world to this day, nor more obvious in the history of it throughout all ages; for (as my lord Bacon rightly observeth) there is no passion in the mind so weak but that it mastereth the fear of death; revenge triumph-

reth to it, grief flieth to it, and fear preventeth it. Nay pity hath sometimes provoked death; as we find that when Otho slew himself, many others follow'd out of mere compassion and tenderness to their sovereign. And Otho himself is commonly instanced in the number of those that have died through cowardice. That is, either through fear of death, or infamy and reproach.

Petronius Arbiter, master of Nero's pleasures, cut his veins because his master frowned upon him. Hannibal, for fear of being given up to the Romans, poisoned himself, as did Demosthenes for fear of being given up to Antipater. And Labienus, the historian, mentioned by Seneca, because he would not outlive the infamy of having his books burnt by public edict, burnt himself. Nay the great Cato plainly executed himself through fear of Caesar's mercy. At least it is certain, that he and all the rest died through cowardice, even upon the principles of heathenism: for all the wiser antients were agreed, that man had no dominion over his own life, but was placed in the world like a centinel upon his post. And what more scandalous cowardice than to desert the station appointed to us, because of some unfor-seen difficulties that attend the maintaining it.

And of all fears the mind can be possessed with, fear of the opinion of fools is, beyond all question, the most scandalous; and, therefore, such as risk their lives upon that principle, are the basest of all cowards both to reason and virtue.

But still custom and the practice of the world is against you. Why, and for that very reason St. Paul adviseth you against it. Be not conformed to this world, nor to any wicked custom however prevalent in it. Custom, although founded upon reason and convenience, is at best no rule of action or life. But if it be in opposition to both, it is surely a wretched plea for irrational actions, and is only the last and most senseless refuge of affectation and stupidity. Now duelling is manifestly absurd to the last degree, although it were not impious. For supposing I am injured, and that I had a right to vindicate myself with my own arm; can any thing be more ridiculous than to put myself upon an equal hazard with him that injured me in that vindication? nay, perhaps upon a much greater. Whereas in reason, I ought to punish his offence, with hazard to him alone that committed it. Else, I only add an injury of my own to one that he hath already done me, or give him a fair chance of doing me a greater, than which nothing can be more absurd. And besides the stupidity of it in this respect, it is absurd also in every other. Foras-much as it is neither a proper test of the courage of the combatants, nor the justice of their cause. Not of the first, for how can that be a proper arbitration of courage where a coward that is perfect in his sword shall kill the bravest man alive? neither can that be an arbitration of the justice of a cause, where the decision dependeth upon the skill of the parties; and where the injured may fall and the injurer triumph in a second offence, and of a far higher nature than the first.

But besides the folly and stupidity of this practice, I beseech you to consider the iniquity of it. What right have you over that life which you risk, or over that which you invade? Should you attempt upon your neighbour's property by force you would doubtless be deemed a robber and a ruffian. And are you not worse, both in the eye of reason, and the judgment of the law, when you attempt upon his life? for there you add robbery to murder: nay robbery in a variety of relations. The government is robbed of a subject; the society of a member; the widow of a kind and careful husband; and the orphan of a tender parent. And yet he that perpetrates this complicated villainy, either out of pique, or pride, or malice, or perhaps out of gaiety of heart, (as the French call it,) would be deemed a man of honour! than which there can not be a more monstrous abuse of words, or a greater insult upon the common sense of mankind.

It is upon these principles that the Turks suffer no such thing as duels in their dominions. And that reproof, which Busebequius tells us, a Basha at Constantinople gave a valiant man, for boasting that he had challenged his enemy, is very well worth our notice : " How durst thou " (said he) challenge thy fellow-soldier to " a duel ? what, was there never a Christian to fight with ? do both of you " eat the emperor's bread ? yet forsooth " you must go about to take one another's lives ; what precedent had you " for this ? don't you know that whoever " of the twain had died, the emperor " had lost a subject ? " Whereupon he was immediately hauled to prison, where he lay pining many months, and was at last with difficulty released ; yet with the loss of his reputation.

And thus I have examined into the nature of this detestable practice of duelling, and shewn you how destructive it is of all those ends, for which that practice was first introduced and allowed in the world. I have shewn you that in its present degeneracy it is base and infamous. It is infamous in its origin, (the child of vice and ignorance, begotten by pride and folly,) nor is it less infamous in its practice, if acting in direct contradiction to all the principles of honour and virtue, and duty of every kind, can give a just title to infamy. In a word, I have shewn you how stupid, how impious, how abominable it is in all its circumstances and pretences ; the vaunt indeed of valour, but for the most part the real effect of cowardice, and that too the most shameful cowardice imaginable ; the fear of the opinion of fools ; a pretence of heroism, unknown to the great heroes of antiquity, to the Grecians and to the Romans, the greatest examples of mortal prowess : and at the same time greatly degenerating both from the honour and the piety of that practice in our own ancestors.

And now, my brethren, what is the issue of all this extravagance ? dreadful either way. If the man hath slain his antagonist, he hath perhaps in his person slain his best friend. At least he ceaseth to be his enemy that instant ; and the sword hath no sooner pierced his breast, but horror and remorse have pierced his murderer, have stabbed him to the soul ! his vanity sinks into dejection, and his anger into anguish, and all his excess of wrath and revenge rush into yet greater excesses of sorrow, and self-detestation, and all the distractions of distress. The dreadful deed is no sooner done, but he would give the whole world, nay he would almost die to undo it ; and doubtless the exchange were in many cases wise, were it possible to be effected. If this murderer's death could buy off all the horrors of his conscience, and anguish of his remaining life, given up to remorse and misery ; since the same hand that fixed a dagger into his brother's breast, did, in that very act, fix a fury in his own, to sting his conscience, and to poison his quiet to the last moment of his life.

But, my brethren, the greatest terror is yet behind. If this detestable practice ended only in folly, and pride, and tumult, nay if it terminated only in murder and remorse ; if blood could expiate the guilt, or the grave hide it, or misery and distraction atone for it, possibly something might be said to palliate the horror of it ; but when, in all appearance, the issue is yet more dreadful ; when the poor wretch is sent down quick to perdition with all his offences upon his head, and in the very act, perhaps, of the greatest guilt he is capable of committing. God ! God ! who can bear the horror ? for this shall the earth mourn, and the heavens above be black (saith the prophet Jeremiah iv. 28.) ; for this land shall be visited ; for as a fountain casteth out her waters, so she casteth out her wickedness ; violence and spoil is heard in her ; before me continually is grief and wounds. Be thou instructed, O Jerusalem, lest my soul depart from thee, saith the Lord ; lest I make thee desolate ; & land not inhabited. (iv. 7, 8.) For this gird you with sack-cloth, lament and howl, that the fierce anger of the Lord may be turned back from you (iv. 8.)

Let me conclude with that pathetic exhortation of Isaiah to the Jews in the first chapter of his prophesy, (15, 16.) wash ye, make you clean, put away the evil of your doings, saith the Lord, lest when you spread forth your hands I hide mine eyes from you, yea when you make many prayers I will not hear, your hands are full of blood. From this guilt, and from the vengeance due to it, God of his infinite mercy deliver this city, and this nation ; through the merits and mediation of Jesus Christ.

How criminal and utterly inconsistent with duty the practice of duelling is in the gentlemen of the army, may be seen by the following extract from the articles of war:

"No officer or soldier shall presume to send a challenge to any other officer or soldier, to fight a duel, upon pain, if a commissioned officer, of being cashiered; if a non-commissioned officer, or soldier, of suffering corporal punishment at the discretion of a court-martial."

"Whatsoever officer or soldier shall upbraid another of refusing a challenge; shall himself be punished as a challenger; and we hereby acquit and discharge all officers and soldiers of any disgrace or opinion of disadvantage, which might arise from their having refused to accept of challenges, as they will have only acted in obedience to our orders, and done their duty as good soldiers, who subject themselves to discipline." Articles of War, sect. vii. art. 2, 5.

Clause in the 19th article of war from the Adventurer, No. 70.

"Nor shall any officer or soldier upbraid another for refusing a challenge; since, according to these our orders, they do but the duty of soldiers, who ought to subject themselves to discipline; and we do acquit and discharge all men who have quarrels offered, or challenges sent to them, of all disgrace or opinion of disadvantage in their obedience hereunto: and whosoever shall upbraid them, or offend in this case, shall be punished as a challenger."

There is another article or clause of an article upon which a court-martial will always break an officer that refuses a challenge, notwithstanding the above clause, and the two articles in Delany's sermons against duels, &c.

"That if any officer does not behave himself like a gentleman, he shall be broke."

The great Evil, and Folly, and Guilt, of Gaming.

ROM. xii. 2.

Be not conformed to this world; but be ye transformed, by the renewing of your mind, that ye may prove what is that good, and acceptable, and perfect will of God.

THE fundamental and essential distinction between the heathen and Christian religion is no-where so clearly alluded to, and in effect summed up, as in the words now recited. Be not conformed to this world, &c.

The corruptions of the heathen world depressed their gods into the lowest degree of brutality, transformed them from the character of divine beings into the conditions and qualities of beasts of all kinds; and of consequence debased their adorers in the same proportion. The purpose of the Christian religion is the direct contrary; to raise and to refine. To raise mortals into the noblest characters and conditions of immortal beings, to raise them into the resemblance of the God of heaven.

This is the plain purpose of that noble exhortation in my text, be not conformed to this world; but be ye transformed by the renewing of your mind, that ye may prove what is that good, and acceptable, and perfect will of God. The true way of proving what that will of God is, after we have studied it, is to be conformed to it; and consequently, to be as far removed from the condition and character of this world as from darkness to light, and brutal corruption to divine purity. And therefore to exhort, and, as far as in them lieth, to raise men from the grovelling pursuits and purposes of this low earth, to the noblest, the most exalted aims and ends of heavenly piety and purity, is the great business of the ministers of the Gospel. And as the first step to purity is to quit pollution, the business of this, and some following discourses, shall be to warn you of the evil of many practices too prevalent in the world; which have not only lost all their deformity in the higher and more fashionable part of it, but have also gained not only much countenance, but even some degree of credit and applause from them, and therefore, call aloud for rebuke and chastisement. I shall at present mention but these three; duelling, gaming, and luxury.

The first of these I have already treated of in the two preceding discourses. I come now to consider the second, namely, gaming, and to urge the best reasons I can against this wicked and pernicious practice; and, to shew you that it is of the last consequence to you to fly it with the utmost caution.

For, first, all gaming, for any thing considerable is founded upon avarice, and is, if not a direct, yet (what is much worse) a deliberate violation of the tenth commandment; and therefore, in this respect, it is perhaps the vice of all others most inexcusable; in crimes of other kinds, surprise, inattention, and violence of passion, although they cannot wholly excuse the committal, yet doubtless they alleviate much of the guilt, but here all these pretences are taken away, and men are so far from being under the influence of any of these alleviating circumstances, that nothing is more notorious than their proceeding to the practice of this vice with the utmost caution and coolness of judgment. And we are told, that it is in contests of this kind as in war; he that hath most presence of mind, and is least embarrassed, is generally most successful.

Besides the deliberate impiety of this vice, it were worth while to consider also the folly of it. For what can be more absurd than for any man in his senses, without any necessity, to put it to the chance of a die whether his house, his money, or his estate, shall be his own, or another man's? So that nothing but a desperate state of affairs can ground the least appearance of a reasonable plea for such a practice. And even in that case, if the property of a third person can any way be hazarded by the risk we run, then is great dishonesty added to great imprudence; and therefore suppose there were no impiety in this practice, yet such is the folly and danger of it, that you can scarce invent a case where it would be pardonable, even upon the score of stupidity, unless you could suppose a fool of wealth so immensely rich that losses of that kind could not affect the main of his fortune; but that supposition is impossible. Since it is evident, that no fortune can be so large and inexhaustible as to be able to supply an extravagance of this kind. There is no fund adequate to gaming, nor can you imagine any condition of life so immensely affluent as may not be exhausted by an extravagance of this kind in one hour.

Well, but men may limit themselves in this extravagance, and resolve never to exceed a certain sum; true, men may easily make such resolutions; but the difficulty is, how to keep them, when losses and ill luck have fretted their spirits, and inflamed their blood to such a degree that they have lost the thoughts of every thing but recovery and revenge; and I dare say, if it were possible to make an estimate of such resolutions, not one in ten thousand of them hath ever been kept. Nay, is it not madness to expect that men in so raving and distracted a condition, as losing gamblers are often observed to be; that will not stick to abuse their best friends; will swear a thousand vain oaths in a breath: profane, nay blaspheme the sacred name of God, without regret; to expect that creatures in that condition should regard resolutions of caution and prudence is an extravagance of folly almost equal to theirs. And, indeed, such is the distraction and extravagance of men in that condition, that I know nothing more likely to deter any man of reflection either from entering into such a course of life, or continuing in it, than a calm observation of that series of distractions, which, if I am well informed, (for I thank God I speak not by experience,) tear the breast of a losing gambler in the course of a few hours. The ravings of a fever, and the pangs of a convulsion, are nothing to them: nay, in all appearance, they are the liveliest emblems of the torments of hell; made up of a wild mixture of fury and anguish, regret and despair: so that if nothing but the philosophy of life were concerned in this practice, a man of common prudence would avoid it as a pestilence, as the greatest bane to the peace and tranquillity of life.

But it may be urged, that there are men of such cool and calm tempers as never to be ruffled or heated, either into any discomposure of their temper or disturbance of their understanding on such occasions. And therefore, these men seem to be an exception to all the prohibitions of prudence that lie against gaming. In answer to this, it cannot, I believe, be denied, that there are such men in the world; but then I believe it cannot well be denied that they are men of the worst characters in it; they are men who have studied all the arts of fraud and villainy of every kind to perfection; black, saturnine, deliberate villains, who lay themselves out by all the wiles of flattery, wine, seduction, and deceit, to draw the unwary into their snares; and when they once get them there, destroy them without remorse. They are to the the light unthinking part of the world, what the spider is to the fly: they wait with cool, deliberate, unwearied patience, till they get their prey within their nets, and then drain out their vitals without remorse; or to speak more properly, enjoy their dying complaints. One would imagine the psalmist had this scene in view in his description of those hardened miscreants, whose snares and nets are spread for the innocent. He lieth in wait to catch or (as I think might better be translated) seize the poor (that is the poor deluded mortals that fall into his snares); he doth seize the poor, when he draweth him into his net. In his secret places doth he murder the innocent. Forgetting, that God beholdeth all his ungodliness and wrong; and will in his own time repay it with dreadful vengeance. And therefore, well doth St. Paul admonish, (1 Thess. iv. 6.) That no man go beyond and defraud his brother in any matter; because that the Lord is the avenger of all such.

But still it may be urged, that some men can play with so much prudence and temper as never to engage for more than trifles, consequently to be perfectly unconcerned at any inconsiderable loss that may ensue. True, some men doubtless can do so, and to such, playing for trifles may doubtless be as innocent as any other amusement whatsoever. But how few of these are there in the world, in comparison of those who begin with trifles, and warmed with their losses, are carried on by degrees to boundless extravagance? and even of those who can lose with temper, how many are there, to whom money and time so spent can become an agreeable reflection, and to whom it would not have been infinitely more satisfactory upon reflection, to have employed that time to the attainment of some good purpose in life, or that trifle to the relief of the poor; which, however inconsiderable to the loser, might, to them be of the last consequence? And therefore, although gaming in a low and temperate manner may possibly be numbered among the innocent diversions of life, yet probably it is the most dangerous, and, to the eye of reason, the least desirable of them all.

And if this practice be liable to all these objections and difficulties, under the conduct of the greatest prudence and calmness of temper, in the best company, and in all the alleviating circumstances that can possibly attend it; how infinitely detestable and abominable must it be in all its deformity in places of public resort, and in the society of the most profligate and abandoned part of mankind; for such, beyond all question, are the herd of common gamblers; men of desperate fortunes, no education, no principles, no conscience, no science, (except that of defrauding all they deal with by all the low arts of deceit and perjury,) engaged in such practices as naturally tend to create quarrels and contentions, with all their horrid consequences, and lead men into riots and excesses of every kind. For surely, of these may it be strictly said, what Solomon observeth of the wicked, in the 4th chapter of his Proverbs. They sleep not, except they have done mischief; and their sleep is taken away, unless they cause some to fall. For they eat the bread of wickedness, and drink the wine of violence. And therefore, for men of liberal education and good morals, men of any valuable character, to mix with such a herd, would be an argument of more desperate folly than for a man in sound health to throw himself into a pest-house; inasmuch as the corruption of the mind is of vastly worse consequence than the infection of the body. And how hard it will be to avoid such corruption from such society is easy to conceive. Can a man touch pitch, and not be defiled therewith? And therefore Solomon adviseth, not only not to enter into the path of the wicked, but carefully to avoid it. Avoid it, pass not by it, turn from it, and pass away.

It may be urged in the last place, in behalf of gaming, that many men have raised their fortunes by it. And that since it is not expressly forbidden in the scriptures it may be practised without sin. To this I answer, that although there be no express prohibition of it in scripture, yet is it plainly implied in the tenth commandment. And as to the other part of the objection, it is notorious that a thousand fortunes are ruined by it for one that is raised: so that in this respect, a particular curse seems to attend it. And surely it is little less than madness, to propose to establish your fortune by any method where the odds are in fact so greatly against you. Besides, that gaming is not in the number of those arts by which God Almighty hath ordained that the good things of this world should be acquired; for these are the natural effects of honesty and industry, in the improvement and application of our best abilities both of body and mind. And if God Almighty had made them ordinarily the purchase of chance and vice, and idleness, he had destroyed the right order of things, and substituted the worst means in the room of the best; and, consequently, taken away much from the wisdom and beauty of his own establishment.

If then, you would avoid a deliberate if not a direct violation of the tenth commandment, together with infinite disquiet and distraction, and the severe reflections of time and fortune ill spent; if you would shun the society of the vilest and most abandoned part of mankind, and the double ruin of soul and body, consequent to such a commerce; if ye would act consistently with those laws of God and man that are the rules of your duty, and that wise order of things established by the divine wisdom for the attainment of the good things of this world, renounce that impious, that absurd, that detestable practice of gaming.

The great Evil, and Folly, and Guilt, of Luxury in Dress.

ROM. xii. 2.

Be not conformed to this world, but be ye transformed by the renewing of your mind, that ye may prove what is that good, and acceptable, and perfect, will of God.

THE next corruption I proposed to guard you against was luxury; and this I shall consider under the two heads of dress and food.

And first for luxury of dress. Dress being intended for distinction of the several orders and stations of life, as well as for ornament and security from the weather, it is no wonder, if in the wiser nations and ages of the world, regulations in this point have been thought worthy the consideration of the legislature, as a matter of great importance to the manners of mankind; to keep the several orders and degrees of men within their own sphere, and their own district; and not suffer them to encroach either upon the character or condition of their superiors. And this, without question, was of excellent use, to temper the minds of mankind, and abate that vanity which so strongly exerts itself in the spirits of most men; or if not abate it, at least direct it to some useful and excellent purpose of life. Thus,

For example, in the commonwealth of Rome, (in all its ages of virtue and discipline,) a Roman knight, with the abilities of an angel, was confined to the equestrian robe and ring. Nor could the wealth and merit of ten senators united in his own person, purchase him any distinction of dress superior to his own order; so that, in this case, either his vanity of wealth and power must subside, or else it must exert itself in such acts of virtue as might raise him to a higher station, and entitle him to nobler ornaments, and badges of more exalted distinction; and this without question was of excellent use. But when luxury increased with wealth and conquest, and vanity abounded as virtue decayed, then did they find out new arts of varying, and adorning, and rendering that dress more luxurious and expensive, which, for fashion and kind, they were under a necessity of continuing still the same. And this luxury of dress, as well as that of food, being found to have very ill effects upon the morals of the citizens, and also to be of very ill consequence to the public, was often regulated by sumptuary laws, which limited the expence of clothing to a determined sum; and such as was not to be exceeded but upon severe penalties. And this again, repressed the exorbitant vanity of mankind, and reduced it, in some measure, within those bounds and limitations proper to each character and condition in life. And this hath often been practised; more or less, by all wise nations of the world, as the exigency of the times required.

And I believe it must be owned, that if this article of luxury ever needed a restraint in these nations, it needeth it now in the highest degree; and with the utmost severity.

It is but too notorious, that the pride and power of a vain neighbouring nation hath infected the whole world around it with vanities of various kinds: particularly that of light, luxurious; expensive dress; which taking root in a rich nation (like evil weeds in a luxuriant soil) hath over-run it in a monstrous manner, not only to the disgrace of its native modesty and decency, but greatly to the destruction of its true religion and virtue.

There is something in the glare of a gaudy dress that tendeth not only to dissipate the spirits, but even to tincture the mind with congenial vanities, with light fantastic ideas, and specious appearances, and of consequence, to take off the attention from more serious, solid, and important attachments and pursuits; and so become an inlet to the worst vanities that can infect the mind; and this naturally warps men from the ways of truth and virtue: and as this induceth an indisposition to graver and more useful pursuits, it also createth a necessity of greater expence; at the same time that it rebateth that spirit of industry and honest arts which should support it. And what is the consequence, when this love of vanity hath once taken possession of the soul, it must be indulged and supported at all hazards. And as this cannot be done by that industry, and those honest arts which it hath totally driven away, it must be done by evil arts of some kind or other; and often of all kinds.

The history of Gehazi in the 5th chapter of the 2d book of Kings, affordeth a fine illustration of those observations now laid down.

What the true principle and source of his guilt was, will best appear from his punishment; which, being dictated by the spirit of God, was, beyond all doubt, rightly directed.

When Naaman was healed of his leprosy, by obeying the directions of the prophet Elisha, he returned in gratitude to acknowledge the obligation, and earnestly intreated the prophet to accept from him some valuable proofs and tokens of his gratitude; which the prophet, having absolutely refused, nevertheless, his servant thought that was an occasion to enrich and adorn himself; which was not by any means to be lost; and therefore he resolved at once to disgrace his master, and in him the religion of his God, to violate the truth, and so defraud Naaman, rather than leave his own vicious appetites unindulged. Doubtless, he deemed the Syrian garments proper ornaments to adorn his person; and when that was done, the other conveniences of life must be adjusted and suited to them: this consideration made olive-yards and vine-yards but necessary conveniences suited to the other circumstances of his dignity.

The spirit of the prophet attended him through the inmost recesses and windings of his heart, (which plainly demonstrate it to be the spirit of God,) saw clearly into his most secret purposes, and immediately suggested a punishment most admirably accommodated to all the circumstances of his guilt; he inflicted a distemper upon him which made all those vanities useless at once. Syrian ornaments would but ill-become a leprous carcase, and would in effect but make his deformities more conspicuous. And, indulgence of appetite would but more inflame his incurable disease; which must go down to his posterity together with his ill-acquired inheritance.

Good God! how many unhappy Gehazis are there in the world, who trample under foot every duty they owe to God and man, and derive to themselves worse than leprosy, in consequence of their vanities of dress and unruly indulgence of appetite; and convey the taint (but mostly, without the inheritance) to their posterity.

The love of pomp, and glare of dress, is a false and fantastic appetite; and all such are gratified with more difficulty; and not only so, but draw after them many other congenial and vexatious vanities, leading to enormities of every kind.

Gehazi's guilt was a taint that had insected his soul; and it was chastised by an infectious disease that bore an amazing and a dreadful analogy to it.

O my brethren, sin is to the soul, what the worst diseases are to the body; ulcers, and loathsome corruptions of every kind. And the disease now inflicted upon Gehazi, was at once a most lively emblem, and dreadful chastisement of it; at once its shocking picture and punishment. How finely, and how dreadfully instructive is this history to us; and how strictly and religiously should we be upon our guard, least the inward defilements of our sins should descend like those outward pollutions of Gehazi to our latest posterity, and derive, not only mortal diseases, but immortal miseries upon them.

That the people of this nation, and this city in particular, are over-run with strong appetites and unuly vanities, of various kinds, as Gehazi was; is a truth equally lamentable and notorious.

This my brethren, this is the true source of those pests that infect your cities, and infest your highways. This is the true cause why so many of your sons grow up, not as healthful, but as poisonous plants. That your daughters grow up, not as the polished corners of your temples, but as the polluted corners of your cities. This is the true source of that great decay, that leading into captivity, and that complaining in your streets, far beyond the corruption and calamity of all former ages.

This is the true reason why so many of one sex openly act as if the laws of the gospel were totally reversed to them; forgetting, or entirely neglecting to adorn themselves with modest apparel, with shamefacedness and sobriety. But on the contrary, glaring in the eyes of the world, with broidered hair, with gold, and pearls, and costly array; and an equal contempt of modesty and sobriety.

This is the true reason why all those corruptions which the prophet Ezekiel so loudly crieth out against in Jerusalem, (chap. xxii. xxiii.) are now so flagrant and notorious in this city; and of whose inhabitants (I mean too many of them) we may truly say, as he doth: in thee have they set light by father and mother.

In the midst of thee, have they dealt by oppression. Thou hast despised mine holy things, and hast profaned my sabbaths. In thee are men that carry tales (and we may add all weapons of violence) to shed blood. In the midst of thee they commit lewdness. Thou hast greedily gained of thy neighbours by extortion; and hast forgotten me, saith the Lord God. Behold therefore; I have smitten my hand on thy dishonest gain, and at thy blood which hath been in the midst of thee. Can thine heart endure, or can thine hands be strong, in the days that I shall deal with thee. I the Lord have spoken it, and I will do it. Behold, I will deliver thee into the hand of them whom thou hatest. They shall strip thee of thy clothes, and take away thy fair jewels; and they shall deal with thee hatefully. And shall take away all thy labour; and shall leave thee naked and bare.

It appeareth clearly from the course of Ezekiel's prophecy, that the people of Israel had been bewitched by the grandeur, gaiety, and gorgeous apparel of the Chaldeans, to imitate their luxuries, their vanities, and in the end, even their idolatries and abominations of every kind. And after God had, by his prophets, frequently exhorted, admonished, and warned them from those dangerous and deceitful imitations and practices, he at length declareth, that he will totally give them up in the most abject servitude, to the absolute dominion of that nation whose ways they had so wantonly learned, and whose vanities they had so wantonly and wickedly enslaved themselves to, in the fulness of their pride and wealth.

The time is too recent to be yet forgotten, and I hope too memorable to be ever wholly forgotten; since our neighbouring nation, and almost natural enemies, whose vanities we so fondly adopt, and so idly and destructively imitate, had laid a deep and dangerous scheme to oppress us by a sudden and strong invasion, to oppress us unarmed and unprepared; had not God of his infinite and unmerited mercy, timely and most wonderfully interposed, for our preservation, by the destruction of their fleet in their own harbour; by the destruction of the proud in their own deep waters : which if they had not been so destroyed, would, in all human probability, have gone over our soul.

Here a question naturally occurs ; are we in any degree amended by this deliverance ; by this late deliverance added to many former ? alas, it is but too true that we are not. That we are rather become more abandoned in our abominations ; insomuch, that we may cry out against this people as the prophet Isaiah did against his own ; Ah, sinful nation ! a people laden with iniquity ; a seed of evil doers : children that are corrupters ; they have forsaken the Lord ; they have provoked the Holy One of Israel unto anger ; they have gone away backward.

Why should ye be stricken any more ; ye will revolt more and more : the whole head is sick, and the whole heart is faint.

From the sole of the foot even unto the head, there is no soundness in it ; but wounds and bruises, and putrifying sores.

My brethren, a natural body in this state hath rarely any relief but from caustics and incisions ; from the sharpest and severest methods of cure. States and communities of men, in the same degree of moral corruption, have rarely any relief, but in moral caustics and incisions ; in chastisements and calamities of the severest kinds. These chastisements, the divine justice, and even the divine mercy, call upon him to inflict ; and nothing but sincere repentance and reformation can avert the vengeance.

My brethren, the leprosy of sin can only be cured as Naaman's was, by washing ; by washing, as Naaman did, not once only, but over and over. By washing seven times ; not in the flood of Jordan, but in the laver of regeneration ; in the stream of pure and purifying repentance.

If you obey the prophet Isaiah, as Naaman did the prophet Elisha, your pollutions shall certainly be done away, as his were. The prescriptions of both prophets are exactly the same, differing only in the means. Elisha prescribed a natural cleansing in Jordan, endued with a miraculous power by that spirit which inspired the prophet. Isaiah prescribeth a moral cleansing by repentance and amendment, endued with a no less miraculous power by the mercy of God, in Christ Jesus. Wash ye, make ye clean, put away the evil of your doings from before mine eyes, cease to do evil, learn to well.

Believe me my brethren, this is the only prescription that can purify guilt ; that can avert the deadly and dreadful consequences of it, even in this world ; and the infinitely more dreadful miseries of the next. This repentance, and this reformation, the only cleansing lenient ; mollifying and healing medicines of moral corruption, be of his infinite mercy pour into our hearts, for Jesus Christ's sake, our only mediator and redeemer.

SERMON CXXIX.

By PATRICK DELANY, D.D.

The great Evil and Guilt of Luxury in Eating and Drinking.

A CHRISTMAS SERMON.

ROM. xiii. 13.

Let us walk honestly as in the day ; not in rioting and drunkenness, not in chambering and wantonness, not in strife and envy.

By the day in the text is meant the glorious light of the gospel, by which the darkness of the heathen world was dispersed and done away ; and therefore, those vices and irregularities which men indulged in the dark, when the shamefulness and filth of their vile practices were hidden from notice, and from censure, they should now shun and be ashamed of in the sunshine of the gospel ; when the deformity and indecency of such a conduct, could no longer be concealed, could not possibly escape the eye of their own conscience, and the observation and reproach of the whole world around them. Let us walk honestly, in the original εὐσχημονως, decently, and gracefully, that is, let us live with the utmost regard to that beauty and becomingness of virtue which will make the conduct of a good Christian lovely in the eyes of all that behold it; even sots of the night are ashamed to expose their freaks and their follies to the eye of day. How much more should the children of the light fear to be in the face of the sun? If the light of the day be a natural restraint upon intemperance and excess, much more should the light of the gospel. If sots of the night revere the light of the sun, how much more should the children of the day revere the sun of righteousness. How much more should they fly from, and be confounded at the sense of those impurities and pollutions which they cannot possibly indulge without bidding defiance to every degree of decency and shame, and doing violence to the tender mercy of God, whereby the day spring from on high hath visited us.

And in order to prevail upon you to do so, the business of this discourse shall be to expose the guilt, the folly, and deformity of luxury and intemperance in eating and drinking, expressed in the text by the terms rioting and drunkenness, or as it is in the original, καρνος και μεθαις, feastings and sottings. And to this purpose, I shall first shew you what this luxury is; and secondly, I shall endeavour to trace out the evils that attend it.

And in order to find out the true nature of this vice, it is necessary to observe, that whereas food was appointed by Almighty God for our preservation and support; therefore, in order to attain that end more surely and universally, he hath annexed pain and uneasiness to the want of it, in order to excite men to their own preservation; and likewise placed a good deal of pleasure in the gratification of that want; that so we might enjoy our being at the same time that we support it; and be allured so to do.

From hence it comes to pass, that some men, mistaking the true end of food, which is preservation, have placed it entirely in pleasure, and the gratification of appetite; that is, in truth, they have mistaken the means for the end, and used them accordingly. Now this is just as weak, as it a sick man should imagine that the virtue of the physic consisted in the gilding and sweetening of the pill, and so should take drugs, not for health, but for pleasure. Now this properly constituteth the idea of luxury; when men, forgetting or disregarding the true end of food, place it entirely in the gratification of appetite. And hence it is, that luxury is the great inducement to intemperance; when men eat to satisfy the demands of nature, they are seldom in danger of excess, because the demands of nature are easily satisfied. But when men eat for pleasure, they eat beyond the demands of nature, and are drawn into all the evils of intemperance. And hence hath proceeded that endless variety of meats and sauces, contrived with so much labour and expence, and with such curious adjustments and compositions of taste, as have erected the art of eating into a science of no mean figure and esteem in the world; and as it is ordinary with mankind to run into endless error, when once they forsake the ways of nature and providence, so hath it happened remarkably in this case. And perhaps the human folly never was carried to greater extravagance than in this article of luxury: witness that mad and incredible profusion we meet with in the lives of the Roman emperors; feasts continued for whole nights and days together; and emetics frequently applied to unload the full stomach and prepare for it new luxury; and all this to obtain a pleasure, which the exercise of a few hours, in innocent recreation, or useful labour, would purchase for them in much greater perfection; and save all that rack of invention that hath been employed in contriving, as well for the expence as poignancy of food. Nor is the folly of this vice more conspicuous on the score of profusion than it is on account of that infirmity of body and mind consequent to it. For it is beyond all question, that he that eateth to luxury doth not feed for health, but for disease. For nature delighteth in simplicity and temperance, and variety of delicious foods oppress the stomach whilst they please the palate; and consequently

must of necessity be thrown off, crude and ill-digested into the world. The body, under the weight of too much food, is just in the case of a flower oppressed with rain; that which was intended to administer to its life and beauty, now serveth only to depress and to deface it. Nor is the mind in a better condition than the body; for when the stomach is overcharged, the spirits are so entirely employed upon the business of digestion, that the mind is left wholly unattended. And indeed nature is not sufficient for two such demands at the same time; being unable to bear the double expence, of ministering at once to reason and to digestion; to reason in its due demands, and to digestion in extravagance. Now all this considered, it is no wonder that luxury hath always been made the mark of a depraved and degenerate age; and that all those that have set up for amending the lives of mankind, and reducing them to the best and most perfect state they were capable of, have always made temperance a fundamental in their regulations. And for the same reason, we are commanded in the scriptures (infinitely the wisest, the most perfect system of philosophy, that ever was formed) to make no provision for the flesh to fulfil the lusts thereof. The natural demands of hunger and thirst are so strong, that they will not fail to call of themselves for a necessary supply of food, and stand in no sort of need of any artificial incitements or provocatives to appetite; and when these are temperately indulged health is preserved, and both the body and the mind are in a condition to discharge their several functions with vigour. The business of digestion being quickly over, the animal spirits are infinitely at the devotion of the mind, and the student feels no difficulty in his intellectual pursuits; and the man of the world feels no difficulty in application and attention to his business from the weight of fulness and stupidity of indigestion. The body likewise, having taken in no more food than the necessities of nature called for, can lay up no supplies either for vices or diseases; and by this means, many of those evils are prevented to which fulness naturally leadeth, and to which so inactive and sedentary a condition of life as students, citizens, and many men of various occupations are generally engaged in, would otherwise render them too obnoxious.

It hath been finely observed of intemperate eating, that if it had been appointed as a punishment, he had been reckoned a more than ordinary tyrant that invented it. And yet surely, the evils that such a one would bring upon mankind, were light and inconsiderable, in comparison of those which mankind bring upon themselves by luxury of food; for the pain of forced fulness would quickly be over, either from nature's refusing to bear the burden any longer, or from artificial reliefs; whereas, the ill effects of luxury increase with our years, and for the most part, continue with our lives; so that the difference is here; the tyrant might torment you for a little time with forced fulness; whereas, luxury tempteth you to torment yourselves for the best part of your lives.

Again, as temperance enableth both the body and mind to discharge their several offices with ease and satisfaction, so also doth it help to redeem a considerable portion of our time for that discharge. Sleep is the natural relief of toil and weariness: that is, when the animal spirits are exhausted by the labours of the day, men naturally fall into that state of rest and insensibility which we call sleep; that during that season, the body may have a sufficient recruit of spirits for the labours of the ensuing day. But when the weight of fulness and indigestion are added to the other labours of life, and a man goeth to bed, not only to recover his wasted spirits, but to get rid of an incumbered brain, and a loaded stomach, it is evident the business of sleep is doubled; and a man must of necessity rest much longer, than he otherwise should need to do. And this is the only natural, and true way of accounting for some men's invincible sluggishness, and that strange difficulty that is found in forcing them to the early duties of life, especially in their younger years, when their spirits abound, and consequently the waste is easier recruited.

What I have here observed concerning luxury of food, I would have understood as well of luxury in drinks, as in meats; because that is at least equally pernicious. And since all drinking, as well as eating for pleasure, abstracted from the demands and ends of nature, the support of health and strength, the enjoyment of social, temperate, and innocent festivity, and the necessary relief of care: I say all eating and drinking abstracted from these ends, properly constitute the idea of luxury; and are at the same time, the vices of drunkenness and intemperance. Therefore I shall consider this kind of drinking, in the remaining part of this discourse, under that head.

And indeed, intemperate drinking is the most dangerous of all vices you can possibly fall into; and for this plain reason, because that by this you are put into the power of every other vice. So that we may say of this, as of the evil spirit in the gospel, it is not a single vice but it is a legion. And hence it is, that when the apostle exhorteth us, to walk honestly as in the day, not in rioting and drunkenness: he immediately addeth, not in chambering and wantonness, not in strife and envying. These vices being the natural effects of luxury and intemperance, by which the blood is inflamed, the head disturbed, and the heart perverted; and men become a prey to every temptation, and every folly in life. And as this is true of mankind in every period, it is more remarkably so in youth. For although sottishness be more shameful and indecent in old age, it is more dangerous and pernicious in youth; and for this plain reason, youth is itself a drunkenness, that is, there is a giddiness and a fervour that attend it, apt enough of themselves to throw you into too many extravagancies; and God knows there is no need of any artificial or additional inflammation to your blood at that period. You are already, from the condition of your constitution at that period, too much in the power of your passions; and it is by no means your interest to inflame them to boundless sway; but quite otherwise, to restrain them by the united force of reason and abstinence.

The business of reason and religion, of education and discipline, is to calm and cool the passions; the business of riot and drunkenness, is to inflame and boil them up to tenfold extravagance.

Hence all that variety of wild and irrational pursuits and projects, which at once depress and dishonour our nature, mad mirth, senseless and sottish fondness, causeless quarrels, vain and wicked vaunts, open and avowed licentiousness, and an utter defiance of God and goodness.

Solomon hath summed up the train of extravagance and evil adventures such men run through in the course of a drunken revel, with admirable beauty and great exactness, in the 23d chapter of his proverbs 29th and following verses: Who hath woe? who hath sorrow? who hath contentions? who hath wounds without cause? who hath redness of eyes? they that tarry long at the wine, they that go to seek mixt wine. It is in the original they that seek mixture, that is, they who mingle drinks of several sorts to render them at once more alluring and more intoxicating. He then addeth that excellent advice to his son: Look not then upon the wine when it is red, when it giveth his colour in the cup. When it moveth itself aright. At the last it biteth like a serpent, and stingeth like an adder. Thine eyes shall behold strange women, and thine heart shall utter perverse things. Yea thou shalt be as he that lieth down in the midst of the sea, or as he that lieth upon the top of a mast. They have stricken me shalt thou say, and I was not sick; they have beaten me, and I felt it not. And then followeth a greater evil and intimation than all the rest. When I shall awake, I shall seek it yet again; notwithstanding all the dangers the sot ran through, and the indignities he endured in his riot, yet no sooner doth he awake, but he runneth the same round of folly and extravagance over again. The drunkard is emphatically the fool in the Proverbs, who returneth to his folly as the dog to his vomit. He hath no sooner slept off, or heaved off one surfeit, but he swalloweth down another. Again he beholdeth strange women, and again he uttereth perverse things, until he end in fevers or phrenzies; or fall a sacrifice to a freak, or die by the sword of his dearest companion; murdering perhaps, and murdered at once; and goeth down quick to perdition, where only he can meet with greater monsters, and more abandoned reprobates than those he left behind him, whose conversation he is now best fitted for, by a long course of impiety and profaneness, and the worst abuse of the patience and long-suffering of Almighty God.

The business of reason and religion (as I before observed) is to improve and perfect our nature, to raise it to its original excellency; to fit us for the conversation of angels, and arch-angels, and the spirits of good men made perfect. But the business of riot and intemperance is to sink us gradually into destruction, to debase and to deprave; to debase us into brutes, and to deprave us into fiends; to fit us for the society of hell.

Orpheus torn to pieces by Bacchantals, is a fine emblem of the ruin of every thing that is good and amiable by riot and excess. Every passion inflamed by wine is a mad Bacchanal, at mortal enmity with art and elegance and the harmony of the mind. Every ornament and accomplishment of the soul must one day fall before it, must one day fall by the fate of Orpheus, and perish piece-meal. And, to crown all, besides the ill consequences that drunkenness hath in common with other evil habits, it hath this dreadful effect peculiar to itself, that a long habit in this vice may make it at last necessary. Nor can those who have long indulged it, ordinarily live without it. And what a dreadful reflection is it to think, that we have lived so in the world as to make our vices necessary to our very being.

I will add one observation more; and that is, that it is the vice of all others that doth the greatest dishonour to human nature. We think it argument enough against other vices that they debase us to brutes; but this doth more, it putteth us vastly beneath them. And a swine wallowing in the mire is not half so hateful, nay, not half so beastly as a drunkard in his own excesses.

It was a practice with the Spartans to expose their slaves drunk to the sight of the ingenuous youth, to deter them from so shameful a vice, by so sad an example; and no doubt nothing could strike the mind with abhorrence of such a brutal practice like such a sight: but still methinks it was too great an indignity to be put even upon the Helotæ, upon the lowest and meanest rank of human slaves! nay, it were beyond all question, an indignity even upon a brute of better species; and if so, how scandalous must this practice be, how shameful beyond all reproach, in men! in creatures that value themselves upon the use of reason, and the advantages of religion.

I have omitted in this discourse, or rather, have not insisted upon, some of the common topics against drunkenness, and indeed I hope the stupidity, the infamy, the brutality of this vice, added to the inflammation and outrage of every passion occasioned by it, and being thrown into the power of every other vice, when it is in possession of you, will be abundantly sufficient to dissuade and deter you from the practice of it.

I cannot conclude upon this subject, without admonishing my hearers, that of all the various sorts of sottishness, that of going early to the wine is surely the greatest and the most unpardonable. The pretence of this practice, is drinking to get an appetite; but the true purpose of it, is drinking to destroy it; and is doubtless one of the most pernicious practices that ever obtained among mankind. Other sots redeem some portion of their time to their duty, but morning drunkards sacrifice the whole. Here intemperance subdueth by surprise, and maketh speedy progress from one degree to another, till riot succeed to excess, and every folly and every vice succeed to riot; till sottishness subdue itself, and stupidity is oppressed by sleep. Thus time, health, and fortune, are wasted at once; and industry, wealth, and virtue give way to sloth and poverty, and all the infinite evils that await them.

Give me leave to add one short reflection to what hath been said, and so conclude.

The festival of our blessed Saviour's nativity hath succeeded in the same season of the year with the ancient Saturnalia, an heathen feast, instituted in memory of the golden age, which flourished as they deemed under the reign of Saturn; when all mankind lived in freedom, and ease and plenty; and the distinctions of bond and free, of tyrant and slave, were unknown. In this season, masters forgot their tyranny, and servants threw off their chains; and an image of the original ease, festivity, and freedom, was exhibited to the world. When Christianity was established in the place of heathenism, it quickly came to be understood that true liberty was now restored with it; that mankind were now redeemed from the slavery of sin and Satan, and restored to the original freedom of the sons of God. From hence, they quickly came to be considered upon the foot of their natural relation and original equality; that in Christ Jesus there is neither Greek, nor Jew, Barbarian, or Scythian, bond or free; but a new creature.

Those who were before aliens and enemies now became brethren, sons of the same first parents, servants of the same God, and heirs of the same salvation. In this way of thinking, tyrants threw down their scourges, and slaves shook off their chains. The consequence of which was, ease and equanimity among the lower part of mankind; condescension, humanity, beneficence, and charity among the higher; and love, joy, innocent festivity, and freedom among all. How blessed a scene was this, and how noble a picture of the original simplicity, felicity, and equality, was exhibited to the earth!

This was the festival of Christmas in its original institution; then were the house, the board, the arms, and the heart open to the stranger, the friendless, the fatherless, and the widow; and the poor tenant was welcomed and levelled with his lord. Alas! these happy times are now vanished; the great era of the Christian redemption is now remembered in nothing but the name: that spirit of irreligion which is gone out into the world, together with its vile and genuine offspring, the sordid, selfish, insatiable spirit of avarice and private luxury have either devoured or driven away the generous and the God-like spirit of public hospitality, attended with innocent and social mirth. Or, if there be any remains of the ancient and hospitable festivity, they are, for the most part, such only as are seen in the revels of those who, at St. Peter expresseth it, take pleasure to riot in the day time, spots they are and blemishes in those feasts of love, and bring reproach and infamy upon this sacred and solemn festival. Having eyes full of adultery; beguiling unstable souls, alluring through the lusts of the flesh. Through much wantonness those that were clean escaped from them who live in error. While they promise liberty they themselves are the servants of corruption. These are they upon whom the woes and vengeance of God are justly and peculiarly denounced in the sacred writings. Woe unto them that call evil good, and good evil, (saith the prophet) woe unto them that are mighty to drink strong drink, that rise up early in the morning that they may follow strong drink, that continue until night till wine inflame them. And the harp, and the viol, and the tabret, and the pipe, and wine, are in their feasts; but they regard not the work of the Lord, neither consider the operations of his hands. Therefore hell hath enlarged itself, and opened her mouth without measure, and their glory, and their multitude, and their pomp, and he that rejoiceth, shall descend into it. Rejoice, O young man, in thy youth, and walk in the way of thy heart, and in the sight of thine eyes; but know that for all these things God will bring thee into judgement, for time mispent, and for talents misapplied; for health impaired and life cut short; for the ends of infinite wisdom defeated and inverted; for the best blessings of life converted into a curse; either cruelly withheld from all the duties and delights of charity, or more cruelly wasted in licentiousness for the propagation of evil principles and the infection of evil example; in one word, for the best gifts of God, either diverted from their true ends or abused to the worst. For all these things God will bring thee into judgement. His just vengeance will await thee in this world, and pursue thee into the next; where the worm dieth not, and the fire is not quenched. From this dreadful doom, and unutterable woe, God of his infinite mercy deliver us all, through the merits and mediation of Jesus Christ.

SERMON CXXX.

By GEORGE HORNE, D.D.

Dean of Canterbury, and President of St. Mary Magdalen College, Oxford.

The Character of true Wisdom, and the Means of attaining it.

Prov. iv. 7.

Wisdom is the principal thing, therefore get wisdom! and with all thy getting, get understanding.

THE sage instructor of the world, from the eminence on which Providence had placed him, surveys mankind. Discontented with themselves, and their present condition, he beholds them engaged in the pursuit of something that still flies before them. Pleasure, wealth, and power, appear in their view, and solicit their attention. Grieved to see time mispent in quest of things perishable, and labour lost on that which either may not be obtained, or, when obtained, may disap-point in enjoyment all the hopes excited by expectation, he raises his voice, and wishes it to be heard to the ends of the earth. He calls men off from a fruitless chace after objects attained with difficulty, and possessed without satisfaction; he points out one adequate to all their efforts; one, in the pursuit of which no time can be mispent, no labour can be lost; one, which presents itself a fair mark, to be always hit by the quick eye and the steady hand; one, that may be surely gained by genius and diligence, and when gained, is productive of pleasure, riches, and honour; pleasure which fadeth not away, riches which none can take from the happy possessor, and the honour which cometh from God only. Solomon found, if men were disposed to be contented with any thing, it was that with which they never should be contented—their ignorance. He exhorts them to learn: Wisdom is the principal thing; therefore get wisdom: and with all thy getting, get understanding.

The subject will best be laid before you, in its several branches, by considering what it is we are enjoined to acquire;

how we are to acquire it; and why we are to acquire it.

First, then, we will consider the nature of that which we are so earnestly enjoined to acquire.

All the divine learning upon earth is contained in the books of the Old and New Testament, which are written in Hebrew and Greek: those languages therefore, with the Latin, must be studied; and the study of them falls within the department of human learning.

Enough of divine learning, perhaps it will be urged, may be gathered from translations for all the purposes required. But to whom are we indebted for translations, unless to those who by good and sufficient learning became qualified for the work? And as they, however worthy and able, were yet very far from infallible, it will frequently happen, in points of difficulty, that we can neither sufficiently establish our own faith, nor confute the arguments of the adversary, without recurring to the originals. The adversary, to serve his turn, will recur to them; and what will become of us, if we are not able to follow him?

The history of the people of God cannot be understood, without taking with us that of pagan states, particularly of the Assyrian, Persian, Grecian, and Roman empires. An exact acquaintance with what has been passing in the world, since the extinction of the last, cannot be dispensed with in a commentator on the prophecies, particularly those in the Revelation. To adjust the situation of places, and the succession of times, we must call to our assistance the sciences of geography, chronology, and astronomy.
Nor can the proportions of the temple and its furniture, described in the books of Kings and Chronicles, and afterward referred to by Ezekiel and St. John, be well comprehended and ascertained, without something of mathematics and mechanics. Thus necessary is a knowledge of languages and sciences, to interpret the letter of scripture, the source of doctrines and precepts, the foundation of all improvements moral and spiritual, and they must ever be the best interpreters, who have the largest share of them.
The advantage of a superior skill we may truly say, none have exceeded those in our own country.

In a public education, the means and instruments necessary for the acquisition of learning are possessed in a more full and complete manner. The master can give his time and his thoughts wholly to the work : constant and long experience confers a degree of skill not otherwise to be attained. A spirit of emulation is excited in the scholar, who goes on with more sprightliness and alacrity in the company of his school-fellows, forgetting those that are behind, and pressing forward to those who are before, with the determination of a Cæsar, that nothing is yet done, while any thing remains to be done. A regular succession of business, at stated times, inures him to live by rule, and forbids him to be idle ; while the discipline by which it is enforced, renders him healthy and hardy in mind and body. By being put so soon to manage and bustle for himself, he is prepared for the world into which he must enter, and in which he must pass his days ; the various tempers and dispositions of his numerous companions bring him acquainted with those of mankind, among whom he is to pass them ; and he forms connections, which, by banishing selfishness, by exchanging offices of friendship, by mutual assistance and communication of studies, as well as in many other ways, contribute towards his passing them with pleasure and emolument. If all who are engaged in the superintendence of our public seminaries could only bestow equal attention on the learning and morals of those under their care, so that they might go forth (and such, you will all bear me witness, have lately gone forth from hence) good men as well as good scholars, the dispute between the patrons of public and private education would be, perhaps, in great measure, at an end.

Respecting the method of school instruction at present in use among us, it is one which has been long tried, and found successful ; witness those great and shining characters, formed under its auspices, which adorn our annals ; nor have its adversaries yet been able to propose another, liable, upon the whole, to fewer objections.

The observations made by an excellent writer on the plan proposed by the great Milton, are too valuable not to be recited to you upon the present occasion :

“ The purpose of Milton, as it seems, was to teach something more solid than the common literature of schools, by reading those authors that treat of physical subjects, such as the Georgic and astronomical treatises of the ancients. But the truth is, that the knowledge of external nature, and of the sciences which that knowledge requires or includes, is not the great or the frequent business of the human mind. Whether we provide for action or conversation, whether we wish to be useful or pleasing, the first requisite is the religious and moral knowledge of right and wrong ; the next is an acquaintance with the history of mankind, and with those examples which may be said to embody truth, and prove, by events, the reasonableness of opinions. Prudence and justice are virtues of all times, and of all places ; we are perpetually moralists, but we are geometricians only by chance.— Our intercourse with intellectual nature is necessary ; our speculations upon matter are voluntary and at leisure. Physical knowledge is of such rare emergence, that one man may know another half his life, without being able to estimate his skill in hydrostatics or astronomy ; but his moral and prudential character immediately appears. Those authors therefore are to be read at schools that supply most axioms of prudence, most principles of moral truth, and most materials for conversation : and these purposes are best answered by poets, orators, and historians.”

Some have thought, that as we are now furnished with translations of the ancient classical authors, we may spare ourselves the trouble of learning their languages. Were the question only concerning matters of fact, it might be deemed perhaps of little importance to consider by what means we come at the knowledge of them, so that we do but obtain the truth ; though, by the way, whether in particular instances we have obtained it, can often only be known (as was observed before in the case of the scriptures) by consulting the originals. But there is much more in the matter: the writers of Greece and Rome are our masters in style and composition; with relation to which, the spirit of every piece will evaporate in the transfusion. Next in value to knowledge, is the mode of communicating it with ease and propriety. They who have studied the best writers of antiquity with this view, will always themselves be the best writers in any other language. When these shall cease to be regarded as our models, elegant simplicity and manly energy will give place to a false glare of affectation and refinement; loose and licentious tenets will be tricked out in the meretricious garb of false eloquence. A vitiated taste in writing, like that which preceded the decline and downfall of the Roman empire, will precede our own. Tacitus and Seneca will be imitated, rather than Cæsar and Cicero: epithet, point, and antithesis, will prevail; and we shall prepare for slavery, by "babbling a dialect of France."

Nothing could tend more to accelerate a catastrophe of this kind, than the adoption of that system of foppery and immorality recommended by a late noble author, enamoured almost to distraction of the language and manners of our neighbours upon the continent. Learning and religion would then no longer make a part in the education of our youth. One would be banished under the notion of pedantry, the other excluded by the name of superstition. Travel and a knowledge of the world, it seems, may supply the place of both. To know the world, is doubtless expedient; in some circumstances, necessary. But a man should know many other things before he enters upon that study, or he will do well not to enter upon it at all. Let him lay in a stock, and that no moderate one, of useful learning and sound principles, ere he set out upon his travels, or he will be little the better for having seen the world, though the world may be somewhat the merrier for having seen him. If he go out an ignorant, he will come home a profligate, with the atheist ingrafted upon the blockhead. As to the business of the graces—before the gloss can be given, a substance must be prepared to receive it; and solid bodies take the brightest polish.

From what has been said, you will perhaps be induced to think, that in times like these, and in a matter of such importance, projects of innovation are dangerous things. We know what we are to lose; let us be well informed what we are to gain, lest we should be led to exchange an old system with some defects, for a new one with many more: defects which are of little consequence, for defects which are of very great consequence indeed to the general state of learning, and the constitution of our country.—Reformation was the word in the last century, and one was at length effected, which swept away schools and universities, with the government civil and ecclesiastical. The revenues allotted to the support of cathedrals and these their appendages, were seized, with a view to augment the smaller livings. But mark the event—When the estates were sold, the presbyterian ministers who had taken possession of the livings, and expected the augmentation, were told, to their utter astonishment, that the money was wanted to support public credit. It was wanted, and it was applied accordingly; all was then overwhelmed by a deluge of enthusiasm, and illiterate fanaticism. The deluge which now threatens us is one of another kind, but not a whit less formidable.

Thus much for the wisdom we are exhorted to acquire, and the method of acquiring it. A few words shall be said, and they shall be but few, in the Third and last place, upon the advantages attending such acquisition, to the individual himself, and to the community.

To the individual, wisdom is indeed, as Solomon properly styles it, the principal thing. The seat of its residence is in the noblest part of the human composition; and that noble part it renders still more noble. What else gives to man the superiority over brutes; to angels over man: and to the Omnipotent over all his creatures? The Lord is a God of knowledge (1 Sam. ii. 3.); and wisdom was with him from eternity. (Prov. viii. 22. Wisdom, ix. 9.)

The pleasures of wisdom exceed all others, in kind, degree, and duration, far as heaven is higher than earth. Her ways are ways of pleasantness, and all her paths are peace. (Prov. iii. 17.)

A studious disposition makes those who are blessed with it valuable, good, and happy. It enables them to find a paradise in solitude, and profitably as well as agreeably to fill up the intervals of business. It renders them little sensible to the allurements of external objects, to those trifles and improprieties which disgrace the man, and degrade the Christian. The ill-instructed and unemployed are the persons whose imagination is always wandering and afloat.—For want of solid nourishment, their curiosity and their appetites turn to objects either vain or dangerous; and hence proceed all those inventions for squandering away thought and time, which generally end in a forgetfulness of God and ourselves. It is incredible what inconveniences are avoided by those who can pass their vacant hours with books and their own thoughts. "Happy,"—says a prelate, in his day the admiration and delight of mankind, I mean the accomplished archbishop of Cambray,—"happy they, who are disgusted with violent pleasures, and know how to be pleased with the sweets of an innocent life. Happy they who delight in instruction, and find a satisfaction in cultivating their minds with knowledge. Into whatever situation adverse fortune may throw them, they always carry entertainment with them; and the disquiet, which prays on others in the midst of pleasures, is unknown to those who can employ themselves in reading. Happy they, who love to read!" Let it be added, that this happiness is one which as the world does not give, so neither can the world take away. It will never leave us, but continue a fast and firm friend, when every other pleasure shall have forsaken us. Wisdom will comfort us in the day of sorrow, and support us in the hour of death. Like the holy ark accompanying the camp of Israel, she will go with us over Jordan, and conduct us to our inheritance in the land of promise. Exalt her, says the Wise Man, in the words immediately following my text, exalt her, and she shall promote thee; she shall bring thee to honour when thou dost embrace her; she shall give to thine head an ornament of grace; a crown of glory shall she deliver to thee.

To a community the advantages of wisdom are many and great. A nation glories not less in the learning than in the valour of her sons. Long and illustrious is the train of literary heroes, which Britain beholds with an honest and conscious pride, who from age to age have filled the most exalted stations in church and state, or presided in the different departments of science, or from the shades of an honourable and lettered retirement, sent forth their writings for the entertainment and instruction of mankind.

My younger brethren, the hope of the rising generation, our future joy and crown, all these were men like yourselves, trained in the same course of education. Think of their examples, and emulate their fame. The trophies of Miltiades, you know, would not suffer Themistocles to sleep. Hear the author of the book of Ecclesiasticus upon this subject, in a chapter read constantly at our universities, on the days appointed for a solemn commemoration of founders and benefactors: Let us now praise famous men, and our fathers that begat us. The Lord hath wrought great glory by them, through his great power, from the beginning. Such as did bear rule in their kingdoms, men renowned for their power, giving counsel by their understanding, and declaring prophecies: leaders of the people by their counsels, and by their knowledge of learning meet for the people; wise and eloquent in their instructions. All these were honoured in their generations, and were the glory of their times. Their bodies are buried in peace, but their name liveth for evermore. While the world shall last, and any regard be paid to that which deserves regard, the people will tell

If therefore there be any virtue, if there be any praise, think on these things, meditate on them, give yourselves wholly to them. Time is on the wing. It flies, to return no more. Seize the moments as they pass, and employ them to the best advantage. Lose not the golden opportunity, the sweet hour of prime, the morning of youth, health, and strength. Conquer the difficulties at first setting out, and all will be pleasure ever after. Labour now, and comfortable will be your rest, when the season of labour shall be over. For glorious is the fruit of labour, and the root of wisdom shall never fall away. (Wisdom, iii. 15.) Let the sanctity of your manners keep pace with the improvement of your minds. To good governors be respectful and obedient; to your companions gentle and loving; to all courteous and obliging. And that the divine blessing may be upon you in what you do, remember to begin and end your studies with prayer. If any man lack wisdom, let him ask of God. (James, i. 5.) Let him ask that, as the son of David did, and all things else, judged proper for him, shall be added to it. (1 Kings, iii. 11.) Pray therefore that God would give you wisdom that sitteth by his throne, and reject you not from among his children; that he would send her out of his holy heavens, and from the throne of his glory, that bring present, she may labour with you, that you may know what is pleasing unto him. For she knoweth and understandeth all things, and she shall lead you soberly in your doings, and preserve you by her power. So shall your works be acceptable. (Wisdom, ix. 4, 10, &c.) in the sight of heaven and earth, bringing glory to God, credit to your instructors, comfort to your friends, honour to yourselves, and benefit to your country.

SERMON CXXXI.

By THOMAS NEWLIN, M.A.

Fellow of Magdalen College in Oxford.

The Esteem, that attends the constant Practice of Virtue:

[Preached before the University of Oxford, at Magdalen College, on St. John Baptist's Day, 1713.]

ST. MARK, vi. 20.

For Herod feared John, knowing that he was a just man and an holy—

St. John the Baptist having constantly spoken the truth, and boldly rebuked vice, (to complete his character) had the honour of suffering for the truth's sake.

His strict and inflexible justice, his ardent zeal for the glory of God, and his avowed hatred of sin, stirred up a powerful enemy against him, and provoked the keen resentment of Herodias, who was engaged in a vicious alliance with Herod, and had therefore a mighty influence over him. We may reasonably believe that the preacher of repentance had frequently alarmed her conscience with unacceptable reproofs, and quickened it with a sense of guilt, and an expectation of vengeance; she that had been accustomed to hear only smooth things (Isa. xxx. 10.), was unable to bear his ingenuous behaviour, (which she called presumption), and resolved to leave nothing undone, till she had wrought her revenge upon him: she used all the arts of insinuation and methods of address, which were likely to win upon Herod, the partaker of her sins; and since their cause was the same, and the supposed injury was common to both, it might be imagined, that he would be as ready to take away the life of St. John, as she was to desire this gratification of her passion; that she could not make a more agreeable request, and that he only waited for an opportunity of granting it.

* The great scarcity of these Sermons, as well as their excellence, has induced the Editor to insert them in this collection.

But the Holy Scriptures assure us, that though she had a quarrel against him, and would have killed him, she could not. For Herod feared John, knowing that he was a just man and an holy.—(Mark, vi. 19, 20.)

The rays of divine goodness in St. John, shone with an awful lustre; and the beauty of holiness recommended itself, even to Herod, notwithstanding that his favourite lusts pleaded earnestly against it, and Herodias was always at hand, endeavouring to hinder its efficacy by her importunate complaints, and enervating suggestions.

She did at last, indeed, surprise the adulterer into a compliance, by the pleasing artifices of her daughter, and obtained a general grant, when he was best disposed to hearken to any demand.

He that had observed his impartial reprover, and when he heard him, did many things, and heard him gladly (Mark, vi. 20.), he was not aware of the ill use that was afterwards made of the advantage that he had rashly given against him; and as soon as he perceived it, he repented of it.

Though he freely promised to gratify the daughter of Herodias, with whatsoever she could ask, even to the half of his kingdom (Mark, v. 23.), he was yet grieved, when she asked for the head of John the Baptist: The king was exceedingly sorry, yet for his oath's sake, and for their sakes which sat with him, he would not reject her. (Mark, v. 26.) He would have receded from his promise, had he not mistaken the force of the obligation, for he valued the life of this just and holy man more than even the half of his kingdom.

From hence we may raise this observation, That integrity gains the esteem, even of the vicious and profane, and constrains them to reverence the man that goes on in a steady course of righteousness.

And this may be derived from the following reasons:

First, From the established notions, and natural sense of good and evil;

Secondly, From the excellence, and superiority which virtue has over vice;

Thirdly, From the likeness it bears to the divine attributes;

Fourthly, From the beautiful simplicity of truth and innocence; and,

Lastly, From the impartial judgment which wicked men make of things, in their sober intervals, and whenever they are brought to themselves.

And first, It may be derived from the established notions, and natural sense of good and evil. As men are distinguished from the rest of the creation, by one common principle of reason, so they all form the same conceptions of vice and virtue, before they are tainted with error, or misled by the corruption of their nature. The lines of their duty, are so deeply engraven on their minds, that they cannot utterly erase them, unless their whole frame were also to be dissolved. They may indeed sully the light of reason, and partly wear away the impression that was made upon them. And whilst many retain a just abhorrence of evil, others may endeavour to deceive themselves by embracing a more favorable opinion of it. But yet they have some glimmering imperfect knowledge, to accuse and upbraid them with folly; and though they would cover it with a specious appearance, by calling evil good, and good evil (Isa. v. 20.), yet they cannot so prevent their faculties as to support their vain glorious boasting, with a suitable belief, and think that these things are just as they represent them. Though their wills are depraved and engaged in behalf of sin, yet their judgments cannot so contradict, and be the reverse of themselves. They may be over-ruled, but will still serve to render them self condemned, and to justify the conduct of the righteous.

They would fain conceal this their approbation, and silence their thoughts, with loud laughter, and confident railery; but their first sense of things, though not lively enough to be the principle of their own actions, will yet oblige them to pay some regard to those that have acted up to their duty.

And the nature of vice and virtue is not to be changed by their sinful desires, or become subservient to their inclinations; but the marks that are stamped upon them will last for ever, and the difference between them is too wide to be closed. There is a fixed standard of true worth and goodness, and it is not left to be determined by the uncertain opinions, or the arbitrary wills of men, but it is every where the same; and virtue is thought praiseworthy, as vice passes for a term of infamy and reproach; and we are constrained to judge thus of it; and at the first mention of any act of piety, charity, or self-denial, our minds are pleased with it, and glow with a generous emulation: for we know, that it is warranted by right reason, and by the authority of an all-wise God. When we behold a man beset with temptations, and getting the mastery over them, and subduing himself; when we observe him sacrificing his interest to his duty, and hazarding all that is dear to him in this world, rather than let go his integrity; we presently frame an idea of greatness superior to earthly kingdoms and all their fading glories: and he that in the course of his life is steady in performing the service of God, and never stoops to any sinful compliance, is happy in the esteem of all that know him. Every one yields his approbation, and envy dares not cavil at, or detract from him. Even those profligate wretches, that have abandoned religion and thrown up their pretensions to it, cannot but entertain a just opinion of him: and as often as they look into themselves, and take a view of their own case, they wish that their last end may be like his (Numb. xxiii. 10); and they even wish that their life were also like his. They are lost to an affecting sense of the joys and comforts of religion; but still it extorts a veneration from them; and they are sometimes forced to reflect as creatures endued with reason.

And the esteem which naturally follows integrity, is derived,

Secondly, From the excellence and superiority that virtue has over vice; and this is infinitely great, and appears at the first view to all that consider it: the former is the perfection, the latter the corruption of nature: and look how different the glory of the angels of God is from the shame of those accursed spirits, that were cast down from the mansions of bliss, into the land of darkness, almost so different is the state of the righteous from that of the wicked. Behold our first parent walking in the garden of Eden, unspeakably happy in his unsullied innocence; and behold one of his wretched posterity, sold into the slavery of sin, and under the dominion of his unruly affections: in one we see the disgrace and ignominy of vice; in the other the dignity of virtue.

Nay, we may descend lower than this; and if we compare the condition of the best of men with that of the worm that crawlth upon the ground, we shall find there is a yet greater distance between the just and holy man and the vicious and profane, than between the most perfect of mankind and this mean contemptible creature: for this has kept its appointed place, and fulfils the will of its Creator; whereas the sinner is fallen from his high station, and is become despicable to himself. He that has maintained his integrity, knows that he is endued with a noble greatness of mind, that he is answering the design of his Maker, and is running the race which is set before him. (Heb. xii. 1.)

He examines his past actions with inexpressible satisfaction, and delights to observe the beautiful order of his nature; his conscience possessed of its due authority, his reason seated in its throne, and his will and affections paying a cheerful obedience.

And all that live under the influence of his example, second the testimony that his own heart gives him, and ratify his just approbation. His advice is as a law to them, and they study to please him, by an equal regard to their duty: as Job speaks of himself; unto me men gave ear, and waited, and kept silence at my counsel; after my words they spake not again, and my speech dropped upon them. (Job, xxix. 21, 22.)

But the man that forgets the dignity of his nature, and descends to the commission of a sin, is conscious that he done an injury to his faculties, and an action that is a disgrace to him, which he shall call himself a fool ever. He is ashamed at the remembrance of it, and confounded at the unthought; and whilst he has any value for his honour, he would be ignorant (if possible) of his sin, shut out himself from being a spectator of it, and would not that his left hand should know what his right hand doth. (Matt. vi. 3.)

And much more is he afraid of the just and holy man; for his integrity is a reproof to him; it cuts him to the heart with a sense of his shame, puts him in mind of the glory that he has forfeited, and brings his reason and conscience to witness against him. His established virtue rebukes him, like those faithful monitors, and by shewing him how he ought to live, condemns him for not living as he ought.

When innocence appears, vice is ashamed and would conceal itself, as the multitude of sinners will desire to do at the last day, when they shall not be able to lift up their heads to behold the son of righteousness (Mal. iv. 2.) coming forth in his full strength, and his saints sitting on thrones to judge the world. (Luke, xxii. 30.)

There needs no loud declamation against vice, when virtue displays itself with boldness; its presence checks the confidence of sin; and the sinner looks down with confusion of face: his guilt reproves itself, and cries out, in the words of Ahab, Hast thou found me, O mine enemy? (1 Kings, xxi. 20.) He is seized with a prevailing awe, and his mouth is stopped while the godly are in his sight. Hence it is, that the patrons of irreligion suspend the commission of their beloved iniquity in the presence of a good man.

They forbear for a while the language of blasphemy and profaneness, and by an involuntary veneration, are withheld from evil. Were they in the company of those that are equally regardless of God, they could glory in their wickedness, and vaunt themselves against the Most High. But they dare not be thus vile before the man of integrity, whose frowns are terrible to them, and who chastises them for their impiety, barely by not partaking with it. Before such a witness, they take up the profession of religion, and would borrow the reputation that certainly attends it. And this respect which righteousness commands, arises,

Thirdly, from the likeness it bears to the divine attributes. It is a token of God's especial presence, that sheds a glory upon him; that daily aspires to a nearer resemblance of his holiness. Every good action is a copy of one or other of those perfections which God has manifested to us; and he that is distinguished by an unmoveable resolution to do his duty; and by repeated conquests of the most inviting temptations, has something truly great and godlike in him, that engages our observation and bestows our esteem; and those faithful servants of God, that are adorned with the beams of his goodness, are also clothed with majesty; and it is their defence and protection: for even their enemies see certainly that the Lord is with them, (Gen. xxvi. 28.), and desire to be joined in the same interests, that they may partake of God's blessing. It was this that obtained mercy for Joseph, when he was falsely accused, and cast into prison; and this, together with the working of God's providence, gave him favour in the sight of the keeper of the prison. (Gen. xxxix. 21.) This preserved his chosen people, and suffered no man to do them wrong, as they went from one nation to another, from one kingdom to another people. (Psal. cv. 13, 14, 15.), for God did by this, as it were, speak unto them, Touch not mine anointed, and do my prophets no harm. And they that have designed to injure the righteous man, and been armed with power to execute their purpose, have been prevented by a surprising dread, which has bid them have nothing to do with that just man. (Matt. xxvii. 19.) The thought of the intended villainy has shocked them; and his invincible virtue has taken away the strength of their resolutions. And they were astonished as Jacob was, when he awaked out of his sleep, and said, Surely the Lord is in this place, and I knew it not; how dreadful is this place? This is none other but the house of God; this is the gate of heaven. (Gen. xxviii. 17.) When integrity has stood unshaken against the utmost efforts of the ungodly, their hatred is vanquished; and they do justice to him that has maintained it, with certainly this is a righteous man. (Luke, xxiii. 47.) A powerful sinner has been afraid of his bold reprove, and a licentious judge has trembled before his prisoner. For religion disarms and strikes an awe upon its enemies; and it dazzles and confounds them as the light from Heaven did St. Paul, as he was journeying to Damascus (Acts. ix. 3.) to persecute the church of God.

It is a lively proof of God's power over the minds of men, that, even they that hate him, cannot withhold the respect and esteem that are due to the resemblance of him; and as soon as they see his image and superscription, they cannot but render unto God the things that are God's. (Matt. xxii. 20, 21.)

And the most obstinate prejudice is pierced through by the beautiful simplicity of truth and innocence, which is,

Fourthly, to be considered. How much soever mankind may disagree in other matters; how unwilling soever they may be to agree in this; yet they, with one consent, acknowledge the excellence of truth, and the real worth of innocence. Sincerity gains access, by its natural efficacy; it needs no arts to recommend it; but is therefore most acceptable, because it is without art or design.

There is no character more desirable, more generally beloved, than that of a plain honest man; it enters into the hearts of all with an irresistible force, like the gospel of Christ, which obtained a ready assent to itself, by its glaring evidence: it was not set off with a pompous shew of eloquence, or the enticing words of man's wisdom (1 Cor. ii. 4.); but trusted to its own power, and appeared, as it really was, in a simple unaffected narration.

An impartial regard to truth, and a steadfast resolution of doing our duty, are infinitely more valuable in themselves, than all the acquired ornaments, and the most fashionable rules of conversation; and a good man has something truly engaging in his deportment, that pleases more effectually than the plausible civilities and seeming courtesy of the fine gentleman, and the ensnaring embraces and fair promises of the courtier.

The world may sometimes be so far from loving truth, that they will stone the man that tells the truth (Gal. iv. 16), and flatterer, that distinguishes away guilt, and covers their vices with another name.

But they hate the former only whilst they are enemies to themselves, and employ the latter, just while he gives them a little ease, and hurls them into a deceitful security. But there is nothing more odious than flattery: and whilst it labours to conceal its baseness, it shews the excellence of truth, and confesses, that it is amiable in the eyes even of a prejudiced spectator; for it puts on the appearance of it, and studies to be unlike itself; for the mind, though vicious and depraved, cannot relish fulsome and disguised flattery, but rejects it with abhorrence. And the sinner looks down with contempt upon the despicable wretch that prostitutes his reason to the service of a lie, and renders himself the most vile and abject of creatures, to form a transitory interest, or purchase a forced and pretended approbation.

Such is the value of truth, that they that deviate from it must seem to adhere to it; and the most skilful flatterer tries to persuade the person he commends, that he has certainly those virtues, which he falsely ascribes to him: his commendation is as naught, unless it passes for truth, and his designs are disappointed, unless he is believed. How far preferable then is truth, which stands on a sure foundation, and does not court an uncertain opinion, a precarious esteem; which always pleases, when the mind Thas as it is, and which prepares and by speaks the way to acceptance, even through shall, est prejudice.

First, It leads me, lastly, to derive the performance on the text, from the impartial Secondly, that wicked men make of their sober intervals, and when they are brought to themselves.

Thirdly, sins having the assendant over them, are generally regarded in the first place; and every thing that offers itself is considered as agreeable to, or inconsistent with them. Their representation is received by the injured faculties of the mind, and it is compelled to assume their unnatural interpretation: for we say they are they that ought to break, to stand over them? And whilst we are tied and bound in this miserable slavery, the sight of a just and holy man provokes and inflames them; they are galled with his reproofs, and break out into opprobrious language.

Whilst they are warm in the pursuit of their supposed pleasures, they cannot bear the least interruption, they are too impatient to hearken to reason.

But there are some seasons in which they may be spoken withal : when their affections are cool, and they are wearied with the service of sin, they begin to consider the example that was set before them, the patheticall exhortations of the preacher of righteousness, the holy vehemence with which he applied himself to them, and the affectionate concern wherewith he intreated them. And they think with themselves : Surely he was in earnest ; we indeed mocked at his persuasions, and made a jest of our calamities ; but now we acknowledge that he spoke the truth, because he was thoroughly convinced of it, and expressed a compassion towards us, out of a sincere regard to us, and a just sense of our danger ; we rejected him as our enemy, but we unreasonably accounted him so, since he deals with us no otherwise than with himself, and advises us to act as he believes we ought to do, according to his best judgment of things, and the rule of his own practice ; why then should we violate our purest sentiments, by injuring the man who bears a good-will to us, and discharges the most difficult offices of friendship, by rescuing us out of our own hands, and telling us we are to our immortal souls ?

These thoughts naturally and by anthem, when they are disposed to be-der, and make a right estimate of their then they pay a deference to the holds fast the truth, and is not obligations, much rather than to and unless they are totally blinded, they will at one time or other endeavour to make amends for their profane jests and raillery, by treating the better part of mankind with reverence, and despising those that run into the same excess riot with them.

Having gone through the several particulars proposed, I am persuaded you have already drawn such inferences, as arise from them, and have prevented me in the application.

Let me only mention, the great example of righteousness, whom we this day commemorate, and the remarkable effect which his life and doctrine had upon Herod; and you will resolve to keep your integrity, and glory in a brave profession of religion; you will be animated and encouraged by the hopes of bringing piety into fashion, and putting a stop to the spreading contagion, and the vaunting confidence of sin.

* Consider with how swift a progress religion would prevail in the world, were not men ashamed of that which is their greatest glory, were they as bold and resolute in owning the practice of religion, as others are in propagating the corrupt notions and vicious manners of the age.

Consider the powerful influence of holiness, in that Herod feared John, for this very reason, because he was a just man and an holy ; when at the same time he was able to banish him from his presence, and procure the quiet enjoyment of his sin. What a mighty efficacy ~~then~~ would holiness have, did those of the highest ranks and fortunes let their light shine before men (Mat. iii. 16.); it would be beautifully terrible to the combination of sinners, and chase away immorality and profaneness. Did they know the dignity of virtue, they would not so easily recede from it. They are carried away by the false maxims of honour, and yield to the clamours of a sinful generation ; to gain their esteem, and acquire a vain applause.

Whereas the most likely way to be truly approved of men, is, first to be acceptable with God; and did they insist upon, and stedfastly preserve their virtue, the world would be at length brought over to them, and entertain the same sentiments of things.

They only betray themselves, by departing from the old paths (Jer. vi. 16.) of virtue, and discover a low contemptible spirit, by a mean compliance and a servile imitation.

would be admired for their noble resolution, and their example would be esteemed as a law.

And how much more becoming is it to do their duty, and obtain that respect which is derived from the natural sense of good and evil, from the excellence of virtue; from the likeness it bears to the divine attributes; from the beautiful simplicity of truth and innocence, and from the impartial judgment of wicked men, when they are brought to themselves; than to be governed by humour and custom, by the perverse wills, and wild caprice of unreasonable men?

For these are more uncertain than their own vain breath, and their applause will perish sooner than a blast.

But virtue will recommend us to God's unerring approbation: and what he determines is fixed and certain, for it is done in truth and equity.

And all that have any regard to reason, will second his judgment, and the approbation of our conscience, and even they that behold the goodness afar off will admire it. And when the end of all things is come, our character will remain unstained; and God will do honour to us before an innumerable multitude; and there shall be no speech nor language but what shall speak our praise.

Now to God the Father, God the Son, and God the Holy Ghost, be all honour and glory, now and for evermore.

SERMON CXXXII.

The Duty and Advantages of Sincerity.

PSALM xv. 2.

And speaketh the truth from his heart.

THE laws of God are imprinted upon the nature of man, and written in the tables of our hearts. But, alas! we soon deface the impression, and the glorious characters are quickly lost, because they are written but in dust. So great is their value, that they ought to be engraven upon marble with a pen of a diamond. But why do I speak of marble? for that also perishes, and the tables of stone were broken.

But the laws of God shall never fail; his fingers have committed them to a record that shall never be blotted out; and he will preserve them in everlasting characters in the book of life. There every line is a ray of glory, and every branch of our duty is a beam of that sun which shall never withdraw his light.

Till we can read it in that divine original, we cannot desire to behold a fairer copy of it, than appears in the Psalm which is now before us. Surely if ever the heart of the Psalmist indited a good matter, if ever his tongue was the pen of a ready writer, it was in this excellent portion of Scripture. In this he surpassed the rest of the children of men; full of grace were his lips, and they dropped the dew of heaven.

What wisdom may we learn from that important question: Lord, who shall dwell in thy tabernacle? or who shall rest upon thy holy hill? And what satisfaction may we receive from that faithful answer which the spirit of God returned to him, or which, through his direction, he returned to himself: Even he that leadeth an uncorrupt life, and doth the thing which is right, and speaketh the truth from his heart.

Every word that goes before the text, and every word that follows it, deserves our particular consideration; but let me at this time dwell upon the amiable virtue of truth and sincerity; or rather let this be our rest for ever; here let us dwell, and have a delight therein.

That you may ascend to the holy place by speaking the truth from your heart; I shall,

First, Endeavour to direct you in the performance of this duty, and Secondly, To shew the advantages of it.

For That you may perform it aright, you should,

of your, You should cleanse your minds

The abrupt and vicious thoughts.

either of, You should possess them with sound, honourable principles. And;

you, You should speak from the grace of your hearts, without any intent, no of ensnaring or betraying your precious v.

And, 1st, You should consider the folly and baseness of insincerity.

Great is the folly of those men that leave the paths of uprightness, to walk in the ways of darkness. Their exquisite subtilty serves as often to puzzle and perplex themselves, as to entangle others. They are lost in the intricate maze of deceit, and cannot find a way to escape out of the circle which they have artfully drawn. They make no progress by engaging in indirect courses, but are carried to and fro by their crooked and perverse dealings, like the winding stream, that turns back upon itself, and the swifter it runs, so much the sooner it comes again to its fountain.

The path of the just is as the shining light, to invite and lead them on to happiness; and they that have learnt the wisdom of integrity, are directed by the same heavenly guide, as went before the children of Israel in a pillar of fire, and conducted them safely through the mighty waters, and the barren wilderness. But they that follow their own treacherous policy, and plunge themselves into the depths of iniquity, are led astray by an uncertain guide, that resembles the wandering vapour of the night, which trains on the mistaken traveller, till he falls from a precipice, or sinks into the mire. They cannot fix upon a sure foundation, but are constrained to shift and change their place, finding no rest for the sole of their foot.

Their insincerity still wants a veil to cover it; for if it once appears, its sordid designs are defeated. But how hard is it to cover it effectually! Though the disguise be curiously wrought, it will soon be worn out, and require another pretence to conceal its failure: and even the endeavour to conceal it frequently betrays it, and the smoke shews that the flame is stifled.

There can be no peace in this unnatural state; fresh disquiets arise in the mind; and while it is treacherous, the temples of repose can take no rest. For they that are conscious to themselves that they are doing mischief, must also be apprehensive of the fatal discovery. Amidst many cross ways of dishonesty, they know not which to choose, for in ever-expect to meet an adversary. And indeed there are, as industrious to find them out, as they are to prevent it.

Such is the folly of insincerity, if we consider it with respect only to men; but how much greater is it, since there is an all-seeing God with whom we have to do! (Heb. iv. 13.) His eyes are ten thousand times brighter than the sun, beholding all the ways of men, and considering the most secret parts: he knew all things ere ever they were created, so also after they were perfected he looked upon them all. (Eccles. xxiii. 29.)

He sees every spring and movement of the heart, and observes every passion that stirs within it, when it is soured with the rancour of settled hatred, preyed upon by the never-dying worm of inveterate malice, swelled and disturbed with envy, or inclined to blast our neighbour's reputation, by calumny and detraction:

No cloud or darkness can screen our thoughts from his view; they would all distinctly appear before him, though they were more than the sea, and our counsels were profounder than the great deep.

Though our heart were doubled and folded up with the most artful fraud, yet as a vesture he would unfold it:

He despises the admired contrivances of the consummate villain, and laughs him to scorn: he frustrateth the designs of the liars, and maketh them mad; he turneth wise men backward, and maketh their knowledge foolish. (Isai. xlv. 24.) And insincerity must be allowed to be no less base than foolish, the perfidious themselves being judges.

Every sin casts a blemish and dishonour upon our nature, and covers us with shame and confusion. But this is more especially shameful, and, as it proceeds from a mean abject spirit, so it writes fear and suspicion upon the face, and sets a mark on the sordid wretch that is guilty of it. He calls for the darkness to spread itself over him, studies to pass unobserved, and lurks in secret places: whilst no one but God and his own soul is privy to his design, he distrusts every step that he takes, and dreads every man that meets him, as if he would proclaim his disgrace.

Even the pretended advocates for honour, declare the baseness of lying and falsehood. For to give a man the lie, is in their esteem an unpardonable affront; a reflection that can be washed out by nothing but blood; an offence that cannot be expiated by any thing, but the sacrifice and death of the offender.

And if the groundless imputation of lying is so foul a blot, how great is the weight of guilt and infamy that falls upon them who deserve the charge! and if they cannot bear to be accused of it without reason, should they not be afraid to give reason for the accusation?

If you consider the persons with whom you deal treacherously, you must necessarily be sensible of the vileness of your proceeding, and look upon the odious practice with loathing and abhorrence.

If they are honest and sincere, as probably they are; for they are the persons that are most easily wrought upon, the least suspicious of your baseness, and therefore the most exposed to it; think with yourselves, how unnatural it is, to make a prey of such ingenuous tempers, and privately injure them, while they innocently breathe forth their thoughts, and pour out their hearts before you.

Their sincerity bespeaks your tenderest regard, and you offer violence to yourselves, and put off your humanity, when you betray them. They, alas! entertain a kind opinion of you, and persuade themselves, they may safely put their confidence in you. And you (if you are false to them) stab them to the heart, while they are leaning upon your breasts, and knitting their soul with yours. If you can proceed to such villainy as this, you may also murder the guest that begs protection for a night under your roof, or you may imbrue your hands in the blood of the harmless infant in the midst of its peaceful sleep.

But supposing that the persons you are dealing with, are themselves insincere, and you flatter yourselves, that you are only acting the defensive part, and fighting with their own weapons, yet even then you are self-condemned. You are provoked by their treachery, and are you therefore treacherous? You justly abhor their practice, and yet imitate the practice you abhor.

The consequences of falsehood are most pernicious in the important affairs of life; it has also a baleful influence upon our common conversation. It entirely destroys the cheerfulness of it, and strikes an uncomfortable damp upon it: there can be no pleasure in conversing together, if we are always afraid of being betrayed.

And we are exposed to dangers arising from tempers seemingly different. For one man appears free and open, and encourages us to speak in the same free and open manner. His design in the mean time is base, to take off the restraints of caution that keeps us in safety, and to draw us off from our guard, as the subtle commander advances and offers battle, that he may encourage his adversary to leave his places of strength and fight to to his disadvantage.

Another man lies on the reserve to watch for every slip and failing, and make a dishonest use of those indiscretions which he observes, and yet does not seem to observe, in others. Thus we fall into the hands of those that lie in wait for us, and are compassed about with enemies where none were expected.

Dreadful was that state of war which impious men have falsely supposed to be the state of nature; yet it were better for us to live in that dreadful state, always apprehensive of open violence, than to be always liable to be surprized by secret treachery.

Wretched is the condition of that people, whose tongue is an arrow shot out, it speaketh deceit: one speaketh peaceably to his neighbour with his mouth, but in heart he layeth his wait. (Jer. ix. 8.)

That you may never incur this heinous charge, but may copy after him, in whose lips there was found no guile, you should, secondly, cleanse your minds from corrupt and vicious thoughts. For if the fountain be clean, the streams that flow from it will be pure from sin; but if this be corrupt, it will send forth the waters of bitterness, and taint the whole course of your actions.

The heart is the root and foundation either of good or evil; and if this be unsound, and has a canker lurking within it, you cannot safely rely upon it; and how fair soever your professions are, they are no more than an empty pretence, or a specious covering, that makes a show for a time, and then, like blasted fruit, turns to decay.

As therefore we would deal sincerely with one another, you should carefully put away every unreasonable prejudice against your neighbour: for prejudice perverts the judgment, and misguides the will, and gives an evil tincture to all your thoughts, words, and actions.

Envy is another pernicious quality, that disposes men to perfidious dealing, and inclines them to lay trains and snares to injure the person that is the object of it.

And malice is always engaged in the strictest alliance with falsehood; and as they are the distinguishing characters of the accursed spirit, so they have the most prevailing influence over the vile wretched man that delights in the subtle arts of doing mischief.

And though they may seem less dangerous, yet you cannot too strictly guard against an arrogant opinion of your own wisdom, and a vain contempt of the simplicity of others. For these have prevailed with many to double and prevaricate, who yet were above the sordid temptations of avarice, and had no other motive to it, but only a fond opinion of their shrewd, dextrous conduct.

It is this that has moved them to practise upon the easy credulity of well-meaning men; to open their hearts by the false key of crafty insinuations, and to make the basest use of the confidence which is unwarily put in them. It is this that has filled them with an ill-natured pleasure, when they have taken the ignorant in the snares which they have curiously wrought, and made them insensible of the nets that are cast about them.

But amidst the many evil thoughts that corrupt the mind, you ought most especially to beware of those that tend to covetousness. For if this vice has gotten the dominion over you, it will tempt you not only to betray your brother, but to sell your soul.

It was this that influenced the accursed Judas, when he reproved Mary for anointing the feet of Jesus with very costly ointment, and pretended that it might be better employed, if it were sold, and the price of it given to the poor. This he said not that he cared for the poor, but because he was a thief, and had the bag, and bore what was put therein. (John. xii. 5, 6.)

And it was this that had a hand upon him, when he betrayed him, and his Saviour by a kiss, and delivered himself to perdition for thirty pieces of silver. (Mat. xxvi. 15.)

This, I hope, is sufficient to engage you to cleanse your minds from corrupt and vicious thoughts, and, in the third place, to possess them with just and honourable principles.

And one of the best principles that can be fixed and planted in you, is a sincere value for truth, and a due regard to your word.

Truth naturally recommends itself to the mind, and appears with an amiable beauty, though it has no other charms but its own simplicity. This virtue is most especially sweet to the soul, and demands your love and veneration with a mighty force and authority. And its authority should be held as sacred for ever; no corrupt breath should taint it, no faithless tongue should violate it. By its bands the members of society are held together; and every other tie must fall, and all relations be dissolved, if this be destroyed.

Without this there is no safety in commerce, no pleasure in conversation, no dependance upon friendship, no valuable alliance even in blood.

And if you have a just value for yourselves, you cannot but regard your word. And it is then highly worthy of the regard of others, when truth is stamped upon it.

The tongue is then a glorious member; and the faculty of speech is applied to the noblest use, when it faithfully conveys such a treasure.

The words of truth are like the purest metal bearing the royal image. And they are not questioned and received with suspicion and distrust, but pass with undoubted authority, and gain entire credit as soon as it is known what image and superscription they bear.

A generous scorn and abhorrence of falsehood is another principle almost as powerful as a just value for truth. For it has often happily restrained men from the base practices of deceit, though they have fallen a prey to other temptations; and though many vices have taken possession of them, yet they have withheld themselves from perfidious dealing, because prudence and disdained it. And where prudence seems to have lost its power, generosity and honour have in some measure supplied its place, and forbid them to do a dishonest action.

And there is certainly a respect due to those in whom there are these remains of virtue; and though they ought to be blamed for being enemies to themselves, in committing other sinful actions, yet we should give them their deserved praise (and much they certainly deserve) for abstaining from the sins of unfaithfulness.

If you possess yourselves with benevolence and humility, these principles also will engage you to be strictly just. They will incline you to serve your brethren with cheerfulness, and promote their interest with fidelity.

While you preserve a tender concern for them, and are stedfastly resolved to perform every good office that lies in your power, no villainous thought can enter into your breast, no arts of deceit can gain access to you. For these proceed from malice and ill-nature, and cannot be entertained with pleasure by any one that does not delight in doing mischief.

But while you endeavour to make every man your friend, and to shew yourselves friends to every man, you cannot secretly violate their interest, or conceive a thought of being false and injurious to them, without indignation. Since the mouth speaketh out of the abundance of the heart, you should enrich it with virtuous principles, and furnish it with the treasures of goodness; and then you will,

Fourthly, speak from the ground of your hearts, without any intention of envenoming or betraying your neighbour: This alone can raise you to the character that is drawn by the Psalmist; if your words proceed from the depth of your heart, and are directed to a good end.

For this comprehends every thing that is valuable in speech; and without this, your words are either trifling, or heinously evil: for unless the heart guides you, they are slight and superficial, and no more than the vain froth and overflowing of the lips; they are of no use or signification; and happy are they, if they were regarded as little by him that hears as by those that speak them.

But this is the least abuse of words, and not to be compared with the guilt of those that flow from a base and treacherous design.

In discharging the duty of sincerity, it is not necessary to speak the whole truth in every place, and lay open the entire state of your mind to every one that desires to look into it. We ought to keep a guard upon it, and communicate no more of it than is consistent with prudence and safety.

It is sufficient to open the first room in our hearts, to those with whom we are but imperfectly acquainted, and to let them in farther by degrees, as our intimacy and friendship are gradually improved.

When an insinuating spy is observing our conduct with an evil curiosity, we should take care to disappoint his traitorous intentions, and not rashly disclose our thoughts, as Hezekiah shewed the house of his precious things, the silver, the gold, and the spices, and the precious ointment, and all the house of his armour, and all that was found in his treasures, to the servants of the king of Babylon. (Isai. xxxix. 2.) The safest and the justest way of acting, in such a case is to impart nothing but truth, and to conceal nothing with an insincere and villainous reserve.

But there are many cases in which we are required to speak the whole truth, and we should not keep back any part of it, or cover it with any disguise, or blend it with any corruption.

As it is pure in itself, and without any alloy, we should deliver it with singleness of heart, and imitate the multitude of them that first believed in Christ, who were of one heart and one soul. (Acts, iv. 32.)

When a positive-promise is made, the nature of it should be fully considered: it gives the person to whom it is made, an absolute right to the thing that is promised: and to deny it him utterly, is a palpable injury; to withhold it longer than the time appointed, or put it off from day to day, is an unnatural cruelty, and a barbarous abuse of the expectation which we have raised and encouraged.

Perhaps his whole dependance rests upon it, and every disappointment tortures and afflicts him.

The heart is a joint-witness with God, and if it retracts or disowns the engagement, it contradicts the testimony of him who will prove and confirm it by infinite vengeance.

When we endeavour to recommend ourselves to each other by professions of kindness, we should really bear the kindness we profess: for unless this accompanies them, they are but as clouds without water, and trees without fruit. This is their best estate!

But if they are made not only without kindness, but with a wicked intention to ensnare the man that believes them, and accomplish his ruin, which cannot be so effectually brought to pass by open enmity, they are then like to whited sepulchres, which indeed appear beautiful outward, but are within full of dead men's bones and of all uncleanness. (Matt. xxiii. 27.). And they also in another respect resemble the tombs which were inhabited of old by them that were possessed of devils.

We cannot take too much care that our professions be sincere; for as they naturally rise to a higher degree; they will accordingly be attended by greater aggravations, if they proceed from a deceitful heart.

Then only may we trust ourselves, and be believed by others, when they are what they seem to be, and deserve the credit which we desire to obtain.

That you may speak the truth from your heart, I shall secondly shew the advantages of this duty, and it is no small advantage of it, that it gains us esteem, and gives force and authority to all our dealings.

Considering the mutual benefits that we enjoy, as members of society, we cannot but delight to pursue the means that convey those benefits to us. Nothing does more effectually convey them, than the trust and confidence which is put in us. Nothing confirms that trust and confidence more than a good reputation. And nothing more certainly gives us a good reputation than the experience of our honesty and integrity.

Even those that have too little to truth and sincerity in their own practice, are yet constrained to admit it in others, and are best satisfied in themselves, when they deal with a faithful man, and commit their most important concerns to a breast that will not betray them.

If we pass from the necessary affairs of life to the innocent pleasures of our ordinary conversation, even these pleasures derive all their sweetness from sincerity: when we are wearied with the business of the day, and are willing to refresh ourselves with the conversation of our friends and acquaintance; how agreeable and delightful is the refreshment, when there is no suspicion of falsehood, no danger of opening our minds too far, no fear of being taken in the snares of perfidious men!

Our happiness may then be compared to that of our first parents, when they walked forth in the garden of Eden, the air being pure and untainted, and the flowers breathing forth innocent odours.

Great also is the advantage of sincerity, in giving or receiving counsel or advice: and this is absolutely necessary to direct each other through the dangerous wilderness of this world: it fills us with comfort and joy unspeakable, to meet with a faithful friend, that leads us in the right way, or fairly tells us that we have departed from it.

When the mind is distracted with uncertain and perplexing thoughts, how seasonable and welcome are those admonitions which proceed from an honest heart, and a full purpose of promoting our welfare! They are as agreeable and refreshing as the streams that flowed from the stony rock. And while we enjoy them, our case is like that of the woman of Samaria, when she conversed with the messias Jesus, who was able to give her a well of water springing up into everlasting life. (John, iv. 14.)

But how dreadful are the consequences of false and insincere advice! It leads us into straits and difficulties, that we may perish in them; as the thief and murderer directs the ignorant traveller into the narrow passages, that he may surprise and murder him there.

And when we are compelled to dwell in the tents of unfaithfulness, we are as miserable as those who are compassed about with pestilence; when the very air they breathe in spreads the infection, and the fountains, that should quench their thirst, inflame it.

But hoping better things of you, I shall farther endeavour to recommend sincerity, as it engages the good-will of mankind, and inclines them to favour and protect the man that holds fast his integrity. The influences of it are very extensive, and reach even to them that do not practise the virtue; it restrains their hands from violence, and forbids them to injure so sacred a character.

And the satisfaction that possesses our minds, the pleasure that rises within us, is a yet stronger inducement to this duty. Since we cannot but reflect upon our past conduct, it nearly concerns us so to live, that we may delight in our reflections. Every virtue does indeed conduce to it, but none more effectually than sincerity.

When we look into our breasts, how comfortable is it to find no accursed thing to trouble us, no base perfidious thought to rise in judgment against us, no dishonest action to upbraid us!

The pure and virtuous soul that is adorned with sincerity, appears like the beauty of holiness, or the tabernacle of God, when his glory rested upon it; or (if we may bring any thing into comparison with the innocent Jesus) we might compare it with the Lamb of God, in that glorious view, when the Holy Spirit was seen descending like a dove, and lighting upon him. (Matt. iii. 16.)

With what joy and triumph did the faithful Samuel appeal to the whole assembly of Israel, when he was old and grey-headed, and had walked before them from his childhood to that day.

And how fully was the conscience confirmed, by the united voice of the people: Thou hast not defrauded us, nor oppressed us, nor taken ought of any man's hand. (1 Sam. xii. 4.)

Our rejoicing is this (says the great Apostle St. Paul), the testimony of our conscience, that in simplicity and godly sincerity, not with fleshly wisdom, but by the grace of God, we have had our conversation in the world. (2 Cor. i. 12.)

What peace did he speak to himself with what courage did he speak to his flock! Ye are witnesses, and God also, how holily, and justly, and unblameably, we behaved ourselves among you that believe. (2 Thess. ii. 10.)

So many are the advantages of sincerity in this world, that it is almost unnecessary to draw any arguments from the other. But if they are great, as it possesses the mind with peace, and brings down heaven to us, how much greater are they, as it raises us to heaven!

And this we are assured it will, for he that speaketh the truth from his heart, shall dwell in the tabernacle of God, and rest upon his holy hill.

In this present state we see each other but through a glass darkly, and can pass only uncertain judgments, and make but slight conjectures.

But in the other, we shall see God himself face to face, and be liable to no mistake, since we shall always behold the fountain of light. It was the particular happiness of St. John, to lean upon our Saviour's breast, at the last supper upon earth. But if we tread in his steps, we shall lie for ever in his bosom in heaven.

And he will perfectly reveal to us the delightful truths, which he spake with his mouth, and which fell from those lips, in which there was no guile.

We shall converse with the spotless souls, which were redeemed from among men, being the first fruits unto God, and unto the Lamb. (Rev. xiv. 4.) We shall enjoy the friendship of angels and arch-angels, who delight to proclaim their good-will to men.

And the heavens shall open to receive us into the company of the blessed Nathaniel, and all other true Israelites in whom there was no guile. (John, i. 47.)

Having endeavoured to direct you in the practice of sincerity, and shewn the advantages of it, let me leave the whole upon your thoughts in the words of St. Paul.

Finally, my brethren, whatsoever things are true, whatsoever things are honest, whatsoever things are just, whatsoever things are pure, whatsoever things are lovely, whatsoever things are of good report; if there be any virtue, if there be any praise, think of these things; and the God of peace shall be with you. (Phil. 9.)

SERMON CXXXIII.

The Promise of the Comforter considered.

JOHN, xiv. 16.

And I will pray the Father, and he shall give you another Comforter, that he may abide with you for ever.

WHEN our Saviour's departure was nigh at hand, he began to prepare the minds of his disciples for their approaching trial, and to alleviate their affliction, at the seeming loss of their best friend, with promises of comfort and support, equal to the sharpest conflicts.

Having assured them that he would grant whatsoever they should ask in his name, for their own real advantage and the propagation of his gospel; and having done enough to deserve the most ardent love, and engage all their affections, he requires one distinguishing proof of their sincerity: If ye love me, keep my commandments. (John, xiv. 15.)

To reward their endeavours, and to enable them to perform yet more and more, he adds, And I will pray the Father, and he shall give you another Comforter, that he may abide with you for ever.

It was expedient for them that he himself should go away; for if I go not away, says he, the Comforter will not come unto you. (John, xvi. 7.) According to the order of God's dispensations, it was requisite that he should first ascend into the heavens, and then the third person in the blessed trinity should come down to make a lasting abode with them. And our Saviour speaks as if the Holy Ghost would not only supply his place, but render his presence of most advantage to them.

He knew the frailty of their nature, the concern they must lie under, when they were scattered abroad, as sheep without a shepherd, and the great work he had designed them for, and the difficulties they must encounter in the charge of it; and therefore he promises to apply himself to his Father, agreeably to the office he had undertaken, and to pray for them, that he would send down his Holy Spirit, who was qualified to succeed the Messiah in his ministry here on earth, as he was equally God blessed for ever, and who would perfect the work, which, in his infinite wisdom, he was pleased to leave unfinished; for he tells them, I have yet many things to say unto you, but ye cannot bear them now: howbeit, when he the Spirit of truth shall come, he will guide you into all truth. (John, xvi. 12, 13.) And to render his presence more than an equivalent for that of their Saviour in the flesh, he was to abide with them for ever.

The word which is rendered comforter, signifies also an advocate and exhorter, in all which capacities the Holy Spirit was promised to the Apostles, and in them to all the world. In considering the extent of this promise, I shall have a regard to each of these senses.

First, As he was an advocate, an exhorter, and a comforter to the Apostles.

Secondly, To the Christians of all ages; which will bring me,

Thirdly, To shew in what respects he was to abide with them for ever. And,

First, He was an advocate, an exhorter, and a comforter to the Apostles. The Christian religion, though fully ratified by the resurrection of Jesus Christ, did not recommend itself to the world till the miraculous gifts of the Spirit were shed on the preachers of it. And considering the prejudices of mankind, which are hardly to be pierced through by the brightest evidence; considering the sacred authority of the Jewish religion, the pretended antiquity of the heathenish superstitions, the prevailing power of sin, and the established dominion of Satan, it could not be expected, that the gospel should be easily received, which required an utter enmity with sin; which discovered the folly of the heathen sages, and the gross errors of their idolatry; and which boasted of more perfection than the law of Moses.

And had there been none of these objections against it, had the gospel itself been agreeable to the blind zeal, the vain opinions, and the supposed interest of men; yet the persons chosen to publish it, had been thought to cast a slur upon it; and a few illiterate fishermen could not have gained an entrance into the palaces of princes, and a favourable hearing from the pride of courts; they could not have persuaded the masters of Israel to learn instruction, or wrought the admired oracles of the Gentiles, into an opinion, that even they could teach them wisdom.

But when the truth itself was unacceptable, and the persons appointed to preach it could only lessen it in the eyes of a vain-glorious world; nothing but the divine assistance could sufficiently recommend them; nothing but the working of God on the minds of men could reconcile them to the way which was every where spoken against. (Acts, xxviii. 22.)

As it was unlikely that the Apostles should succeed in their endeavours, barely by their natural strength and weak capacities; so they would scarcely have attempted any thing when it was a work of toil and danger, and appeared very difficult, if not impossible, to perform.

We must suppose them subject to the same passions with other men, to have the same tender apprehensions of evils; and, as they could not rush upon them without fear, so they were not ignorant of the consequences of speaking in the name of Jesus. For their Lord and Master had given them a dreadful warning, and a lively representation of that scorn, malice, and cruelty, which they should firmly expect, and certainly undergo.

And their sense of these calamities must be heightened, by the pleasing mistake, that they had long entertained, in common with the rest of the Jews, that they should enjoy the greatest happiness in the temporal kingdom of the Messiah. Their condition, therefore, required, that the spirit of God should rest upon them. (Isa. xi. 2.); and, in compassion to their infirmities, and for the general good of mankind, his sacred fire descended to purify and enlighten their minds, to kindle nobler thoughts, and better conceptions of things.

And such were its effects, that they were not ashamed to maintain the cause of the crucified Jesus, and glory in being the disciples of a supposed malefactor. Animated by a divine principle, and filled with spiritual life, they despised tortures and death, and the impotent contempt and scornful boasting of the professors of worldly wisdom. Being assured that they had a faithful advocate to plead for them, they neglected the usual preparations, and ordinary methods of defence, and yet durst to engage with the chief of their adversaries, that were trained up in the arts of fallacious reasoning, and qualified to ensnare the innocent. They depended on God's assistance in the needful time, in the article of danger; for their Saviour engaged himself to support them. When they bring you unto the synagogues and unto magistrates, and powers, take ye no thought how or what thing ye shall answer, or what ye shall say; for the Holy Ghost shall teach you in the same hour what ye ought to say. (Luke, xii. 11, 12.) Thus they went into the midst of great multitudes; and though there were numbers to overpower, and clamour to silence, though there was wit to deride, artifices to baffle, and threatenings to discourage them, yet they spoke the truth of God, answered the objections, rejected the scoffings, and wiped off the calumnies of their accusers.

And as this their advocate enabled them to speak in the behalf of a persecuted religion, and endued them with such measures of strength, that though the heathen raged, and the people imagined a vain thing; though the kings of the earth stood up, and the rulers were gathered together, against the Lord, and against his Christ, yet they broke their bonds in sunder, and cast away their cords from them. (Psal. ii. 1, 2, 3.); so he turned the hearts of men in favour of them, and made their enemies be at peace with them. (Prov. xvi. 7.) By his secret operations, he changed the bent and disposition, even of the perverse and stubborn Jew, reconciled the teachers of philosophy to the doctrines of the cross, which they once called foolishness (1 Cor. i. 23.) and gained many proselytes to a pure and holy religion, in the courts of heathen emperors, and out of the nearest kindred of cruel and unrelenting tyrants.

Even they that denied the holy One, and killed the Prince of Life (Acts, iii. 14, 15.), were of the multitude of them that were afterwards joined to the disciples.

Whilst the chief priests and elders took counsel to slay them, Gamaliel, a Pharisee, a doctor of law, that was had in reputation among the people (Acts, v. 34), allayed the fury that was kindled against them, by persuading his brethren, to beware, lest they should fight against God. (Ver. 39.)

The keeper of the prison came and fell down before Paul and Silas his prisoners, and washed their stripes (Acts, xvi. 29, 33), which perhaps he himself had given them.

And the ministers of torture were softened into pity, at the point of execution, and would become partakers of their sufferings, rather than inflict them on the disciples of Jesus.

Through the same blessed Spirit, the successors of the Apostles were first admitted into the presence of the emperors, and then offered such apologies to them as suspended the hottest persecutions, and almost prevailed with them to repeal the edicts published against the Christians.

Such was the force and mighty influence of these apologies, that they subdued kingdoms, stopped the mouths of lions, quenched the violence of fire, and took away the edge of the sword. (Heb. xi. 33, 34.)

A second office of the Holy Spirit, was to stand by the Apostles, and exhort them to pass cheerfully through this vale of sorrow, and go on in the discharge of their duty, when the terrors of a thousand deaths were set in array against them. Such is the frailty of our nature, that it seemed to want a support, even when Almighty God had taken it upon him.

He that could have commanded legions of angels (Mat. xxvi. 53.) to fight for him, was pleased to permit one of that glorious order to attend him, in his agonies in the garden; and to shew, that as man, he was moved at the sight of that bitter cup (Luke, xxii. 43.) which was mixt for him, there appeared an angel unto him from heaven strengthening him (Mat. xxvi. 56). And the disciples, that forsook him and fled, were infinitely more liable to fail, were in a more pressing want of such aids as would be sufficient for them.

And their Master poured out his grace in great abundance upon them, and considered the difficulties attending their high calling. And as often as they were required to appear on an extraordinary occasion, they were sensible of the immediate presence, and received the dictates of the Holy Ghost.

They were released out of prison, that they might preach before those that had cast them into it, and by a message from Heaven, were commissioned to go, stand, and speak in the temple, to the people, all the words of this life. (Acts, v. 20.)

When the question was put to them, Did not we straitly command you, that you should not teach in this name (ver. 28.)? they answered, pursuant to the divine command, We ought to obey God rather than men. (ver. 29.) He presented unto them opportunities of publishing the gospel, and exhorted them to offer the means of salvation to such as would accept of them.

Thus when an eunuch of great authority under Candace, the queen of the Ethiopians, was returning from Jerusalem, sitting in his chariot, and reading Isaiah the prophet, the Spirit said unto Philip, Go near and join thyself to this chariot (Acts, viii. 27, 28, 29.); and such was the success of his preaching, that the eunuch declared, that he believed that Jesus Christ was the Son of God. (Acts, viii. 37.)

Thus also in the case of Cornelius the Centurion (Acts, x.), by the direction of the Holy Spirit, several circumstances concurred to prepare him for his conversion, and to dispose St. Peter to bring the glad tidings of salvation to him and his household. The Gentiles were inclined to seek him, and he was persuaded to comply with their request.

When St. Paul, by the guidance of the Spirit, departed to Corinth, the Lord spake unto him by night in a vision: Be not afraid, but speak, and hold not thy peace, for I am with thee, and no man shall set on thee to hurt thee: for I have much people in this city. (Acts, xviii. 9, 10.)

And when he had borne his name among the Gentiles, he tells his followers, I go bound in the spirit to Jerusalem, not knowing the things that shall befall me there; save that the Holy Ghost witnesseth in every city, saying, that bonds and afflictions abide me; but none of these things move me, neither count I my life dear to myself, so that I might finish my course with joy, and the ministry which I have received of the Lord Jesus, to testify the Gospel of the grace of God. (Acts, xx. 22, 23, 24.) It was the Spirit that gave him this view of his sufferings, and enabled to stand stedfast and unmoveable; which brings me to consider him,

Thirdly, as a comforter; and in this respect the disciples impatiently expected him, in their private character, as they were touched with the same sorrows as other men are at the departure of their friend.

It was a severe trial to see their great deliverer, in whom they trusted, with whom they went up and down, and familiarly conversed, nailed to a cross, and numbered with the transgressors. (Isa. liii. 12.) They could not willingly let go their hopes; and their hearts must sink within them, when they were forced to bury them in the grave with their Saviour. And though his resurrection raised up their drooping souls, yet his short continuance on earth, would rather have enhanced than alleviated their affliction, had they been left comfortless for ever, and abandoned and exposed to the cruel mockeries of an insulting world.

But he would not leave them comfortless, but promised to give such peace as the world could not give. (John, xiv. 27.), and to fill them with unspeakable consolation.

And for this they were waiting with one accord, in prayer and supplication, when on a sudden they were filled with the Holy Ghost (Acts, i. 14.—ii. 4.); and his comforts not only wiped away all tears from their eyes (Rev. vii. 17.), and drew a veil over their past sorrows, but maintained a cheerful composed temper, and a fixed resolution, amidst the sharpest pangs and most exquisite tortures. When they were beaten for glorying in the name of Jesus, they departed from the presence of the council, rejoicing that they were counted worthy to suffer shame for his name. (Acts, v. 41.) Nay, though the prison doors were opened, they refused to accept of their liberty, and they that imprisoned them, came and besought them, and brought them out, and desired them to depart out of the city. (Acts, xvi. 39.)

These spiritual comforts placed them above the power of their enemies, defeated their cruelty, and upbraided them with weakness. Had they privily escaped, or been rescued by violence, they that hated them had not known the measure of their own power, and therefore had supposed it greater than it was; they had flattered themselves with a vain imagination, and been swoln with the thought of what they intended. But since they put it in execution, stretched out their power to its utmost length, and did the worst that ingenious malice and artful cruelty could invent; and yet all this was too little to deprive them of their peace and satisfaction; since they saw them smiling upon the face of death, enjoying their punishment, and breathing out their souls in praise and thanksgiving; this must mortify their pride, and be an ungrateful disappointment to them.

And all this was owing to that blessed Spirit that was their advocate to plead for them, their monitor to exhort them, and their faithful friend to comfort them.

These kind offices he performed in behalf of the Apostles: and though their case was extraordinary, yet the same gracious Spirit considers our common necessities; for,

Secondly, The benefits of his intercession, his exhortations, and his comforts, are promised to the Christians of all ages. And,

1st, He is our advocate; as he teaches us to pray, and then makes our requests known to God: we are foolish and ignorant before him, and though we are hardly sensible of any thing in ourselves, but wants and necessities, yet we cannot represent our condition, or offer up such petitions as become wretched indigent creatures.

We understand so little of the things that are before us, that it is dangerous to trust our own desires, and we should be far more miserable than we are, were we not under the care of a wise and good Being, that distinguishes between what is really fit for us, and what we importunately crave, that with-holds the curses we imprudently call down upon our selves, and blesses us with frequent denials.

What an unspeakable advantage is this, that God directs our applications to him, before he receives them! Infinite condescension! He frames our prayers, that he may accept of them, and teaches us to ask for such things as he can vouchsafe to grant, and such as are best for us to receive.

These are stupendous instances of mercy, that the first person in the trinity should hearken to us, sinful creatures; that the second should present our petitions at the throne of grace, with the innocence of his own perfect obedience, and intreat for the acceptance of them, as a reward of his sufferings; and that the third should join with our spirit, second and enforce our desires, with groanings which cannot be uttered (Rom. viii. 26.), put himself in our place, and beg for our relief, more earnestly, more importunately, than the wretch that is ready to perish does for an alms.

3dly, To qualify us for the blessings of heaven, he exhorts us to do our duty. He abides with us for ever, if we do not constrain him to give us up to our folly. And he continually follows us with persuasives to a good life. Every religious thought, every honest intention proceeds from him; he waits for a proper season of speaking to us, meets us in the openings of the gates (Prov. i. 21.), and at every turning; lays such trains of occurrences, as are most likely to allure us to do our duty, recommends the happy opportunity of saving our souls, and endeavours to prepare our minds, that we may act in the fortunate juncture, in such a manner as will be for our lasting advantage. How often does he whisper to us, This do and live (Gen. xlii. 18.); with what care does he sow the seed of God's word in our hearts!

How constantly does he water the tender plant! How does he labour to season our minds with virtue! Do not we often find ourselves struck with some affecting truth? and are we not pleased to see the impression? When we are inflamed with a pious sermon, or a beautiful description of religion, a lively representation of the rewards of righteousness, or the torments of the damned; it is the Holy Spirit that speaks to us by his ministers, that gives the truths of religion their full force and efficacy, that beseeches us to be happy, and with an affectionate concern, persuades us to avoid the way that leads to misery.

And, 3dly, That we may not want any thing that is requisite to bring us to the everlasting enjoyment of himself, he supports us with his comforts; and these he abundantly supplies us with in the time of trial, and after we have strove to gain the conquest. Agreeably to the condition we were designed for here below, he permits us to fall into temptations. But to prevent our yielding to them, he is always ready to help us, and then most especially reaches out himself to us when our case most requires; and if men do not presume too far, or leave their whole business to him, without the least concurrence on their part; he will certainly either remove the temptation, or render their virtue more glorious in triumphing over it. Hence it is that they sometimes maintain their ground against the most violent opposition, and perceive that they are endued with greater strength, than they were ever conscious of before. As the evils of this world come fast upon them, like a wide breaking in of waters (Job, xxx. 14), their resolutions are more and more confirmed; and their almighty Comforter bids them stand up undaunted, in the midst of those sufferings, at the expectation of which nature trembled, and the succours of reason were ready to forsake them, and fly away. Hence it is that they have preserved their innocence, though almost every thing else that was dear to them, came in competition with it, and have received the most astonishing tidings of ill fortune, with an easy indifference, a generous contempt, and a noble bravery.

And, after the temptation has attacked them in vain, and they look back with pleasure on the conflict, then it is, that the peace of God, which passeth all understanding, fills their hearts and minds. (Phil. iv. 7.) Under his shadow they enjoy a delightful calm; their conscience gives its unerring approbation, and the Spirit witnesses with it; and, from their joint testimony, they derive a firm assurance of inheriting an eternity of bliss. And that we may not think this an ill grounded persuasion, and that the Apostles only had reason to expect such a Comforter, I am,

Thirdly, To shew in what respects, he was to abide with them for ever. The persons to whom this promise was made, are to be considered in three capacities: as the disciples of our Lord; as the pastors of his church, and as the representatives of all believers, in the succeeding ages of Christianity.

As they were the disciples of Jesus, he was to abide with them, during their life, which short and uncertain space is here termed for ever; and this, in opposition to the small number of years in which their Saviour had continued with them. He did not manifest himself to them, till he thought it expedient to enter on the public discharge of his ministry, and after he had performed his mighty works amongst them, he was cut off for the transgressions of his people; and though he again appeared to them, it was only to stay forty days, to display the glory of his resurrection, to promise them another Comforter, that should abide with them for ever; and then, in the presence of them all, to ascend triumphantly into heaven, that he might give this best of gifts unto men.

That they might not sorrow as men without hope, or be deprived of the enjoyment of this heavenly guest, by fearing the loss of so great a blessing, he was to make himself their constant companion, and to preserve their going out and their coming in, from that time forth for evermore. (Psal. cxxi. 8.)

As they were pastors of Christ's flock, all that should succeed them in that sacred office, were with them entitled to the benefits of this last promise of their Saviour. The miraculous gifts of the Holy Ghost were indeed peculiar to the first ages of Christianity, and continued no longer than they were necessary for the propagation of the faith; but his assistance was promised to all that were set apart to minister in holy things: their authority is ratified by him: he seconded their endeavours, and gives success to their preaching; and by this gracious influence, our Saviour is still present with us, and if we watch over the people committed to our charge, teaching them to observe all things whatsoever he has commanded us, to, he is with us always even to the end of the world. (Matt. xxviii. 20.)

But there is an infinite treasure of graces and blessings, which are not confined to any age, or to any order of men; and these were promised to the Apostles, as they represented the whole body of Christians. Every one that asks of God in the name of our only Mediator, shall certainly receive the graces of his Spirit. Sincere and fervent prayer is the only condition of obtaining them; and though we are of ourselves weak, helpless creatures, yet if we come rightly qualified to implore the divine favour, we may engage omnipotence in our defence, and as far as our condition requires, God's power will become our own. To encourage our dependance upon him, he has adopted us for his sons; and from the natural affection which parents bear towards their offspring, he teaches us to conclude, that he will do much more for us than the most tender father will do for his children: If ye being evil know how to give good gifts to your children, how much more shall your heavenly Father give the Holy Spirit to them that ask him? (Luke, xi. 13.) We may therefore come boldly unto the throne of grace, for we shall obtain mercy, and find grace to help in time of need. (Heb. iv. 16.)

And though we live at a distance from the time of our Saviour's appearing in the flesh, yet we have another Comforter, even the Spirit of truth, that will abide with us for ever.

But let us remember the conditions that will qualify us for his presence; and prepare a place for him in our hearts: let us cleanse our thoughts, and keep our intentions pure and unspotted, that our prayers may be such as he will approve, such as he will condescend to make known to the Father, and enforce with his powerful intercessions.

Let us hearken to his kind exhortations, and consider, how inexcusable, how ungrateful, how unnatural it is, to disobey his repeated admonitions, when it is for our sakes he speaks to us when it can be no addition to his own happiness, when the motives he uses to prevail upon us, are the strongest obligations to the practice of virtue, or dissuaves from vice, eternal happiness, or endless misery.

Let us endeavour to answer his important designs in coming down to abide with us. Let us not grieve his Holy Spirit (Eph. iv. 30.) who endears himself to us by the name of Comforter, and who is pleased to represent himself as rejoicing with our conscience, and glorying in our conquest over sin.

Let us not have this to aggravate our torments; that we refused to be intreated by God himself, when he vouchsafed to be our companion, our familiar friend, that he might save us.

Let us not chuse the society of accursed spirits, when the Holy Ghost has wooed and besought us to receive him, and offered to abide with us here on earth, that we might abide with him for ever in heaven. Amen.

SERMO CXXXIV.

By THOMAS NEWLIN, M.A.

The Necessity of shewing our Faith by our Works.

JAMES, ii. 19.

Thou believest that there is one God: Thou dost well; the devils also believe and tremble.

THE proofs of the being of a God strike with so bright an evidence upon the minds of men, that they are constrained to believe, and cannot deny their assent to this great important truth. But the corruption of nature prevails so far; and their affections cleave so fast to their vices, that they endeavour to persuade themselves that the bare belief of a God is sufficient for them; and desire to rest in the profession, without the practice of religion.

And could they obtain this favourable indulgence, we should hear no more complaints of the difficulty of believing; the atheist would give up his admired cavils, and darling objections, and would be contented to renounce his infidelity, if he might still continue in immorality.

The ancient heretics laboured to procure this state of licentiousness, and flattered themselves into an opinion, that they might believe in God, and serve their sins, like the strange nations that were planted in Samaria, who feared the Lord, and served their own gods. (2 Kings, xvii. 33.)

The works of the ceremonial law, having been justly proved to be no longer necessary, they argued from thence against the necessity of the moral law. And they concluded that faith alone was so excellent, or even so meritorious, that they might lay their whole stress upon it, and needed no other title to eternal happiness.

To prevent the fatal effects of this erroneous notion, the apostle St. James speaks against it with a becoming warmth, and earnestness of expression, and the utmost force of argument. He shews that faith without works is dead; (James, ii. 17.) entirely unprofitable, and ineffectual to salvation; and very far prefers the man that shews his faith by his works, before him, who shews his faith without works. (James, ii. 18.) And at length applying himself to the latter, he offers a dreadful, but certain and weighty truth to his consideration: Thou believest that there is one God: Thou dost well; the devils also believe and tremble. He commands him for believing; but tells him, the devils also do the same. And if it cannot avail for the abatement of the torments of hell, it can never avail for the attainment of the happiness of heaven.

That this powerful argument may make a due impression upon us, I shall shew,

First, That the bare belief of a God is ineffectual to salvation. And,

Secondly, That it will serve only to aggravate our guilt, and sharpen our punishment. And,

First, it is ineffectual to salvation, because it is not properly a virtue. It rests in the mind without exerting itself, and lies dormant there, without inclining the will to obey, or bringing the affections into subjection to God. And we may illustrate its weakness and insufficiency, by an obvious and familiar instance. Should a subject acknowledge his sovereign to have a lawful and undoubted right to his crown, and declare it to be his constant opinion, and yet withhold his obedience from him, and refuse to make the due returns for protection; we should certainly think his demands unreasonable if he claimed a place of profit or honour, as a just reward of this vain acknowledgment and empty declaration. And we should think him yet more unreasonable, if he not only neglected his service, but engaged in rebellion against him; and yet expected that the owning of his title should be esteemed an undeniable plea for pardon.

And if the slight acknowledgment of an earthly sovereign falls short of our duty to him, how much shorter must as slight an acknowledgment fall of our duty to the King of Heaven!

And St. James has fully illustrated the case, in the instance of charity. Though we make the most specious pretensions to that glorious virtue, yet unless we bring forth fruits worthy of it, it is less than nothing, and vanity. If a brother or sister be naked and destitute of daily food, and we say unto them, Depart in peace, be ye warmed and filled; and notwithstanding this, give them not those things that are needful to the body; what doth it profit? (James, ii. 15, 16.) It is not charity, but an insolent sarcasm, that rears the soul of the needy, and breaks them in pieces with words. (Job, xix. 2.)

How fatally was the church of Laodicea deceived, when she said she was rich, and increased with goods, and had need of nothing, though she was wretched and miserable, and poor, and blind, and naked! (Rev. iii. 17.) Thus are they deceived, who satisfy themselves with believing, that there is an infinitely wise, and just, and holy God, while they offend his wisdom, justice, and holiness.

Moreover, the barren belief of a God is not properly a virtue, because we are almost compelled to believe there is a God. To assent to a well-attested truth, is not a matter of choice, but rather a necessary operation of the mind. For truth is its natural object; and when it presents itself, supported by authentic testimony, the mind as readily receives it, as the eye does the light when it springs forth from its fountain.

We may indeed confine ourselves to a place of darkness, or shut our eyes that the light may not shine in upon them; and we may be so perverse, as to argue, that there is no such thing as light, that it is only a pleasing vision, and exists only in our imagination. But at the same time, we cannot but know, that we obstinately confine ourselves, and suffer violence and torture, that we may not behold the light.

And the same perverseness may tempt us to reject all the proofs of the being of God, and guard every passage to our minds, that no argument may enter into them. And whilst we suspend our reason, and disclaim to hearken to the reports even of our senses, we may insolently affirm, that there is no God, and attempt to laugh away the belief of him, as the invention of priestcraft, or the imposition of arbitrary power. But still we unavoidably know that we offer an unnatural violence to ourselves, and can hardly withstand the proofs that surround us, though we scornfully cast them off, with the most inveterate prejudice.

We live in the midst of them; they cry unto us, whithersoever we go, and continually put forth their voice: they appear in the top of high places, by the way, in the places of the paths: they wait for us at the gates, at the entry of the city, at the coming in of the doors (Prov. viii. 1, 2, 3.): they offer themselves to each of our senses, and meet us in every thought. (Wisd. vi. 16.)

If we consider the heavens, and the beautiful order of the moon, and the stars, the heavens declare the glory of God, and the firmament sheweth his handy-work. (Psal. xix. 1.)

If we could go down to hell, and view the prisoners that are held in everlasting chains, the very devils would tell us, there is a God : we should find no atheists there : for those accursed spirits believe and tremble.

If we behold the dawning of the day, it will proclaim his being to us, for the outgoings of the morning praise him. (Psal. lxx. 8.) And when the darkness spreads itself over us, our own hearts assure us, that he maketh darkness, and it is night. (Psal. civ. 20.)

If we think upon the wonders of the great deep, they constrain us to acknowledge him, who lifteth up the waves thereof, and who maketh the storm a calm. (Psal. cvii. 25, 29.)

The time would fail me to speak of the cattle upon a thousand hills, (Psal. l. 10.) the armies of creatures that move upon the face of the earth, the swarms of insects, and the seeds of plants, each of which infinitely exceeds all the works of art, and sufficiently proves the wisdom, and power, and goodness of God.

But were there no other creature than man, he would himself display a world of wonders, and effectually confute his own arguments, whilst he attempted to disown his Maker.

His eye contains almost as many beauties as it beholds : and the man that curiously examines its artful frame, may be tempted to dwell for ever upon it, and say, as the surprised disciple did, It is good for me to be here. (Luke, ix. 33.)

The tongue that too often blasphemes the name of God, does yet, in spite of the sinner, proclaim his glory ; and those very talents that are abused to the denial of a God, do undeniably shew that there is one.

How much soever the pretended infidel may endeavour to deface his reason, yet it still will bear the image and superscription of God. And though degenerate man may sink himself into the depth of corruption, and become little more than dust and ashes, yet some sparks of the heavenly fire will remain within him, some tokens of the Deity will be left, in the ruins of human nature.

And the proofs of his being, which we find within and without us, which attend us, when we sit in the house, and when we walk by the way, when we lie down, and when we rise up (Deut. vi. 7,) are abundantly confirmed by the united testimony of every age and nation.

Ask now of the days that are past, which were before you, since the day that God created man upon the earth (Deut. iv. 32.), and they will tell you, there has been no part of time without the knowledge of God. And ask from the one side of heaven to the other (Deut. iv. 32.), and it will tell you, there has not been any nation or people intirely ignorant of him.

A faint and glimmering light discovered itself in the lands of darkness ; and though the wretched inhabitants had almost forgotten that they were men, yet they had not utterly forgotten that there was a God.

And the wisest of the nations preserved the knowledge of his being, and valued it more than all the improvements of their reason. They were not so wise in their own conceits (Rom. xii. 16.), as our modern infidels, nor did they reject it, as a thing above their capacities, nor scoff at it, as a thing below them.

When the several countries were peopled, the knowledge of God spread itself over the world ; and after the division of tongues, every speech and language ministered to the propagation of it.

And I may appeal even to the atheist himself concerning the proofs of a Deity, as St. Paul did to Agrippa, concerning the prophets, Believest thou these things ? I know that thou believest. (Acts, xxvi. 27.)

For though all other arguments should in vain demand his belief, though they press him in vain to hearken to them, yet his fears are still an unanswerable argument, and must and will be heard. They cry so loud, that they can never be silenced ; they are so firmly rooted in his being, that they can never be removed.

His haughtiest laughter and derision, is but a fallacious shew to cover them ; and his boasted objections are no more. While he endeavours to shake the faith of others, he cannot satisfy himself, but distrusts his own foundation, while he attempts to destroy the rock of ages.

If we follow him into his retirement, his fears are there; if we attend him into company, they are there also. Whilst he admires the wine, when it giveth his colour in the cup, and moveth itself aright (Prov. xxiii. 31), a guilty terror seizes him, that biteth like a serpent, and stings like an adder. (Ver. 32.)

When he buoys up his spirits with forced and artificial mirth, his countenance is suddenly changed, and his thoughts trouble him. (Dan. v. 6.)

And when he is compelled to be alone, he is an odious companion to himself, and is self-condemned, though he will not own the conviction.

If we behold the pomp of a triumph, and see the greatest of infidels swelling with the spoils of conquest, and drawing princes and nobles in chains after him, could we enter into the secrets of his heart, we should find dread and confusion there. There would need no slave to ride in the triumphant chariot, no miserable wretch to rebuke his pride. He is himself the slave, though he appears to be the happiest of men.

And while he almost imagines that he is a God, though he denies that there is one; his fears smite him, as the angel of the Lord smote the blasphemous Herod (Acts, xii. 23.); and his accursed soul speaks these bitter things against him? hell from beneath is moved for thee, to meet thee at thy coming. (Isai. xiv. 9.)

And the fears of men are just, since the very devils believe and tremble. When the Son of God appeared in the form of a servant, and the fashion of a man, with the infirmities of our flesh, and the wants of our nature, in hunger and thirst, in cold and nakedness, legions of evil spirits acknowledged him in that humble state, and were struck with dread and amazement at the sight of him.

In the synagogue there was a man which had a spirit of an unclean devil, and cried out with a loud voice, saying Let us alone, what have we to do with thee, thou Jesus of Nazareth? art thou come to destroy us? I know thee, who thou art, the holy one of God. And Jesus rebuked him, saying, Hold thy peace, and come out of him. And when the devil had thrown him in the midst, he came out of him, and hurt him not. And they were all amazed, and spake among themselves, saying, What a word is this! For with authority and power he commandeth the unclean spirits, and they come out. (Luke, iv. 33, 34, 35, 36.)

And devils also came out of many, crying out, and saying, Thou art Christ the Son of God. And he rebuking them, suffered them not to speak; for they knew that he was the Christ. (Luke, iv. 41.)

The last words of the expiring oracles which were actuated by devils, gave testimony to him; and when they were utterly silenced, their silence gave a more effectual testimony.

And those miserable spirits that are confined in the prisons of the damned, do undoubtedly believe that there is a God of infinite power, whose wrath will manifest itself in a devouring fire, and everlasting burnings. They already feel the rod of his anger living in continual misery, and expecting a continual increase of torment.

And knowing the certainty of it, they shew their unrelenting hatred to men, by tempting them to the highest degrees of sin against God, and endeavouring to aggravate their guilt and their punishment.

They behold with a malicious pleasure the success of their execrable designs; and having sown the tares, they delight (if we may call it delight) in observing the mighty growth, and seeing our vices increase and multiply.

And this is the spring of all their endeavours, that they know there is certainly a God, whom they fear with the greatest terror, whom they hate with a perfect hatred, who is able to punish his enemies for ever and ever.

And indeed did not the profane themselves believe there was a God, their impious scoffing, and blasphemous wit, would lose its sting and sharpness. It would not please, were it not surprising, and it would not surprize, if it were not terrible; and they could not think there was a God.

Were the notion of his being really contemptible, they could not assume so much to themselves for despising it: their extraordinary courage, and fancied greatness of soul, would shrink to nothing, did it consist only in ridiculing a thing of nought.

But to believe there is a God of infinite majesty, wonderful in his doings, and terrible in his judgments; and yet to revile him with a daring contumace, and render him the subject of their ludicrous mirth, and wanton raillery; to despise the multitude of the nations for adoring him, and expose the weakness and cowardice of a religious fear, and an holy reverence; this is the heroic bravery, the admired master-piece of this improved age.

Where then is the virtue of believing, if we only believe? The impious, the profane, the devils, and (I may also say) the atheists (whatsoever they pretend) do the same. We know that it is hardly possible to disbelieve that there is a God; what then can we claim for believing that there is one? When every thing in the heavens, in the earth, and under the earth, is a proof of his being, to doubt of it, is no less foolish than impious. For to doubt without reason, is as palpable a token of folly, as to believe without reason. And a groundless suspicion, though it may sometimes pass for wisdom, is a manifest sign of weakness. Because it is dangerous to build upon the sand, is it therefore dangerous to build upon a rock?

If we question the being of a God, we may as justly question whether we were born, because we know not all the circumstances of our birth, or cannot exactly tell how we grew in the womb.

Or we may as justly affirm, that we shall never die, though thousands fall beside us, and ten thousands at our right hand (Psal. xci. 7.) because we are ignorant of the manner of our dissolution, and cannot fully describe the divorce of the soul from the body.

This then is undoubtedly certain, that the existence of a God is so clearly attested, that we cannot but believe it, unless we renounce our reason.

But if we believe it just as we believe the histories of ancient times, or the descriptions of distant countries; if we think it concerns us no more than the ages that we can never recall, or the nations that we shall never behold; it would have been better for us, if we had never heard of the name of God, or were really atheists in opinion, as well as practice. For,

Secondly, It will serve only to aggravate our guilt, and sharpen our punishment. It is as necessary to confess with our mouth, as to believe in our heart (Rom. x. 9.), that there is a God. But this necessary profession of our religion will certainly condemn us, unless it is confirmed and enlivened by our practice. For it adds hypocrisy to sin; and the more we boast of our faith, so much the louder our sins will cry against us.

The speculative atheist (if there is any such person) hopes that there is no God, because he has affronted him. But the sinful believer continues to affront him, though he knows that there is one. The former will not acknowledge him to be his Lord; but the latter calls him Lord, and then denies him. The former acts without principles; the latter acts against them. And whilst one denies God's being, the other tramples upon his perfections.

We may behold a resemblance of the atheist in the obstinate Jews, when they spoke the words of ignorance and contempt; As for this fellow we know not from whence he is. (John, ix. 29.)

And we behold as lively a resemblance of the sinful believer in the soldiers of the governor, that bowed the knee before Jesus, and then spit upon him, and smote him on the head. (Matt. xxvii. 29, 30.) Though he pretends to receive him as his king, yet he pays his homage, by giving him a crown of thorns, and his specious declarations are no more than a solemn mockery.

If we lay his words and actions in the balance together, and allow them to be of equal weight, yet even upon this favourable allowance, his religion is reduced to nothing. For if his words acknowledge God, his actions absolutely deny him. But I fear that his actions will prove to be of greater weight than his words; and if those are sins, they will render these also sinful.

He declares that God is infinite in knowledge, in goodness, in justice, and in power. But yet he daily commits abomination in the sight of him, who discerns the secrets of the heart, and observes the rise, progress, and consummation of sin.

He lives, moves, and has his being (Acts, xvii. 28.) through the goodness of God, and (if you will believe his professions) he is sensible of it; but yet he delights to grieve his spirit, abuses the endearing instances of his loving kindness, and wears his patience and forbearance.

He boasts of being the servant of a just and righteous God; but yet he transgresses the eternal rules of his justice, and passes on from one degree of iniquity to another.

He knows that there is a great and terrible God, whose power is able to destroy him for ever and ever; and whose vengeance he can neither escape, nor resist; and yet he trifles with the Almighty, and treasures up wrath against the day of wrath. (Rom. ii. 5.)

How vain and foolish is the man that imagines that the God of Wisdom will accept of his fruitless professions!

While he imagines this, he must also think, that his knowledge is blinder than the ignorance of men, his goodness a fond and foolish pity, his justice an irresolute weakness, and his power an insignificant terror, bearing the sword in vain.

Though he says of him, as Elijah in derision did of Baal, He is a God; yet certainly it is only in derision. And while his sins call for the vengeance of God, he must impiously conceive, that either he is talking, or he is pursuing, or he is in a journey, or peradventure he sleepeth, and must be awaked. (1 Kings. xviii. 27.)

His faith is so far from extenuating his guilt, that it renders it inexcusable. He believes as the devils do, and he will also tremble with them.

The time will shortly come, when pains and diseases will take hold of him, and death will set all its terrors in array against him; then his sins will compass him about; and make his bed uneasy in his sickness. His false professions will reproach him, and his ineffectual belief will upbraid him.

His body will quake like the earth at the approaches of its dissolution, the rock of his heart will be rent, and the multitude of vices that were buried in forgetfulness, will arise and come forth.

But behold him in a yet more miserable state, when the trumpet calls to judgment, and he is constrained to leave the dark hiding place of the grave!

He will see the Judge of all the world sitting on his throne, and all the host of heaven (Rev. xx. 11, 12.) attending upon him. The books will be opened in which his sins are recorded in everlasting characters, and the sentence ready to be passed.

The very heavens will be on fire, and the elements will melt with fervent heat (2 Pet. iii. 12.); and the general destruction will fill his soul with horror. The ministers of vengeance will stand prepared to seize their wretched prey, as soon as he receives his eternal doom.

How can he stand in that dreadful day? And whither can he fly? He needs no witness to accuse him but himself; a righteous Judge condemns him; and legions of evil spirits torment him. And now he believes and trembles, but in vain!

Let those consider this, who pretend to believe, and yet forget God. Let those especially consider it, who triumph in blaspheming the living God, and glory in profaning his holy name.

Let it be an admonition to these industrious agents of Satan, these inveterate enemies of God and goodness. They will find in the day of the Lord, (and may they not find too late), that their admired evils and objections are as stubble; but the Gospel of Christ is sufficiently tried, and will endure for ever.

May they repent of their wickedness, and pray God, if perhaps the thoughts of their heart may be forgiven them. May they yet be sensible that they are in the gall of bitterness, and the bond of iniquity. (Acts, viii. 22, 23.)

And let us beseech the compassionate Jesus, by his agony and bloody sweat, by his cross and passion, and by his precious death, to deliver us from all blindness and hardness of heart, from all false doctrine, heresy, and schism, and from all contempt of his word and commandment.

The Hand-writing upon the Wall.

DAN. v. 27.

Thou art weighed in the balances, and art found wanting.

THIS was one dreadful part of the interpretation of the hand-writing upon the wall in the palace of Belshazzar, king of Babylon. At the sight of the hand which wrote upon the plaster of the wall, the king's countenance was changed, and his thoughts troubled him, so that the joints of his loins were loosed, and his knees smote one against the other. (Ver. 5, 6.)

The king and his princes, his wives and his concubines, were drinking in the golden vessels that were taken out of the temple which was at Jerusalem. (Dan. v. 3.) They forgot to give praise and honour to him that liveth for ever and ever, whose dominion is an everlasting dominion, and whose kingdom is from generation to generation (Dan. iv. 34.): and instead of the King of heaven, all whose works are truth, and whose ways are judgment, and who is able to abase all those that walk in pride (ver. 37.), they praised the gods of gold and of silver, of brass, of iron, of wood, and of stone. (Dan. v. 4.)

In the midst of this luxury, this ingratitude, this idolatry, the same great and terrible God, that had driven Nebuchadnezzar from men, and forced him to eat grass with the ox, and afterwards restored him to his glory, and established him in his kingdom (Dan. iv. 32, 36.), was pleased to rebuke the impious Belshazzar for neglecting the remarkable admonition and example that was set before him.

And in the same hour (Dan. v. 5.) in which he gave up himself to his sinful pleasures, and wantonly defied his bountiful benefactor, the hand-writing struck a damp upon all his enjoyments, and stirred up his thoughts to perplex and accuse him.

There was no one present that could read the writing, or shew the interpretation thereof (Dan. v. 8.); but his conscience told him, that it pointed to him, and chiefly concerned himself. And was like a troubled sea till he sent Daniel, in whom there was an excellent spirit, and knowledge, and understanding, to shew the interpretation. (Ver. 12.)

But the faithful Daniel could yield him no relief; he could only confirm and explain the unacceptable tidings, which his guilty conscience, and his ill-boding apprehension, brought him.

He constrained him to reflect, though the reflection was grievous to him, that when the heart of his father Nebuchadnezzar was lifted up, and his mind was hardened in pride, he was deposed from his kingly throne, and they took his glory from him. And he was driven from the sons of men, and his heart was made like the beasts, and his dwelling was with the wild asses: they fed him with grass like oven, and his body was wet with the dew of heaven, till he knew that the most high God ruled in the kingdom of men, and appointed over it whomsoever he would. And that he, his careless, and ungrateful son, had not humbled his heart, though he knew all this, and had not glorified the God, in whose hand his breath was, and whose were all his ways.

Therefore, says he, was the part of the hand sent from him; and this is the writing that was written. God hath numbered thy kingdom, and finished it. Thou art weighed in the balances, and found wanting. Thy kingdom is divided and given to the Medes and Persians. (Dan. v. 20, &c.)

What a shocking consideration was this, that notwithstanding his greatness and power, he was found wanting; and that after he was stripped of all his pomp and state, he would have nothing to recommend him to a just and righteous God, but would be called to give an account of the impious abuse of his important trust! This teaches us a very useful lesson; that there is a God that tries and searches the heart, and weighs all our actions in the balance of impartial justice; that has no respect of persons, and does not esteem us for the multitude of things that we possess, or the splendour of any thing that is great; but principally regards the use that we make of his bounty, and the degrees of our improvement in righteousness and virtue: and how much soever the glittering shew of riches and honour may engage the admiration of mankind, yet religion is of infinitely greater moment: without this, every thing that the world can bestow upon us, will not at all avail us; for in the sight of God, the nations are as the drop of the bucket, and are counted as the small dust of the balance; and he taketh up the isles, as a very little thing (Isa. xl. 15.); and all the inhabitants of the earth are reputed as nothing without religion.

This should incline us to remember that we are but sinful dust and ashes, and whatsoever we are possessed of, will add nothing to us, unless we use it to the glory of God. We shall be found wanting even in the midst of those flattering objects, that gratify our pride, our avarice, our ambition. And when these are passed away, we shall become the most wretched, contemptible creatures, and be rejected by God, as the dregs and off-scourings of all things.

If, therefore, we have any regard to God's approbation, we must give religion the preference to every thing, since that alone will recommend us to his favour.

If we value even our present happiness, we must endeavour so to live, that it may not be lessened by the severe reflections of a guilty conscience.

And if we have any concern for our future welfare, we must make such a provision for ourselves, as will be our stay and support, when all earthly things are consumed. Let us therefore consider,

First, That we should employ the talents which God has given us, in his service, and to his honour.

Secondly, That unless we make this improvement of them, we cannot truly enjoy them in this world. And,

Thirdly, That the abuse of them will rise in judgment against us in the world which is to come. And,

First, We are to consider, that we should employ the talents which God has given us, in his service, and to his honour. The circumstances of Belshazzar were indeed almost peculiar to himself; and amidst all the portions of greatness which are allotted to the sons of men, there is hardly any that can equal that measure of riches, and height of glory, which he profanely abused to the dishonour of his Maker.

But yet the fall of this great man is an admonition to us, in every condition of life; and though our stations are widely different, yet his case, as well as all other things that were written aforetime, was written for our learning. (Rom. xv. 4.)

The lowest and the meanest of us is possessed of some advantages, upon which he values himself; and did he value himself aright, he would endeavour to improve them to the glory of the author and giver of every gift, and to the happiness of his immortal soul. For it is not to be imagined, that the God of Wisdom should furnish him with a power of doing good for no end or purpose; and shed his bounty upon his creatures, only that they might, take their pasture in this world, and yield up themselves to trifling and vanity. Neither is it reasonable to suppose, that a creature which is formed for an endless duration, should regard no more than his present, transitory state, and look no farther than the immediate gratification of his idle, foolish, sinful inclinations.

We may be assured, that the Lord that gave his servant five talents, expected that he should trade with the same, and make them other five talents, and that he distributed to every man according to his several ability (Matt. xxv. 15.), with a design that he should answer his kindness with a suitable return.

And if the sense of what we possess, or the prospect of more can encourage us to do our duty, certainly we shall strive to attain to God's future favour, by expressing our gratitude for his present blessings.

For what can be more desirable than that commendation, Well done, thou good and faithful servant, thou hast been faithful over a few things, I will make thee ruler over many things; enter thou into the joy of thy Lord! (Matt. xxv. 23.)

How wonderful is the goodness of God, that pours his gifts upon us, that we may qualify ourselves for larger measures of his bounty, by making a right use of them!

And how happy is the man that uses them as the means of letting his light shine before men, and glorifying his Father which is in heaven! (Matt. v. 16.)

With what satisfaction will he look back upon his past conduct, when he reaps an eternal inheritance from the prudent improvement of uncertain honours, and corruptible riches!

And how shall we ever sufficiently applaud his wisdom, who is rich in good works, and delights chiefly to abound in righteousness!

And I think it may not be improper for us to consider the several opportunities which mankind enjoy of rendering their present condition subservient to their future interest.

For every one has a proper sphere in which he is ordained to move, and in that he is capable of serving his Creator, of being beneficial to his brethren, and of promoting the welfare of his own soul.

Those in the highest ranks and fortunes have indeed the greatest power, and, like the heavenly bodies, may shed their kindly influences upon those beneath them.

But we that are far below, may yet answer the important purposes of an all-wise God; like the inferior works of the creation, none of which were made in vain.

And the capacities of the great are not unworthy our consideration, since they will raise a noble emulation in us, and excite our utmost endeavours to reach after them.

How large and pleasant a prospect is opened to the man, whom God has placed in an exalted station, and entrusted with a plentiful share of the blessings of this life! He is able to assert the cause of God, to promote religion in a corrupt and degenerate age, to recommend it to all his dependents, to invite them into the path of the just by the shining light (Prov. iv. 18.) of a good example, and to discountenance vice and profaneness by his authority. He can act in the stead of God, and be a father to the fatherless, and maintain the cause of the widow. He can raise a dejected spirit, support a sinking family, and come into their relief in the critical juncture, and guard against their approaching calamity. And, in short, he can resemble God, in that beloved attribute, his goodness, and at once copy after the divine nature, and enjoy the sincerest pleasures of humanity: for he can gratify every noble desire, and answer the generous purposes of friendship.

The bare mention of his power, and of the several instances in which it can exert itself, is enough to transport every one that has any sense of gratitude to God, any regard to virtue, any value for that amiable quality which bears the delightful name of good-nature.

And I wish that all whom God has made the stewards of his bounty, would remember the end for which they received that important trust; and that instead of prostituting his gifts to sin and folly, and abusing them to their own and his dishonour, they would employ them in the service of God, and to the advantage of their country, their friends, and their immortal souls.

And we ought not to envy them those opportunities which they enjoy, and which we seem to want; for in the lower conditions of life, there are also means of doing good; and if we are disposed to do it, we may pass our time of sojourning here with comfort and satisfaction, and improve those talents that are delivered to us, to the honour of religion, and to the great ends of friendship and charity.

And even those that are engaged in the servile offices of life, and go forth to their work and labour till the evening (Psalm. civ. 23.), may also dedicate themselves to the service of God, and promote their own interest, and the common welfare.

And the man that begs for the blessing of God upon all his undertakings, and resolves to do justice to every one, and to make an honest provision for his family, is an object worthy of admiration and esteem; for the holy angels behold him with pleasure, and God himself looks down upon him with approbation. He builds upon a rock, and that integrity which accompanies him through all his labours, is a strong cement to preserve his small portion of riches unshaken. He leaves a sure inheritance to his children's children; and provides one for himself, which no time can decay, no rich nor rust can corrupt. (Matt. vi. 20.)

And when he comes before God, he will find that his honest principles will stand him in greater stead than all the riches of the world could have done; and though he was not possessed of those things, which are now thought the marks of honour, yet he will be truly esteemed in the sight of God, and he will not be found wanting.

How happily are riches improved, when they are made instrumental to the business of religion, and borrow a new lustre from it, while they seem to give credit to it!

How commendable is the choice of the man, that chooses the one thing needful; and while he has every thing that is desirable in this life, possesses that also which will be eternally valuable in the other!

And how glorious also is the man, who, though he has no pomp or state to attract the eyes of the people, but is placed in the despised circumstances of poverty, is yet adorned with those excellent qualities; that will raise him to the highest honour, and give him a name above every name that the world can give!

Religion, therefore, is the principal thing, and this is the end we ought to aim at, in all conditions of life; for this will render us happy in the lowest state; and without this we cannot be happy in the highest.

And our present interest obliges us to dedicate the good things of this life to the service of religion; for,

Secondly, Unless we make this improvement of them, we cannot truly enjoy them in this world. Common experience teaches us, that there is no lasting pleasure or satisfaction to be found in those flattering objects that now surround us; after a little acquaintance with them, we begin to loath and despise them; and the continuance of those things which we at first admire, affords us nothing but weariness and vexation.

And if these enjoyments are but uncertain in their best estate, and quickly give way to disquiets, and ungrateful reflections, how vain and deceitful are they, when the mind is oppressed with a load of guilt, and the thoughts of punishment are every moment striking a damp upon it; our mirth is then forced and unnatural, and our spirits are unable to keep up and support it.

And where can we find a wretch so desperate, as to drink to the full of pleasure, and have a true and lively relish of it, when he knows that the most dreadful dangers hang over him, and hang, as it were, by a single hair; and that all his happiness is held by the weakest tenure, even by the blast of life, and is no more in his power than the shadow that departeth?

Surely he must tremble at the thoughts of the hand-writing upon the wall, and his heart cannot but tell him, that for these things which he fondly doats upon, God will bring him into judgment. (Eccles. xi. 9.)

How irksome must it be to consider, that his pleasures will shortly come to an end, and will be bitterness at the last; that the riches which he spends in a course of luxury, will aggravate his guilt, and must be one day certainly accounted for; and that his neglected soul will bring a heavy accusation against him, in the time of its distress, and draw his sinful body into a participation of its misery!

How deplorable is his condition, when all his enjoyments are short and transient, and the remembrance of them is disagreeable to him!

But, on the other side, how pleasant is it so to use our talents, as to be able to give a satisfactory account of them, and be assured that we have laid them out to the best advantage!

With what confidence may the rich man look up to God, when he knows that he has discharged his trust, and dispensed his bounty according to the will of his Lord and Master!

How does he delight to see the cause of religion prosper in his hand, to observe the happiness of those whom he has averted from perishing, to behold the young plants that he has brought up, flourishing like a tree planted by the water-side (Psal. 1. 3.), and to find that all his kind and friendly designs answer his expectation!

His happiness is doubled by the delightful view of that of others; and when he thinks with himself, how widely he has spread the blessings of Heaven, and how many he has made partakers with him, his felicity is heightened at the sight of each of them, and his joys increase and multiply.

And when he permits himself to enjoy his innocent pleasures, and to use with cheerfulness those good things which God has provided for him: when he is raised to the highest degree of happiness that can be derived from any thing in this world; a surprising satisfaction is darted in upon him, and his heart is filled with the thought, that he has something much greater prepared for him in another world, and an inheritance that will be securely his, when all earthly riches shall be no more.

And if there is any reason to fear the secret worm of a guilty conscience, that preys upon and destroys the fairest appearance of happiness; if we have any concern for our present comfort and welfare; we must so direct and govern all our actions, that no unwelcome reflection, no astonishing fear may break in upon us; but we may have a true sense of those pleasures that are now offered to us, and a certain prospect of those that are infinitely better.

And if they that live in the abundance of all things, stand in need of the comforts of religion, and cannot but be miserable without them; certainly they that have a smaller portion of the things of this world, are highly obliged, as they tender their own immediate interest, to make religion their choice; for this will sweeten their labours, divert their cares, and enable them to pass their painful life with cheerfulness.

And whosoever the hardships of their narrow circumstances tempt them to complain off their fortune, this will take them off from that ungrateful subject, and enliven them with a cheerful expectation of attaining to that glorious place, in which they will far, very far excel the highest reach of worldly grandeur.

And therefore they should be always mindful of their eternal welfare, and not suffer their less important cares to in-croach too much upon them.

Religion is indeed very often excluded by them; but the pretence for it will by no means excuse them: for it is in vain for them to rise up early, to sit up late, and to eat the bread of sorrows, if their better part is still neglected, and the soul has no share in the provision which they are making.

It must necessarily strike them with terror, to think, that while they are wearying themselves from day to day, their immortal interest is utterly forgotten; that they disquiet themselves in vain; and, after all they have done, they shall be found wanting.

And yet how many are there, that give up themselves to toil and labour for that which profiteth not, and refuse to set apart one day in seven, or one hour, for their duty to God, lest they should take too much from the time that is spent in a mercenary slavery.

They are ignorant and indifferent as to that which most concerns them; and for the sake of a temporary advantage, which will last but for a few years, or a few generations, they abandon and renounce that happiness which is to endure for ever.

Miserable men, that are regardless of their true interest, and of the end for which they were created!

Neither the cares nor the pleasures of this life should so engage our thoughts, as to lessen our concern for our future welfare. For our powers were given us, that we might work out our salvation; and unless we use them aright, the abuse of them will,

Thirdly, Rise in judgement against us, in the world which is to come. We are now in a state of probation, and God has bestowed his gifts upon us, that we may improve them to our eternal advantage. He watches over and observes us, and is pleased when we answer the gracious designs of his loving kindness.

The same all-seeing eye that was witness to the luxury and profaneness of Belshazzar, and discerned the folly and baseness of his ungrateful heart, in the night of his feasting, is also present with us, and takes the strictest notice of all our actions: and the same terrible God that sent forth the fingers of a man's hand, to write an accusation against the king, and to record the sentence that passed against him, does also write down all the circumstances of our life, and preserve them in everlasting characters. And in his book is contained the most exact account of all the gifts that we abuse, of all the hours that we spend in sin, and of all the admonitions of our conscience, which fails not to admonish us to make a better improvement of our time.

And though we now imagine that it is unworthy of our care, and wantonly throw away the blessings of God, as if we were born at all adventure; and should be hereafter as though we had never been; yet every idle thought, word, and action (Wisd. ii. 2.) will be brought to our remembrance, and every misspent hour will be charged upon us.

Come on (says the epicure), let us enjoy the good things that are present: let none of us go without his part of our voluptuousness: let us leave tokens of our joyfulness in every place; for this is our portion, and our lot is this. (Ver. 6. 9.)

But this portion must be accounted for; and the use of this lot will be mentioned to his condemnation in the great day of recompence.

He is willing to believe that his name will be forgotten in time, and that no man will have his works in remembrance; that his life will pass away as the trace of a cloud; and be dispersed as a mist that is driven away with the beams of the sun, and overcome with the heat thereof. (Ver. 4.)

But there is a God that distinctly knows how every moment of his life is employed, and will present before him a true and faithful catalogue of his sins; for they are counted by him, who knows the way where light dwelleth, and as for darkness, where is the place thereof; who has entered into the treasures of the snow, and seen the treasures of the hyacinths, who numbers the clouds in the sky, and the rain as it falls to the earth (Job, xxxviii. 19. 22. 3.) and be as void drops of dew that refrey: surely this was misery.

Sinful man may, indeed, for a time put away the consideration of these things, and prevent reflection by a variety of pleasures. Nay, he may bid defiance to his reason, and sin on, in contempt of the ill-boding fears, the dreadful admonitions, and writing that comes forth against him.

But though he refuses to read the writing, or to hear the interpretation thereof, yet it will at last be brought home to him; and when his riches, his honours, and his pleasures, have forsaken him; when he stands a poor wretched soul, before the judgment-seat of an angry God; those actions which he never considered, will be weighed in the balances, and he will be found wanting.

The men that now swell with the spoils of nations, and ungratefully triumph in their undeserved greatness; that despise the poor and fatherless, and rejoice in the multitude of riches, which they have gotten by falsehood and extortion, will be deprived of all their glory, and of that vain shew with which they endeavour to cover their guilty souls; and when they appear before a righteous God, they will be found lighter than vanity itself; and their former grandeur will serve only to increase their damnation.

The wise and learned, that boast of their wonderful improvements, and, in the pride of their hearts, are forgetful of God, the fountain of wisdom; will be charged with the grossest folly, because they have neglected religion, which is the only thing that is valuable in the sight of God.

And they that have entirely devoted themselves to this world, and suffered their cares and labours to engross their time, and stifle the thoughts of God, will be for ever rejected by him, and for ever lament that they made no provision for their souls.

There is no respect of persons with God. (Rom. ii. 11.) The peasant will stand upon the same level with the prince; and virtue and vice will be the only marks of distinction.

God hath invited us all to partake of see what in. He has called the great his reason! But too many of them ing his wants, excuse. He has also known. He is into the streets and lanes of the city, to bring in the poor and the maimed, the halt and the blind. (Luke, xiv. 18. 21.) But they must qualify themselves for his favour; for though he regards not those things which engage our admiration, yet he will cast them into utter darkness, if they have not on the wedding garment. (Matt. xxii. 12, 13.)

Let us therefore put on the robe of righteousness, and endeavour to grow more and more into the likeness of God. For to resemble him is the highest honour, and his favour is preferable to the reatest riches.

Let us adorn our station with the beauty of holiness; and let religion be our chief care, in whatsoever state the providence of God shall place us. If we should possess an abundance of earthly things, let us still remember that we have a better inheritance, an inheritance of infinitely greater value than all the treasures of the world. And if poverty should be thought most proper for us, let us still resolve to do our duty; for this will support us in this uncertain life, and enable us to bear the want of those things, which God in his wisdom has denied us.

Let us study to attain to perfection by the practice of virtue, which will be always of sufficient weight and value, and recommend us to men and angels, by its intrinsic worth and excellence, and to God, through the merits of our Redeemer.

The pleasures of life will pass away, and the time will come, when we shall not be capable of enjoying them. The glittering shew of honour will fade away when the sun of righteousness appears. (Mal. iv. 2.) And our beloved riches will melt like wax at the presence of the Lord. But virtue will shine forth in its full strength, and receive the eternal approbation of God.

By THOMAS NEWLIN, M.A.

The Weakness and Uncertainty of Human Reason.

[Preached before the University of Oxford, at St. Mary's.]

DAN. iv. 31, 32.

While the word was in the king's mouth, there fell a voice from heaven, saying, O King Nebuchadnezzar, to thee it is spoken, the kingdom is departed from thee. And they shall drive thee from men, and thy dwelling shall be with the beasts of the field.

LORD, what is man! How great and glorious in his first estate! How shameful and miserable, after his fall! Thou, O Lord, madest him but a little lower than the angels, and wert pleased to stamp the divine image upon him. Thou gavest him dominion over the works of thy hands, and didst put all things in subjection under his feet.

Yet this lord of the creation is forgetful of his natural perfection, and degrades himself from the high estate in which thou wert pleased to place him. He sullies the brightness of his reason, quenches that heavenly flame, and brings himself down to a level with the beasts that perish. And there is not a more remarkable instance of this fatal change, than that which the text has set before us.

Nebuchadnezzar was a king of kings; and the God of heaven had given him a kingdom, power, and strength, and glory. (Dan. ii. 37.) Many nations were directed by his wisdom, and the people of distant countries waited with trembling for the laws that came from his mouth. His empire was of the widest extent, and it was difficult even to number the provinces that were subject to him. His will was an effectual law; and as soon as the herald cried out, To you it is commanded, O people, nations, and languages; all the people, nations, and languages, please men before the king.

The same all-seeing eye was endued with reason and wisdom, and to the luxury and dissipation of his reason and power, and made himself the centre and foundation of all his confidence.

But how vain was his confidence! how weak the foundation of it! Verily every man living, at his best estate, is altogether vanity!

While Nebuchadnezzar was at rest in his house, and flourishing in his palace, he saw a dream which made him afraid, and the thoughts upon his bed troubled him. He beheld the resemblance of himself in a tree, which grew, and was strong, whose leaves were fair, and the fruit thereof much, and in it was meat for all; under which the beasts of the field dwelt, and upon whose branches the fowls of the heaven had their habitation, (Dan. ix. 4, 5. 12. 21.)

And it was a just resemblance of him; for his greatness was grown and reached to heaven, and his dominion to the end of the earth. (Ver. 22.)

But he also saw an holy one coming down from heaven, and saying, Hew the tree down, and destroy it. (Ver. 23.)

This dreadful vision, and the interpretation of it, by the prophet Daniel, admonished him of his danger. But the admonition was given in vain. For at the end of twelve months, as he walked in the palace of the kingdom of Babylon, he was swoln with pride, and wrapped up in admiration of the house of his kingdom, the might of his power, and the honour of his majesty. (Ver. 29, 30.)

But in the midst of his boasting, there fell a voice from heaven that told him, the kingdom and his reason was departed from him. (Ver. 31.)

Had he only lost his kingdom, though that, in the account of mistaken men, had been a loss greatly to be lamented, yet his reason might have supplied the want of it, and taught him to judge according to God's judgment, who accounteth all the kingdoms of the world as a very little thing, and as the small dust of the balance.

But not only to lose the character of a king, but also the distinguishing character of a man; to be driven from men, and to have his dwelling with the beasts of the field (Dan. iv. 32.), and be as void of understanding as they: surely this was the consummation of misery.

And if we rightly consider this wretched instance of human weakness, neither the splendor of any thing that is great, nor the conceit of any thing that is good in us, will any way withdraw our eyes from looking upon ourselves as sinful dust and ashes.

Our reason is a crown of glory, if we use it to the honour of God; but if we abuse this precious talent to his dishonour, it will only aggravate our misery and shame.

If it were lawful to be proud in any case, this distinguished faculty of man might seem to justify it. But even this is insufficient; and though it shine forth with the most lively piercing rays, though it make us like to the angels, though it be the image of God himself; yet we ought not to grow presumptuous upon it, for pride was not made for men.

I shall therefore take occasion from Nebuchadnezzar's fall, to shew the weakness and uncertainty of our reason, and possess you with an humble sense of it;

First, Because it is subject to natural decay;

Secondly, It is liable to be extinguished by sudden violence; and,

Thirdly, It is frequently impaired and lost by moral corruption. And,

First, Our reason is subject to natural decay. But before we consider it in its declining state, we may humble ourselves by looking back to its weakness and imperfection in our infancy, and observe the slowness of its growth, and the several degrees by which it advances towards maturity. The beginning and end of life conceal this glorious faculty; and it is lost in both, like a river whose source is under the earth, and which hastens to bury itself in the earth again.

In our infancy, it is covered with thick darkness, like the morning spread upon the mountains; in old age, it is no more than the small remains of the day that is departed; and even in the noon of life, and the midst of our perfection, it is often clouded over, and intercepted from our view.

Behold the weak, helpless infant! and see what influence his weakness has upon his reason! He is incapable of discovering his wants, or making his satisfaction known. He is as much directed by the understanding of others, and stands as much in need of it as if he were not endued with a rational soul; and hardly seems to enjoy the blind and uncertain guidance of natural instinct.

And when his organs are strengthened and gradually prepared for the use of his reason, how faint and feeble is the light that at first discovers itself! and how little can be discerned by the dawning of the understanding! It is unhappily governed by the senses that are inferior to it, and is filled with prejudice and error, by a false report and representation of things.

The faltering efforts of the babbling tongue betray our ignorance, and shew the vain and trifling notions that have stolen in upon us.

Even in the second stage of life, and the flower of our youth, though we do not altogether speak as a child, and think as a child, yet our reason is hurried away with impetuous violence, and derives its judgment from our irregular passions and partial affections. It deceives itself with false appearances of happiness, and tortures and disquiets the mind with extravagant hopes and expectations. Like the rising sun, it drives nothing but mists before it, and with difficulty attains to its full brightness.

But in the state of manhood, you will say, that our reason displays itself with an excellent glory, and bears a beautiful resemblance of the Fountain of Light.

Yet still it might be urged, that the thoughts of mortal men are miserable, and our devices are but uncertain. For the corruptible body presseth down the soul, and the earthly tabernacle weigheth down the mind that museth upon many things; and hardly do we guess aright at things that are upon earth, and with labour do we find the things that are before us.

But however we may, without indulging our vanity, or rather to rebuke and mortify it, we may allow that reason does, for a short time, exert itself with an active and lively force. It gathers the experience of former ages, and enlarges its prospect beyond the life of man, to many generations to come. It looks into the secrets of nature with a searching eye, and discovers many important truths, by its diligent inquiries, and curious observations. It furnishes the mind with a regular train of thoughts, and lays up the maxims of wisdom and policy in the storehouse of the memory.

But, alas! it does not continue in one stay; but as soon as it is advanced to perfection, it declines apace, and falls away to imperfection again.

In our pursuit of knowledge, we seem to be rolling up a stone to the top of a mountain, which does not rest a moment there, but with haste and violence rolls down to the bottom.

Our sun does not stand still in the midst of heaven; but before we can entirely enjoy the delightful view that we have gained by its ascent, it snatches us from it, by its sudden and precipitate descent.

Our largest thoughts are soon contracted, and the mind is lessened and confined to narrower notions and opinions.

The memory is too frail to retain the characters that were stamped upon it; and though they were deeply engraven as with a pen of iron, yet our heart becomes as the melting wax, and loses the impression.

Have we not known the most valuable treasures gathered together by long experience? and have we not concluded that they could never be wiped out of the book of remembrance? But how soon were they lost? we went by, and lo, they were gone; we sought them, but their place could no where be found.

The most artful contrivances, and the justest thoughts and conclusions, are broken and confounded by the infirmities of age. And those loose fragments that still continue, how valuable soever in themselves, are no more than the imperfect remains of distant antiquity; and they are often covered with dust, and it is hard to draw them out of the general ruin, and join them together.

And instead of the regular government of reason, there is little to be found but childish imaginations, or indolent dotage.

The preference, indeed, is frequently given to age, on the account of its wisdom and experience; but this is rather a sense of past follies, than a new supply of wisdom. And the aged having suffered shipwreck on the dangers of human life, are therefore most capable of directing the unexperienced youth, to avoid the like miscarriages.

It is a melancholy truth, that our reason is affected with the corruptions of the body; and though widely different from it in its nature, is influenced by its several changes, and partakes of its improvement and decay.

And though in death it is divided from it, and breaks forth from its earthly prison, to ascend to God that gave it; yet during its continuance here, it is forced to be conformable to this wretched state, and to suffer or rejoice with the members of the body.

It sees but through a glass darkly; and the glass is sullied with every vapour, and brings a mist over the understanding.

Alas! who can bear this consideration? who can think of these things, and not be abashed and confounded? Is this our admired reason? Was this once a pure influence flowing from the glory of the Almighty? Was this once adorned with the brightness of the Everlasting? Was this the unspotted mirror, and the image of God's wisdom? How is it changed by our fall! how different is it from the reason of our first parent, that did not manifest itself by slow degrees, but shone forth at once a full and perfect day!

How long might this lamp of God have given light to us! even for ever and ever, like the seven lamps of fire that are burning day and night before the throne! But how soon is its oil spent! How soon is our vessel empty! The trembling flame hastens to depart from us, and is every moment fluttering and going away. So frail is our reason! So just an occasion does it afford for humility, if we consider it only as subject to natural decay! But how much more will it afford, if we consider it,

Secondly, As it is liable to be extinguished by sudden violence. And here I might observe, that every trifle in nature is capable of offering violence to it. And though it is placed on a throne, and intrusted with authority and power, yet it is easily moved from its place, and deposed by the tumultuous passions.

It cannot bear a surprize, or excess of joy, or an oppressive weight and continuance of sorrow; its edge is often taken away by too close an attention to one thing; and it is as often distracted by troubling itself with many.

If it is not exercised and employed, it sinks into a brutish stupidity, and is so far from bearing the likeness of God, that it hardly retains the appearance of a man: it buries itself in the heavy matter to which it is united, and seems to be falling into the dust, with its companion, the body.

And if it exercises itself too much, it spends and exhausts its strength: the variety of thoughts confound it, and the earnestness and intenseness of them, spins the thread too fine, and breaks the chain that held them together.

But passing over these dangers, we may proceed to consider the deplorable effects of violent diseases, and the ruin and havoc which they make in the understanding. When the animal spirits are raised into a ferment, and the wild imagination has cast off the government of reason, what confusion and disorder rise in the mind! A thousand false appearances impose upon it; and it deludes itself with the vainest thoughts, vainer than even the dreams of the night; wanders to and fro, without fixing upon any thing; and has not wisdom to discern either good or evil. The distracted man resembles him that was possessed by an evil spirit; he oftimes jalleth into the fire, and oft into the water; he dwells in desolate places, and it is hard to bind him, even with chains; he is always crying, and cutting himself with stones.

What a miserable creature is the man whose reason is either departed from him, or has not power enough to restrain his passion, or prevent the outrage that he offers to himself!

There cannot be a more mortifying spectacle to men; there can hardly be a more pleasing one to the enemy of mankind, than such a distracted creature, that preys upon himself, and is the object of his own remorseless cruelty, and brutish fury.

And the case of the idiot also bespeaks our deep concern and humility.

This unhappy case is not always owing to an original defect in nature, but frequently proceeds from a surprizing shock and alteration. And the man that was just now endued with reason, and a sufficient portion of understanding, is in an instant deprived of it, and loses all the notices and distinctions of things. His mind is as it were blotted out, or covered with a veil that cannot be taken off. And he lives, moves, and has his being, without any sense or notion of it, and seems to continue in life, only to shew his weakness, and expose the multitude of his infirmities.

And the clearest understanding is liable to this universal failure, if the brain be bereaved of its usual supply of spirits, or oppressed with too quick a return of them, and too great a charge. The straining or slackening of the nerves disturbs the harmony of the thoughts, and a fatal bruise breaks the whole frame of the mind.

Dreadful also are the consequences of a palsy or apoplex, which strikes with an unexpected force, and leaves only a languishing life, and a confused understanding.

One part of the body becomes a dead uncomfortable weight to the other; and, while the withered members can scarcely bear each other's weakness, reason is also bereaved of its natural quickness, and forgets its past conceptions, losing the miserable remainder of life in the sleep of a lingering death.

And these fatal strokes not only impair it, but frequently extinguish it at once.

Let us suppose a man to be in the most perfect state that ever was enjoyed in this world:

Let his reason have the most piercing sagacity in discerning, the most curious eye in observing, and the most faithful memory to retain its observations:

Let his judgment be enriched with all the wisdom of former ages, his knowledge extend to every art and science, and spread itself over them, as the waters cover the seas:

Let him understand the interests of courts, the state of nations, the conducting of armies:

Let him form the most complete body of laws, to govern future generations, and weave the closest schemes of policy, to establish the regular succession of princes:

Let his resolutions be steadfast, his purposes generous, and his soul as diffusive as charity itself:

And, above all, let him be thoroughly acquainted with the fountains of wisdom, the holy Scriptures; let him understand their glorious truths, as far as they can be comprehended by human reason; and pay the most awful regard to those sublimer mysteries that pass man's understanding. Yet at the height of this perfection, if his blood should break through its appointed bounds, and that dreadful messenger of death, an apoplex, should arrest him; his reason will go down in the midst of his course, and no more send forth its enlivening beams upon earth; his memory will lose all the stores that were distinctly ranged within it; his judgment will be spoiled of all its wisdom; his knowledge will be turned into darkness, his policy untravelling, his resolutions broken, his generous intentions disappointed, his precepts of morality erased, and his divine conceptions scattered away.

How terrible is this change! how amazing this devastation!

And though perhaps it is impossible to find the man that can entirely answer the character that we have drawn; yet we may remember (but we must remember it with the greatest regret) that a late fatal seizure bereaved the world of one (Dr. Smalridge) of the noblest capacities that ever was filled with divine and human learning.

And the church must for ever bewail the surprizing death of an excellent prelate, under whose shadow she thought herself safe at the close of the evening, though he was snatched from her at the opening of the morning.

But she must weep for herself, not for him, for he is numbered amongst the saints, and shines like the stars in the firmament.

It is indeed an afflicting consideration that reason is subject to natural decay, that it is also liable to be extinguished by sudden violence. But these are only to be lamented, as misfortunes incident to our nature.

But there is a more afflicting consideration arises from our faults. For,

Thirdly, It is frequently impaired and lost by moral corruption. Our reason, though of a purer substance and greater excellence than the body, is yet affected by its union with it, and disordered by the infirmities that attend it; and not only by its unavoidable infirmities, but by its chosen corruptions; and every vice weakens its power and sullies its light; and as the violence of the will and the irregularity of the affections increases, the authority of reason is lessened, and the force of its discernment gradually taken away.

The gratification of our lusts destroys its vital frame; gluttony stifles it; and drunkenness overpowers it, like a rapid stream that has broken down its proper bounds.

The fumes that rise from a loaded stomach darken the understanding; and excess in drinking disturbs the order of the thoughts, and fills the mind with absurd incoherent trifles; and an habitual compliance with our sinful lusts, changes our justest conceptions of things into stupid dotage and forgetfulness.

Reason, when it is made subservient to vice, is condemned to Nebuchadnezzar's fate, it is driven from men, and forced to dwell with the beasts. And instead of ascending to the presence of God, it is held captive in the loathsome prisons of sin.

There is nothing that more effectually shews the weakness of reason than its yielding to our vicious appetites, and stooping down to corruption.

And to convince us how little we should depend upon it, and how unsafe it is to lean to our own understanding, God is sometimes pleased to permit even the wisest of men, men that are endued with the greatest abilities, the sharpest wit, and the deepest learning, to depart from the dignity of their nature, and prostitute their glorious faculties to the service of the most shameful sins.

Hence they are often unequal to themselves in their conduct, and act inconsistently with their own judgment. Hence they are exposed to the scorn even of the weak and ignorant, and are made a rebuke to the foolish.

And better were it for them to live in Egyptian darkness, than to act in contempt of the plainest conviction, and offend their reason and conscience, which shed such an abundance of light upon them.

What a remarkable instance of human frailty was Solomon; How wise was he in his youth, and as a flood filled with understanding! His soul covered the whole earth, and the largeness of his heart was even as the sand on the sea shore, (Eccles. xlvii. 14, 15.) He spake of trees, from the cedar that is in Lebanon, even to the hyssop that springeth out of the wall: He spake also of beasts and of fowl, and of creeping things, and of fishes. (1 Kings, iv. 33.)

And above all, he shewed the excellence of his understanding in choosing wisdom rather than riches and honour; and in adorning the temple of God with the most beautiful glory.

Yet this seemingly perfect man was ensnared by the love of strange women, and turned away his heart from the Lord. With many fair speeches they caused him to yield; with the flattering of their lips they forced him to follow other gods.

And so miserably was he deluded, that he went after the goddess of the Zidonians, the abomination of Moab, and even Molech, the abomination of the children of Ammon.

And so far did he debase himself, as to fall down and worship every idol that the multitude of his wives and concubines set up.

So vain and weak a thing is human reason!

Having gone through the several particulars proposed, let me draw a few practical inferences from them. And,

First, Since our reason advances by a slow and difficult progress, and then hastens to decay; let us possess ourselves with an humble opinion of it, and never entertain haughty and presumptuous thoughts.

Let us look into the deep things of God, as the angels do, with a religious awe and reverence, and let us never be so vain and insolent as to reject those important truths that exceed the measure of our capacities, or to disbelieve every thing that we cannot entirely comprehend.

It was pride (as we may justly presume) that cast down Lucifer from heaven.

When Nebuchadnezzar's heart was lifted up, and his mind hardened in pride, he was deposed from his kingly throne, and they took his glory from him. (Dan. v. 20.)

And when Herod received the blasphemous applause of the people, and gave not God the glory, the angel of the Lord smote him, and he gave up the ghost. (Acts, xii. 23.)

And pride is the fountain of all those errors and heresies, that overspread the world with so mighty a deluge, that every good man cannot but tremble for the ark of God.

But if we consider the growth and different measures of our own capacities, and the vastly greater difference of others, we shall see the folly of making our judgment the standard of truth, and disdaining to receive any thing that is not exactly equal to it.

In our infancy we have no conception of many things that afterwards are easy and obvious to us. The first opening of the understanding shews us but a confused and doubtful prospect, and we resemble the blind man, who as soon as he was restored to sight, looked up and said, I see men, as trees, walking. (Mark, viii. 24.)

But when our understanding is enlarged, we attain to a plainer discernment, as he saw every man clearly (vers. 25.), when he was blessed with a more perfect recovery.

The discoveries of latter ages have brought us to the knowledge of many arts and sciences that were hid from the former: and it cannot enter into the hearts of some to conceive, what others justly believe; and that which seems impossible to some men, is possible with others.

And therefore since limited creatures are not all confined to the same measure, but enlarge their knowledge to different degrees, certainly we should allow that the infinite wisdom of God does extend itself beyond the utmost compass of our thoughts.

Even our senses are capable of improvement, and may be enlivened with a quicker perception of their proper objects. And were God to give us a larger number of senses, we might be acquainted with a greater variety of objects, and behold a wider scene open before us.

And if this may not improperly be supposed of our senses, we may upon better grounds suppose, that God, in his due time, will exalt our reason to a more comprehensive view than it yet enjoys.

How foolish and slow of heart to believe, were the two disciples that went to Emmaus! (Luke, xxiv.) Though they conversed with their Saviour, and heard him expound the scriptures concerning himself, yet he seemed to be only a stranger in Israel.

Their hearts burned within them indeed, while he talked with them by the way; but till their eyes were opened, they knew him not.

And in like manner, we are for a long time held in ignorance of those things that are not difficult in themselves, and are written in so plain a character, that he that runs may read them.

And as in the progress of our reason, we obtain new measures of knowledge, so in its decay, our mind loses them again, and becomes as if it had never obtained them.

We should therefore bring every thought into subjection to God, and wait with patience and submission till that great and glorious day when our reason will shine forth, as at the first, and be raised to the immediate enjoyment of the fountain of light.

Secondly, Since it is liable to be extinguished by sudden violence, let us embrace the present opportunity, and exercise this distinguishing faculty, while it is yet in its perfect brightness.

The accepted time, the day of salvation, is but of a short continuance, and the night will quickly come, in which no man can work. And before it is yet night, our lamp may be snatched away, our candlestick be removed. And if we survive our reason, we cannot live to answer the purposes of life; for we shall be incapable of performing a reasonable service.

And though it should not be totally extinguished, yet if it is much impaired, our virtue will be a very imperfect oblation; and the blind and maimed cannot be an acceptable sacrifice to God.

Let us therefore devote our reason to the author and giver of it, while it bears the liveliest resemblance of him that gave it.

Let us use it aright this very moment; and let not the day depart from us before we have done our duty, lest our sun should rise no more.

Thirdly and lastly, Since our reason is frequently impaired and lost by moral corruption, let us abstain from sin, that has so fatal an effect upon it, and never quench this heavenly flame by offering unnatural violence to it.

Let us employ it as it ought to be employed, in meditating upon the law of God, and finding out the treasures of divine wisdom.

This will daily improve it, and give a larger compass to our thoughts and conceptions. Our capacities will extend themselves, and the purest pleasures will flow into them, and yield us perfect satisfaction.

If we are enslaved by sin, we may indeed imagine, that the impairing our reason will give us peace and security. But it is a false and treacherous peace; and how much soever we weaken our reason, yet the dreadful day will come when it will recover its strength, and execute revenge upon us.

If we admire it only as the atheists do, and abuse it to the denial of God, we degrade our nature. For, according to the atheists' opinion, it is barely corruptible matter; it sprung from the womb of the earth, and all its admired thoughts perish in the grave.

But if we believe it to be the gift of God, and make a grateful use of it; though it is subject to natural decay; though it may be, for a time, extinguished by a sudden violence; yet it will live hereafter, in a better state, where no decay, no violence, no corruption, can come near to hurt it.

SERMON CXXXVII.

BY THOMAS NEWLIN, M.A.

Fear and Disquiet the necessary Consequences of Sin.

[Preached before the University of Oxford, at Magdalene College, on St. John Baptist's Day, 1720.]

ISAIAH, lviii. 20, 21.

The wicked are like a troubled sea, when it cannot rest, whose waters cast up mire and dirt. There is no peace, saith my God, to the wicked.

THE God of Justice and Power has threatened to rain storm and tempest upon the wicked: This shall be their portion in the other world. (Psal. xi. 6.)

And there is nothing can give us so just a notion of their distractions, their anguish, their confusion, even in this life, as the comparison which the Holy Spirit of God has made in the words of the text.

When they are labouring under a sense of guilt, and an apprehension of punishment, their restless minds are wrought up into the highest ferment, torn with contrary passions, and tossed to and fro with fear and anxiety: and as the boiling waters cast up mire and dirt from the bottom of the great deep, so the raging waves of their troubled hearts throw up all their filth and corruption from their secret hiding places, and are perpetually foaming out their own shame. (Jude, 13.)

When their iniquity comes up before them, it covers them with the blackness of darkness. And when the light breaks in upon them, it affrights them, like the sudden flashes of lightning, which add horror to the night of storm and tempest.

This is actually their case, as we are assured by him who knows the secrets of the heart, and thoroughly discerns the passion, the shame, the fear, the melancholy and despair which torment a wounded spirit.

And as they do actually suffer this amazing punishment, so it is absolutely necessary that they should; for it is grounded upon the unchangeable nature of things, and the eternal difference between good and evil: and how much soever the masters in iniquity may boast of their imaginary strength; though they promise themselves liberty and peace, and in the pride of their hearts pretend to enjoy the greatest satisfaction; yet their hopes are vain, their promises deceitful; For there is no peace, saith my God, to the wicked. Their sins are spears and arrows, and they pierce them through like a sharp sword; and they know not which way to turn themselves, for they have no grounds to support their confidence.

And we ought to adore the goodness of God for making their guilt so uneasy to them: for if we have any tenderness for ourselves, certainly this immediate punishment of sin must deter us from walking in the counsel of the ungodly: or if we are so foolish as to purchase this disquiet, by entering into the paths of wickedness; yet as soon as we have gotten this sad experience, one would think it should effectually discourage us from standing in the way of sinners, or sitting in the seat of the scornful. (Psal. i. 1.) That it may have this happy effect upon us, let us,

First, Consider the dreadful condition of those men, who are like a troubled sea, when it cannot rest, whose waters cast up mire and dirt. And,

Secondly, The causes of their disquiet, or why there can be no peace to the wicked.

And, first, We are to consider the dreadful condition of those men, who are like a troubled sea, when it cannot rest, whose waters cast up mire and dirt.

The great Creator of the world has placed every thing in a wonderful order; but he has shewn the exactest care in man, the chief of his earthly creatures. All his faculties are appointed to answer some important end, and are placed in a regular subordination to one another for the certain attainment of it. And whilst he obeys the Author of his being, and keeps the rank in which he was ordained to move, there is a most delightful harmony in his breast; his reason commanding him to do his duty; his affections quickening him in the performance of it; his will rejoicing to discharge it; and his conscience applauding him for it, and giving a pleasing foretaste of the favour and approbation of God.

But if he indulges his sinful appetites, his affections become unruly, and get the dominion over him; his will urges him on to his destruction at the command of every passion; his reason is forced to stoop to those actions which it loaths and abhors; and his conscience continually pursues him with the just complaints of the injuries which he has offered to it.

And the punishment which he inflicts upon himself is the more grievous, because the sorrow sticks fast in him, and cleaves to his soul. There are many arguments to alleviate and take off the edge of worldly evils which can bring no relief under the torments of a guilty conscience. For those are sometime at a distance from us, and we may hope to escape, or partly divert them; or if they fall upon us, they may only affect the body, while the mind retires into itself and enjoys its proper happiness. But the sinner has no place to flee unto; no fence against himself. He is his own tormentor, and the sense of his sin and folly possesses all the retirements of his heart, and fills every faculty of his soul. It is about his path, and about his bed, and follows him in all his ways.

And that all-seeing God, who is present with us in every occurrence, and in every thought, will not suffer him to escape from his bosom-enemy, but constrains him to cry out in the bitterness of his anguish, Whither shall I go from my wounded spirit? Whither shall I go from his presence? If I endeavour to climb up into heaven, it oppresses me with a weight that is intolerable: If I go down to hell, there it will be as a worm that will never die; a fire that never will be quenched: If I take the wings of the morning, and remain in the uttermost parts of the sea, there I shall behold a resemblance of my condition; and when I hear the sea and the waves roaring, and see the hearts of men sailing them for fear, I shall feel a greater disorder in my own breast, and be more violently shaken with the confusion of my own thoughts: If I say, peradventure the darkness shall cover me, the ungrateful light will shew my guilt, and display all my shame, with a bright and glaring evidence.

It was this sense of guilt, this terrible conviction, that stung the accursed Cain, when he said unto the Lord, my punishment is greater than I can bear. Behold (says he) thou hast driven me out this day from the face of the earth, and from thy face I shall be hid. And I shall be a fugitive and a vagabond in the earth. (Gen. iv. 13, 14.) But his punishment was rendered more exquisite by a firm assurance, that though he wandered to and fro, he could not fly from himself, and wheresoever he was, he would still be found out by this his enemy. In the most distant countries he would be forced to hear the cries of his conscience; and every one whom he met would bring to his remembrance the murder of his brother.

The conscience of the wicked is always writing bitter things against them, and every accident renews the thoughts of their past iniquity, and takes off the veil of forgetfulness; and it appears in all its horror and deformity in the day of evil: when outward calamities straiten and besiege them, then they feel the most sharp and piercing agonies within: and when the world frowns upon them, they can have no comfort from themselves; no prospect of any thing but hell gaping before them.

How did the hearts of Joseph's brethren smite and reproach them when they were driven by famine into Egypt, whither they had sent their innocent brother, and when they were brought into a seeming necessity, either of snatching the comforts of Jacob's old age from his affectionate embraces, or of suffering bonds, imprisonment, and death! Then they were forced to acknowledge, that they were very guilty concerning their brother; and they could expect no relief, no compassion, because they saw the anguish of his soul when he besought them, and they would not hear; and were their affliction the greatest that could be endured, yet they could not but allow of the equity of their punishment; therefore is this distress come upon us. (Gen. xlii. 21.)

luted with it, is in perpetual dread of a watchful eye that looks down upon it, and an almighty hand that is ready to punish it. And the least appearance of danger sounds the alarm, and all its sins throng forth, as if they were awakened by the surprising summons, Arise, ye dead, and come to judgment.

We have a very remarkable instance of this sudden apprehension, this surprising fear, in the licentious Herod. This great wicked man feared the impartial John the Baptist, because he was a just man and an holy. But he feared him much more, when he had sacrificed the preacher of righteousness to the impetuous demands of the wanton Herodias, and rashly permitted her to execute revenge upon him. When the fame of the blessed Jesus was spread abroad, for the mighty works that were done by him and his disciples, king Herod heard of him, and he said, that John the Baptist was risen from the dead, and therefore mighty works did shew forth themselves in him. (Mark, vi. 14.)

Others pleased themselves with uncertain conjectures concerning him, saying, that it is Elias; or that it is a prophet, or as one of the prophets. (Mark, vi. 15.) But Herod could not but make a conclusion, that filled him, with horror. It is John the Baptist whom I beheaded; he is risen from the dead. (Ver. 16.)

Though he knew not of any resurrection, yet his guilt told him that he was actually risen; and he believed that he was come to proclaim his own innocence, and bring him to an account for his injustice and cruelty; and that therefore mighty works did shew forth themselves in him (vers. 14.), to give testimony to the integrity of John, and discover the guilt of the murderer.

And we may suppose, that when the veil of the temple was rent in twain from the top to the bottom, and the earth quaked, and the rocks rent, and the graves were opened, and many bodies of saints which slept arose, and came out of the graves, and went into the Holy city, and appeared unto many (Mat. xxvii. 51, 52, 53.), then Herod feared greatly, and his heart was shaken and rent like the rocks, and the dark corners of it were opened, and all his sins came forth and appeared to him; and he could not but say of St. John, as the Centurion did of the crucified Jesus, Certainly this was a righteous man! (Luke, xxiii. 47.)

How was the perfect and upright Job affected with his sufferings, when God seemed to have forsaken him, and was pleased to try him in the furnace of affliction! The arrows of the Almighty (says he) are within me, the poison whereof drinketh up my spirits; the terrors of God do set themselves in array against me. Therefore I will not refrain my mouth, I will speak in the anguish of my spirit, I will complain in the bitterness of my soul. (Job, vi. 4.—vii. 11.)

And yet he had this to comfort him, that he suffered not for any iniquity in his hands, that his prayer was pure, that he could say with confidence, Behold my witness is in heaven, and my record is on high. (Job, xvi. 17. 19.)

How much more then must the wicked endure, who are assured that they have provoked an Almighty enemy! Their sins testify against them, their transgressions are with them, and as for their iniquities, they know them. They have sinned presumptuously, and forfeited the favour of God, and he has set them as a burden against him, so that they are a burden to themselves. (Job, vii. 20.) When they lie down, they say when shall we arise, and the night be gone? and they are full of tossings to and fro, to the dawning of the day. (Job, vii. 4.) When they say, our bed shall comfort us, our couch shall ease our complaint, then they are scared with dreams, and terrified with visions. (Job, vii. 13, 14.)

Of this we have experience, whensoever we have done any sinful action. It troubles our thoughts, and interrupts our rest by night with a confused consciousness of guilt, and a dreadful expectation of punishment: and before we are entirely awake in the morning, we find a clog upon our spirits; and though we cannot distinctly remember the occasion of it, our heart tells us there is a heavy charge against us, which strikes a damp upon the enjoyments of the following day; and the upbraiding remembrance of it still returns, and as often as we look into our breasts, our shame rises before us.

A guilty conscience always casts up its loathsome burthen, like those burning mountains that throw up fire out of their bowels, or like the damned, the smoke of whose torment ascendeth up for ever and ever. (Rev. xiv. 11.)

We see the consummation of misery in the treacherous Judas, when he repented of his falsehood to his Lord, and brought again the thirty pieces of silver, the price of him that was valued, to the chief priests and elders, saying; I have sinned in that I have betrayed the innocent blood, (Matt. xxvii. 9. 4.)

They treated him with the utmost contempt, and said, What is that to us? see thou to that; and he was also despised by himself, and became the object of his own hatred and indignation, so that his soul chose strangling and death rather than his life. (Job, vii. 15.)

And into this restless state the sinner will certainly fall unless he makes haste to be reconciled to God. For all his arts will be ineffectual and unable to lull his conscience into a lasting security. The closest train of pleasures will have some interruption; the loudest noise of mirth will be silenced by the cries of guilt; and though he endeavour to strengthen himself in iniquity, yet the number of his sins will not render him altogether insensible of fear, they will only heap up wrath against the day of wrath, and the evils which he has multiplied against himself, will one day find him out.

When the hour of calamity or sickness comes upon him, the sins of his youth will rise in judgment against him, and the black catalogue of vices which he endeavoured to erase or conceal, will appear in plain and indelible characters; when he casts up the account of his sins, he shall be seized with fear and trembling, and his own iniquities shall convince him to his face (Wisd. iv. 20.): his conscience will constrain him to attend to her accusations, and will not permit the temples of his head to take any rest (Psal. cxxxii. 4.); he has no hopes in this life, no prospect of happiness in the other. His present condition is too grievous to be borne, and his expectation is full of misery. He has no stay or support, no anchor to hold him fast, but is driven about and tossed by the violence of a tempest which can never be stilled. He can never entertain the least thoughts of peace, but is at utter enmity with his reason, with his conscience, with his God.

And now what is the hope of the hypocrite though he hath gained, when God taketh away his soul? Terrors take hold on him as waters, a tempest stealeth him away in the night. The east-wind carrieth him away, and he departeth; and, as a storm, hurleth him out of his place. (Job, xxvii. 8. 20, 21, 22.) For God casts upon him, and will not spare, he would fain flee out of his hand; but there is no escaping, for horrible is the end of the righteous. (Wisd. iii. 19.) Which brings me to consider,

Secondly, The causes of their disquiet, or why there can be no peace to the wicked.

And the first and plainest cause of it, is a natural sense of the baseness and malignity of sin. We must necessarily trace it from this; for it could not so generally prevail, were it not essential to the nature of man, and were there not a real difference between good and evil.

In all nations and ages, fear and disquiet have been the inseparable companions of guilt, and no circumstances of life could be a sufficient guard against them. And God has made us liable to suffer the stings of conscience, that the wicked might not go unpunished in any state or condition; and though they should seem to prosper, yet they might have a secret worm to prey upon and consume all their enjoyments.

And this will always be the case as long as reason has any authority in the world. For the mind of man is endued with a power of distinguishing between good and evil; and it does not form uncertain, arbitrary notions of things, but judges by a standing rule, and cannot easily depart from its regular judgment. When virtue and vice present themselves before it, it presently perceives that the one is repugnant, and the other agreeable to it; and the more it meditates upon them, so much the more it confirms its first dislike, and ratifies its just approbation; and it is not in the power of fancy or inclination to reverse the sentence. For the nature of things is not subservient to a wanton humour, or to be bent and turned by our unreasonable desires.

Hence it is, that the sinner has such a mighty contest with himself before he can break through the restraints that are laid upon him. He cannot but know that he is acting to the prejudice of his reason, his reputation, and his interest; and must endure many throes and agonies, give a terrible shock to his nature, and overturn its beautiful order, before he can descend to the commission of a sin.

And he cannot entirely conquer his reluctance; for when he complies with the flattering temptation, he blushes at the thoughts of it, and yields with trembling knees, and a misgiving heart.

And though he would imagine for a time that all is well, when the use of his reason is suspended, and his senses are wrapt up in the enjoyment of sinful pleasures, yet he cannot long enjoy the delusion. For nothing that is unnatural can be lasting; and, notwithstanding all his endeavours, he must return to himself.

And then with what disdain does he behold the loathsome object? With what reproaches does he accuse himself of folly! He discerns the baseness and deformity of sin; and can hardly bear to remember (and yet he must remember), that he is fallen from the dignity of a rational creature, and become more contemptible than the worm that crawlth upon the ground.

Though he labours often to reconcile himself to his great enemy, yet he cannot subdue his aversion, or prevail over his impartial thoughts; for they will sometimes exert themselves, and whensoever they do, his sin will be unable to stand the test of his serious consideration.

Reason will find some sober intervals in which it will call him to an account; some melancholy hours, in which it will reprove, upbraid, torment him.

The heathen had this sense of things to give testimony against their sinful actions; and as they concluded that virtue should be chosen, were it considered only as its own reward; so they were fully convinced that vice was to be avoided, were there no other consequence of it but its immediate punishment.

And their fabulous descriptions of a state of misery, and of whips, and scorpions, and furies, were derived from the real anguish which they felt within themselves, and from the severe lashes, the sharp stings, the restless indignation of their own minds.

And this judgment of sin has universally prevailed, and virtue recommended itself by its natural worth and excellence; and vice would have been condemned had there been no law to condemn it.

Another cause of the disquiet that attends a sinful state, is the expectation of a future judgment, which had taken root in the minds of men, even before God had declared unto us, that he had appointed a day in which he would judge the world (Acts, xvii. 31.), and the person that should administer justice in that solemn trial.

For the privilege of reason, which renders us far more excellent than the inferior ranks of creatures, does also render us capable of giving an account of our actions; and as it was natural to conclude that we were the work of an all-wise Being, so it was reasonable to expect that he should call us to answer for the discharge or abuse of our great trust.

And every man has in himself a lively emblem of the manner of proceeding in the future examination, and an earnest of the sentence that will be pronounced. For we find a tribunal erected in our hearts, and a judge sitting upon it, and summoning all our thoughts, words, and actions, to appear before it.

We are brought to this careful review, though our wills strive against it; and we cannot but judge of them according to their different nature and qualities, though we would fain confound the distinction, and call evil good, and good evil.

When we do well, our conscience tells us, that we shall be accepted. When we do ill, it tells us, to assure us, that sin lieth at the door; and it whispers to us, that we should stand in awe of this bosom witness and judge, because it bears not the sword in vain; that it is the minister of God, a revenger to execute wrath upon them that do evil (Rom. xiii. 4.); and therefore it concerns us to pay a deference to it, because there is a higher court in which we must appear, a greater tribunal at which we must stand to give an account to a just and righteous God.

And this expectation of a judgment to come, has frequently checked the daring sinner, and interrupted his mirth and jollity; and whilst he has been walking in the ways of his heart, and in the sight of his eyes, he has been troubled with the ill-boding admonition, Know thou, that for all these things God will bring thee into judgment. (Eccles. xi. 9.) And the bare possibility of it is enough to confound and distract even those that will not believe any more.

Since, then, the wicked are like a troubled sea, when it cannot rest, and their disquiet is the necessary consequence of sin; let us consider the folly of embracing it for the sake of any temptation. The pleasures that attend it are imaginary and transient; And it is even as when a hungry man dreameth, and behold he eateth, but he awaketh, and his soul is empty; or as when a thirsty man dreameth, and behold he drinketh, but he awaketh, and behold he is faint, and his soul has appetite. (Isa. xxix. 8.) But the fear, the anxiety, the confusion, and remorse, that immediately follow it, are real and lasting.

Can there then be any advantage or pleasure in sin that will be a sufficient recompence for the loss of the peace of our minds? Can we be so foolish as to gratify our vicious appetites, when within a moment we shall be constrained to censure our past conduct, and reflect upon it with shame? Were we to gain the highest honours, or the greatest riches, yet they could not render us unmindful of our misery. All the arts of the flatterer, and the loudest applause of the multitude, cannot raise the spirits of the man that is condemned by himself. The weight of guilt oppresses him, and he is dejected and dismayed, because he cannot but be conscious of it.

And his own endeavours are as ineffectual to relieve him as those of others. For he sees through the mist which he would cast before his eyes, and loaths the absurdity of his own vain flattery.

Though he tries to hide his iniquity in the deepest secrecy, yet his troubled heart will cast up its mire and dirt.

Though he sometimes seems to be falling into a little slumber, yet it only serves to heighten his misery when he is surprised in it, and forced to awake: For there is no peace (saith my God) to the wicked. Let him make haste to escape, and fly whithersoever he will, yet the storm will reach him, and he cannot screen himself from its violence.

And at the last day, when the sea, and death and hell shall give up their dead (Rev. xx. 13.), then shall all his iniquity come forth, and the innumerable multitude of his sins shall accuse him before the dreadful tribunal.

And, after the terrible sentence is pronounced, he will be cast into a sea of fire, where his body will be tormented with the most exquisite pains, and his soul will eternally suffer the vengeance of an injured conscience, and an offended God.

SERMON CXXXVIII.

By THOMAS NEWLIN, M. A.

Pleasure and Peace the certain Consequences of Virtue.

Prov. iii. 17.

Her ways are ways of pleasantness, and all her paths are peace.

WHEN God had given Solomon wisdom and understanding, exceeding much, and largeness of heart, even as the sand that is on the sea-shore (1 Kings, iv. 29.), he indulged himself to the enjoyment of every pleasure, and whatsoever his eyes desired he kept not from them, that he might see what was that good for the sons of men, which they should do under the heaven all the days of their life. (Eccles. ii. 3. 10.) And he that had opened the treasures of nature, that had made silver in Jerusalem as stones (2 Chron. ix. 27.), and was raised to the highest pitch of earthly glory and happiness; he was fully convinced, that religion was preferable to the most exquisite of sensual pleasures, to all the satisfaction that riches could bestow, and to all the kingdoms of the world, decked with their ensnaring beauties, and set off with their brightest lustre.

He that was most capable of determining which is the true wisdom, has delivered this certain truth; The fear of the Lord is the beginning of wisdom, and the knowledge of the Holy, is understanding. (Prov. ix. 10.) And as the result of all his experience, he says; Happy is the man that findeth wisdom, and the man that getteth understanding. For the merchandize of it is better than the merchandize of silver, and the gain thereof than fine gold. She is more precious than rubies, and all the things thou canst desire are not to be compared unto her. Length of days is in her right-hand, and in her left-hand, riches and honour. Her ways are ways of pleasantness, and all her paths are peace. (Prov. iii. 13, 14, 15, 16, 17.)

And one would think there should need no further inducement to the practice of virtue; and that the singular pleasure that flows from it, would sufficiently enforce an exhortation to it.

That you may no longer be deceived by the artifices of the tempter, or discouraged by the ill report that he has made of religion, let me desire you to call to mind the sincere pleasure and satisfaction that you have enjoyed in the very instant that you have done any virtuous action; whilst I prove,

First. That the pleasures of religion are more noble, delightful, and lasting, than the pleasures of sin; and,

Secondly, That the practice of it keeps us in perpetual peace and safety, and supports us in the needful time, and brings us peace at the last. (Psal. xxxvii. 38.)

And, first, that the pleasures of religion are more noble, delightful, and lasting, than the pleasures of sin. They are far more noble, as the soul, that is chiefly conversant in them, far exceeds the body; and, as the objects from whence they are derived; are superior to those that gratify our senses.

If we value ourselves upon the distinguishing privileges that are vouchsafed to us, and think it our glory, that we are above the beasts that perish, we must also conclude, that the happiness of the better part of our being, and the satisfaction that is agreeable to our reason, are much more desirable than those pleasures that we enjoy in common with the lower ranks of beings: for unless we measure the distance between us and them, by the different degrees of happiness for which we are qualified, our privileges are only vain and useless titles.

But I hope there is no one so immersed in sensuality, so forgetful of his soul, as to think it more pleasant to satisfy the meanest appetites of depraved nature, than to act conformably to reason, and consult the interest of his nobler part.

The objects that minister pleasure to us, while we do our duty, are such as the holy angels cannot but delight in, and such as even God himself looks down upon with approbation.

And it ought to be matter of our daily thanksgiving, that we are endued with capacities fit for such glorious pleasures, and have so many opportunities of making ourselves happy.

While we are engaged in the pursuit after virtue, our minds are enlarged, and our reason is continually improved. The image of God that is stamped upon us becomes more plain and lively; and when we behold the increasing resemblance, it is an earnest of that inconceivable increase of bliss that will flow in upon us, when we shall see our Creator face to face, and have the honour of copying after him to all eternity.

Every good action encourages us to delight in ourselves and to look with boldness upon that object, which is highly pleasing, when we dare to be acquainted with it; but equally dreadful when sin has rendered our own reflections disagreeable to us, and alienated us from ourselves.

When our reason and conscience condemn us, we cannot anticipate the welcome sentence of our Judge, by giving us their applause, such beams of joy are darted into our hearts as can only proceed from him who is the Fountain of everlasting Light.

We then know that we are answering his important designs, doing as it becometh reasonable creatures, and have the concurrent testimony of all good men, and even of those unhappy souls that cannot be persuaded to taste the pleasures of virtue, and will one day wish in vain, that they had lived the life, or could die the death of the righteous.

When we are filled with a just sense of our obligations to God, and endeavouring to make a grateful acknowledgment, his goodness presents itself to us, in such an endearing manner, that it inflames us with fervent devotion, and is the very soul and enlivening principle of our obedience. We are then so far from thinking our duty too much for us, that we wish we could do infinitely more; that we had the swiftness of the morning light, since we cannot but rejoice with the sun to run our course.

How much more pleasant is this grateful sense of God's favour, than the impious satisfaction that degenerate men take in a prophane jest, and dishonouring the holy name of God!

When we have dealt fairly and impartially with our neighbour, and are assured that no one hath any cause to be our enemy, with what a cheerful confidence do we go forth into the world! Our way is plain and direct before us; we have but one design, which is to act honestly, and therefore it needs no arts to prevent discovery. We have not doubled and prevaricated in our actions, and there is no unlucky turning, where we are able to meet an adversary, no flaw in our behaviour that requires fresh pretences to conceal it.

When we have taken away the sting of an injury, by preserving the peace of our minds, and by doing good for evil, have made even our enemy itself relent, and blush at the enmity it bore to us, our mind rejoices in its noble conquest; and when we reflect upon the disorders of passion, and see the tempest quelled by the authority of reason, we cannot but compare our condition to that of the passenger, that has brought his treasures to the shores of safety, and looks back with comfort on the troubled sea. How far does this excel the imaginary pleasures of revenge that rack and torture, while they transport us, and are no more to be desired than the dreams of a man heated with a fever, while his reason is overturned, and he is so far deluded by his wild imagination, as to think himself safe and happy!

Charity, as it is the most godlike virtue, so it is the most agreeable to the dictates of our nature, and has always recommended itself to us by the name of humanity. It is indeed a duty we owe to our neighbour, but it is at the same time relief to ourselves; for self-love, that darling principle, is still importuning us to be kind to the miserable; and whilst the object of our charity begs us to give an alms, for the sake of God our common Father, and in the name of Jesus our compassionate Redeemer, there is an advocate within us, pleading for him; and lest we should not regard the case of another person, it speaks to us in our own behalf, and intreats us to be merciful to our own bowels.

And when we readily stretch forth our hand to assist the poor and needy, the seasonable refreshment that they receive from us returns into our bosom; their joy sparkles in our face, and our heart opens and expands itself, to make room for the full tide of pleasure that flows in upon it.

And now let the voluptuous man ransack all his stores; let him cover his table with an artful variety of studied meats, and indulge his appetite with every thing that his curious fancy can invent; and, in the height of all his luxury, he will not enjoy half the pleasure that arises from one kind and generous action: all his happiness will be flat and insipid, if compared with the transcendent delight that the good man finds within himself; when he that was ready to perish with hunger tastes of the grateful morsel that he deals forth to him; and is, as it were, recovered to life, by drinking a wholesome draught to allay his burning thirst.

How wonderful is thy goodness, O God, that hast made one man as a ministering angel to another!

How shall we ever sufficiently praise thee, O blessed Jesus, for inculcating the duty of charity, and injoining it in a special manner as thy commandment, since it renders both the giver and receiver inexpressibly happy, and makes us like to those in bliss, when we study to be perfect, as thou art perfect!

Every virtue contributes to the pleasantness of the ways of religion; and were we truly sensible of the delight that results from each part of our duty, it would almost commence that exceeding great reward, that is laid up for the souls of just men made perfect.

We cannot better describe the pleasures of a good conscience, than by repeating the promises that the wise man made to his son: Keep sound wisdom and discretion; so shall they be life to thy soul, and grace to thy neck. Then shalt thou walk in thy way safely, and thy foot shall not stumble. When thou liest down thou shalt not be afraid; yea thou shalt lie down, and thy sleep shall be sweet. (Prov. iii. 21, 22, 23, 24.)

When the darkness of the night brings horror upon the wicked, the righteous lay themselves down in peace, and take their rest, knowing that the Lord will wake them to dwell in safety. They are assured, that he will stretch out the wings of his watchful providence, to be their covering, and give his angels charge over them, those affectionate spirits that rejoice in their charge.

And when they awake in the morning, their innocence gives them a cheerful countenance, and they look lively, as the heavens, when the sun has withdrawn the veil that was spread over them, and brought fresh life to the whole creation: or rather, they are like those glorious beings, which they shall be hereafter, when the trumpet shall call them forth to a blessed resurrection, and the sons of God shall shout for gladness at the sight of everlasting day.

And the pleasures of virtue are more delightful than the pleasures of sin, as they are pure and without alloy. The happiness that attends us in the performance of our duty, was made for us, and suits with the capacities of our nature; it keeps the soul unspotted, and preserves the brightness of reason; and at the same time conduces to the welfare of the body, and the cheerfulness of the spirits: so that we neither offend our reason, nor offer any unnatural evidence to our senses, and fear neither the complaints of the one, nor the remonstrances of the other.

The delight that we take in it, is constant and regular, without any sudden damp, or ungrateful interruption. For the soul is as happy as it can be in this present state, and so far admits the body into a participation with it, as to shed gladness and health upon it.

But when we so far debase ourselves, as to pursue after the pleasures of sin, we can have but a partial and imperfect enjoyment; for our superior faculties are oppressed and trampled on, because they will not join in the pursuit; our soul is perpetually grieving for the injury that is done to it; and the noise of sinful mirth serves only to silence the cries of our wounded conscience, as the dreadful harmony of war seems to still the shrieks and groans of the dying multitude in the day of battle. And when the sinner has strengthened himself, and imagines that he has subdued his heart, and shall no longer be reproached by it, even then his hopes fail him, and he trembles at his own fears. The hand-writing is still too plain; and even when the madness of his chosen companions is sounding in his ears, he suspects that they will not be able to guard him against himself, and that after all his industry to prevent reflection, he shall yet be found out by this his enemy.

And he that over-reaches and defrauds his neighbour, though he may admire his little cunning, and think how artfully he has imposed upon him, though he may greedily embrace the unjust gain, and delight to grasp the treasures of wickedness; yet he must necessarily loath his baseness, and look with a shy and jealous countenance, upon the blot that cleaves to him.

But the pleasures of religion are not only sincere and unmixed, but they are also more lasting than the pleasures of sin.

When the good man is going to do any virtuous action, his heart encourages him to it, and he is animated with such a delightful expectation, that he panteth after it, as the hart panteth after the water brooks. And in the act itself, he does not find his hopes disappointed; but his highest conceptions fall infinitely short of it; the satisfaction that he derives from it, is greater than the fairest report had made it; for nothing but the enjoyment can give us a true sense of it; and after all the most engaging descriptions, the half of it is not told us.

And the pleasure is not transient; for a fund is laid in, to maintain a constant cheerfulness, and the remembrance of having done our duty, is a provision for a continual feast.

Reflection renews the agreeable impression; and the mind rejoices to look into itself, and behold the temple of the Holy Ghost, adorned with the beauty of holiness: and when it sees our conscience pure and undefiled, it speaks its admiration in the words of the Psalmist, O how amiable is this thy dwelling, thou Lord of Hosts! Blessed is the man whose strength is in thee; in whose heart are thy ways. (Psal. lxxiv. 1. 5.)

And whilst we are under this pleasing conviction, surely, we must say, One day in thy courts, O God, is better than a thousand (ver. 10.); or with the wise heathen, One day lived according to the precepts of virtue, is to be preferred before an immortality of sin.

The living waters that refresh us in the discharge of our duty, are kept in lasting cisterns, and they are never palled or polluted, but we have still a quicker relish of them, and they every day become more grateful to us, as we go on in the ways of religion. For the more we repeat its duties, so much the more they recommend themselves to us; and instead of growing unacceptable by repetition, they afford something new and surprising, and we like them better, as we are farther acquainted with them: for our faculties are improved by religion, instead of being impaired by frequent use. It is health to the soul, and as naturally conduces to its welfare, as exercise does to that of the body: and when our house of clay is hastening to its dissolution, the soul that has been habituated to virtue, is most active and vigorous; the virtues of a whole life then contribute to its reward, and this lasting treasure is translated with it, into another state, and is its sure possession in a blessed immortality.

But it is not thus with the ways of sin. Whilst unhappy man is in expectation of its pleasures, his desires are like the unnatural thirst of a diseased body; his mind is in a ferment, and cannot be at rest till he has attained to the beloved object; and when he has gained this his point, he finds that his hope, restless as it was, was better than the enjoyment: for the sake of this indeed he thought, that the hours came on with too slow a pace, and kept his happiness at a distance. But when the desired hour comes, the pleasure forsakes him, almost as soon as he embraces it; and the time of enjoyment is but as a point, if compared with that which he wished away.

Before he has swallowed the luscious draught, he begins to take the gall and wormwood; and the treacherous serpent that invited him to drink of it stings him to death, while he fondly plays and twists himself about him.

And then his memory is so far from renewing the pleasure, that it brings his sin under a quite different appearance, and shows him his reason and conscience wounded with poisonous arrows.

And be the pleasure he is inclined to never so charming, yet it will not bear to be often repeated; he is soon convinced, that it cannot afford him variety of entertainment; and still meeting with but imperfect satisfaction, and with the same disappointments, he is weary of treading in the circle of sin; and though his lusts command him to go on, yet he sickens at the thoughts of it; and the sinful enjoyment weakens and overpowers his capacities, so that by often reaching after it, they destroy themselves.

How miserable then is the man that has rendered himself incapable of having a sense of those pleasures that he has chiefly sought after, and is so little acquainted with religion, that he cannot receive any relief from it!

How disagreeable a sight is he, when he remains the will, but not the power of sinning, and endeavours to recover his lost appetite, and quicken it, with the sharpest juices? But his stomach rejects the loathsome burthen, and though he would fain bear a part in company, and run into the same excess of riot with them, yet he is compelled to own, that he is not able to keep pace with them.

But supposing, that his sin is not too hard for him, till the flower of life is fading away; yet the time will come, when he will want a support; and if he make this his staff to lean upon, it will pierce him through: for the pleasure that allured him to the commission of every act of sin, will then be passed away; and after he has seen, that all its enjoyments were but as a guest that tarrieth but a day, he will have all his sins heaping themselves upon him, to crush him, when he is already bowed down with infirmities: and each particular of his sad account will appear with fresh characters in his mind, when all other impressions are worn away; and will increase the dreadful retinue of the king of terrors.

That we may be inclined to make a better provision against the evil day, I shall,

Secondly, Shew that the practice of religion keeps us in perpetual peace and safety, and supports us in the needful time, and brings us peace at the last. Religion preserves a settled tranquillity in the mind, and prevents disquieting fears, and the tumults of unruly passion. And when all is well within, it assures us, that we are in peace and safety abroad; for it engages the kindness of Providence, and gains the good-will of men. The world approves the man whom God delights to honour; and if any one should be so unreasonable, as to retain a prejudice against him, he knows that God will turn his heart, and make even his enemies to be at peace with him. Having an undoubted certainty, that he has done no man wrong, he is confident that every one will think favourably of him; or if it should happen otherwise, that his cause is so good, that it will soon justify itself. Thus secure from danger, he enjoys the ordinary pleasures of life, and every little occurrence makes some addition to his happiness. When he is walking abroad, the multitude of objects that are displayed before him, put him in mind of his great Creator; and the wonderful works of the heavens and the earth transport him with pious exultation. When he is sitting by himself, he is not without a friend and counsellor, that entertains him with variety of pleasures, and renders the mirth of company superfluous to him: and when he enters into conversation, he has every thing that is valuable in it; and religion sheds its delightful beams upon the innocent liberty that he allows himself: for religion, like the light of the sun, adds a new beauty to every object that it shines upon, and the satisfaction that arises from it, makes every thing that is pleasant more exceedingly pleasing: and if he has a fair portion of the things of this world allotted to him, he can use them with complacency, because the poor are partakers with him; and he is satisfied that he cannot accuse himself, either for acquiring them unjustly, or abusing of them to the hurt of his own soul.

It is indeed a very powerful inducement to the practice of religion, that heightens every enjoyment, and improves our happiness in the days of our youth and prosperity. But the surest trial of its principles is in the hour of danger. Then we shall most especially perceive their never-failing support and effectual comforts. To have a citadel to retire to, where we shall be above the reach of an enemy, after he has done his utmost to straiten and distress us; this surely is an advantage to be sought for with the most ardent desires. And this is a case peculiar to religion. The rich man may fall from his most established greatness, or he may keep his possessions, and yet they will not be serviceable to him, when the most glittering shew will be too little to conceal a troubled mind; or when his pains will not be at all alleviated by the most expensive applications. But the sharpest misery that worldly evils can create, can never deprive us of the comforts of religion. Though the season is never so dark and gloomy, there will yet be light to the hearts of the righteous. Though every sinew is an instrument of torture, and diseases fill every vein, yet the mind can enjoy the peace of conscience, and collect all the most valuable satisfactions within itself.

When God is pleased to correct us in his fatherly kindness, and the good things that he gave us are taken away, then we shall rejoice, that we hold fast our integrity, and would not let it go. this will be as the angel from heaven, that stood by our blessed Saviour, strengthening him in his agonies. And whatever interpretation the world may put upon our sufferings; how ready soever our pretended friends may be, to upbraid us, in our misery, with their censorious reproofs; yet these arrows will be unable to hurt us, if our heart does not reproach us, and we are not afraid to commit our cause to God. Then we shall stand on a sure foundation, and regard not the proud waves that roll against us, since we have a treasure which we cannot be bereaved of; which would still be above the power of the waters, were God to permit them once more to break down their appointed bounds; and which will shine like the fine gold, when the world shall melt away in a devouring fire, and all its glories return to dross and corruption. It is religion that will stand us in great stead, when our senses will be no longer capable of pleasure, and even the desire of all their objects will fail: when our friends with ineffectual wailing shall complain, that all their endeavours are in vain, this will give us relief and consolation. When every hour casts an additional weight upon us, this will bring the days of our youth to remembrance, and set them against the days of darkness: when the body turns for rest, and cannot find it, the mind will enjoy it by reflection: and when the portion of our time is almost run out, and every drop seems to be the last, this will make the time past our own: when we are taking our farewell of the world, this will cleave fast to us, with a faithful assurance that it will never fail nor forsake us. This will enable the soul and body to bear a short separation, since it fills us with a joyful hope that they will meet in glory: when our great enemy is trying his utmost efforts to discourage us into a surrender in our last hour, this will deliver us safe to a guard of angels; when our spirits are just sinking away, this will mingle its past pleasures and comforts; in one rich refreshing cordial: and when our eyes are almost covered with the night of death, our faith will look up to Heaven with the most piercing discernment, and our hope will grow into enjoyment.

O let us taste and see how good the Lord is, and we shall never repent of the experiment; but every branch of our duty will open new scenes of pleasure, and the increase of knowledge will enlarge our happiness. Every advance that we make will bring us nearer to the prospect of the promised land; and when we are on the brink of the grave, we shall stand on the verge of a blessed eternity; and having viewed, through faith, the glorious mansions that are prepared for us, we shall contentedly lie down and die; for we cannot but be willing to depart into the regions of peace; and certainly we must desire to go hence, that our eyes may see this salvation.

Then we shall confess, that the merchandize of wisdom is better than the merchandize of silver, and the gain thereof than fine gold: that she is more precious than rubies, and all the things we could desire were not to be compared unto her. For she has ages of bliss in her right-hand, and in her left-hand never-fading riches and honour. Her ways are ways of inexpressible pleasantness, and all her paths lead to everlasting peace.

SERMON CXXXIX

By GEORGE HAGGITT, A.M.

Rector of Beechamwell, Norfolk.

On the Necessity of Good Works.

ST. JAMES II. 26.

As the body without the spirit is dead, so faith without works is dead also.

TITUS III. 8.

This is a faithful saying, and these things I will that thou affirm constantly, that they which have believed in God, might be careful to maintain good works.

From the first rise of Christianity down to this present time, there has always existed a set of designing or deluded men, calling themselves Christians, who have maintained the doctrine of faith in opposition to that of good works; who have imagined, or pretended to imagine, that a belief in the life, death, and resurrection of our Saviour, and in the miraculous circumstances which accompanied each, would exempt them from the practice of the moral virtues, and leave them to the free indulgence of their lawless and unruly passions.

This doctrine of theirs they have grounded on certain selected passages of Scripture, which they have explained in such a manner, as to make them contradict all the rest of it. They tell us of the frequent and vehement assertions of St. Paul, "of justification by the free grace of God," and of "being saved by faith alone," and "by faith without the works of the law;" and these expressions they so interpret as to make them counteract the whole design of religion. Salvation, they say, is the free gift of God; it is not of debt but of grace; it is not bestowed in consequence of any actions of ours, but gratuitously given through God's boundless mercy; a lively faith in the merits of our Redeemer is alone requisite on our parts; what we do is out of the question; we have but firmly to believe, and we shall be entitled to an inheritance of life eternal.

I propose in this discourse to endeavour to overthrow this pernicious opinion, first, by explaining what learned men have in general agreed to be the real meaning of the passages which appear to make for it; secondly, by laying before you some strong and clear quotations from the Scriptures, in which the virtues of a good life are insisted on as indispensably necessary to salvation; and lastly, by proving from common sense and reason, the absurdity of expecting the favour of God and the rewards of Heaven on any other terms than by adding to sound faith good works.

And first, I will explain what learned men have, in general, agreed to be the real meaning of the passages which are brought in support of the opinion, that faith alone, unaccompanied by good works, is sufficient unto salvation.

It is very evident, that when St. Paul makes use of the words election, vocation, adoption, justification, and some others of the like tenor, he does not always apply them to the final judgment; that is, he does not always mean that those who are elected, called, adopted, or justified, have already obtained, or shall certainly obtain, the kingdom of God. Recollect to whom his epistles were addressed, to those who had once been heathens, who had worshipped gods of wood and stone, or men frail and wicked as themselves, and who had no certain rule to live by, and scarce knew the difference between virtue and vice, but who had now embraced the Christian religion, had become acquainted with the knowledge, which that inculcated, and entitled to the rewards, which that held forth.

This acquisition of the laws, and this title to the blessings of the Gospel, thus bestowed on the heathens, the apostle calls their "being elected, adopted, justified;" and these privileges he affirms them to have obtained without previous good works, but merely by the free grace of God, on their only believing in the truth of the religion which he had sent down. Whenever then St. Paul talks of justification without works, he always means this first justification, men being made Christians; but this is a very different thing from final justification at the last day, to which holiness, virtue, good works, are indispensably necessary.

As to the expression of justification without the works of the law, it sometimes means without an observance of the rites and ceremonies of the law of Moses, which some early Christians insisted to be requisite; but, with respect to the moral part of that law, our Saviour and his apostles constantly declare that they do not come to destroy, but to fulfil it.

With these two keys I believe that every passage of Scripture, which seems to favour the idea of the sufficiency of faith alone to salvation, may be otherwise explained; and I leave to every candid person to determine whether that interpretation which makes a good book consistent with itself, is not to be preferred before that, which makes it at variance.

And this brings me to what I proposed in the second place, to lay before you some strong and clear quotations from the Scripture, in which the virtues of a good life are insisted on as indispensably necessary to salvation. And here so many passages, to this purpose, press

themselves upon me, that the only difficulty is to select and arrange them. The forerunner of our Saviour, John the Baptist, is described as opening the way for the Gospel, by preaching repentance and remission of sins; that is, by preaching that men should be forgiven on sorrow for past wickedness, and amendment in future. Our Saviour also began his ministry by preaching repentance: "from that time began Jesus to preach, and to say, repent, for the kingdom of heaven is at hand." Or as St. Mark in the parallel passage expresses it, "the time is fulfilled, the kingdom of God is at hand, repent ye and believe the Gospel." Not only believing but forsaking of sin, and turning to a life of virtue, was required by him of his disciples. In his sermon on the mount, he particularly insists on the practice of a variety of good qualities, and in one verse commands us to be exemplary, and even conspicuous, in the exercise of them in general; "let your light so shine before men, that they may see your good works, and glorify your Father, which is in heaven." In the same excellent discourse he tells his hearers, that except their righteousness, that is, their practice of what is right, shall exceed the righteousness of the Scribes and Pharisees, they shall in no case enter into the kingdom of heaven. And still more to my present purpose, he expressly declares, that not every one who shall say unto him, "Lord, Lord," shall enter into the kingdom of heaven, but he only that doeth the will of his father; as if he had said, Not they, who only profess themselves to be Christians, and who believe and own me to be their master, but they who do what I teach shall obtain salvation. Nay, he goes still further, and tells them, that though they shall have even performed miracles in his name, yet if they have been disobedient to his will, and lived wickedly, he shall, at the great day of judgment, reply to their claims of acquaintance and favour, "I never knew you, depart from me, ye that work iniquity."

You remember the parable of the king, who made a marriage feast for his son; those who were invited, are distinguished into three sorts: first, those who were asked and did not come, by which are meant, those who had the Gospel proposed to them, and did not embrace it: secondly, those who came, but had not on a wedding garment, those who had faith in Jesus, believing him to be the Christ, but were not new clad with a true repentance and amendment of life: thirdly, those who were invited, and had on the wedding garment; those who both believed the Gospel, and practised the precepts which it enjoins. Here you may observe, that belief without practice is equally condemned with unbelief: "Bind him," says the king, speaking of the guest without a wedding garment, "hand and foot, and take him away, and cast him into outer darkness; there shall be weeping and gnashing of teeth." They only were allowed to remain at the feast, to sit down in the kingdom of heaven, who both attended to the invitation of the king and came properly prepared; who both acknowledged Christ to be the Son of God, and followed that course of life which he pointed out. It is likewise very worthy of your notice, that in all the places where our Saviour speaks of the day of judgment, the sentence follows on doing or not doing, without any mention of believing. In the fifth chapter of St. John are these words, "the hour is coming, in the which all that are in their graves shall hear my voice, and shall come forth, they that have done good, unto the resurrection of life, and they that have done evil, unto the resurrection of damnation." In the seventh chapter of St. Matthew, speaking of the same day, he says, "depart from me, ye workers of iniquity." In the thirteenth, "the Son of man shall send forth his angels, and they shall gather out of his kingdom all things that offend, and them which do iniquity, and shall cast them into a furnace of fire." And again in the sixteenth chapter: "For the Son of Man shall come in, the glory of his Father, with his angels, and then he shall reward every man according to his works."

This you will find invariably to be the manner of proceeding in all the other places of Scripture where our Lord speaks of the last day; acceptance or condemnation are constantly annexed to doing or not doing, without any notice of believing. Let me not, however, be misunderstood: I do not mean that faith in Christ is unnecessary; on the contrary, in those who have the Gospel proposed to them, it is absolutely necessary; but that faith which shews itself in a good life, is alone a faith unto salvation.

"What doth it profit a man (saith St. James) though he ~~says~~ he hath faith, and hath not works; can faith save him? Faith without works is dead, being alone: by works faith is made perfect. As the body without the spirit is dead, so faith without works is dead also." To conclude this head, it is evident beyond all dispute, from the whole tenor of the Scriptures, that purity of conduct, as well as firmness of belief, is absolutely essential to entitle us to a place in the mansions of the blessed. But lastly, even if the Scriptures had not spoken so expressly, the absurdity of expecting the favour of God, and the rewards of heaven, on any other terms than by adding to a sound faith, good works, is evident from common sense and reason. God, it is universally agreed, possesses in the most perfect degree the attributes of purity and holiness; is it then at all credible that a Being of this kind should send down, and reveal to his creatures, a religion which should let loose the reins to every corrupt passion, and authorise them in the indulgence of every evil inclination? which should hold forth to them the promise of eternal happiness, on the sole condition of yielding their assent to some few points of faith, but should leave them under the same slavish submission to their lusts in which it found them? It is not credible; every suggestion of sense and reason cries out against it. For consider whither such a position would carry us? Religion only aims to regulate our belief: very well; I firmly credit all which it requires of me, and on this ground I look for the rewards which it promises, let my practice be what it may; I will only take care not to subject myself to the punishment of human laws, and I will be as wicked as interest invites or impels me, fearless on this account of any after-reckoning in futurity. Am I avaricious? I will take every opportunity of defraud-

ing my neighbour of his property. Am I revengeful? neither the reputation nor the person of him who has accidentally injured me, or whose interest interferes with mine, shall be sacred from my attacks. Am I sensual? Let my friend beware of me; I will seduce from him the affections of his wife, or I will rob him of the innocence of his child; for so long as I am a believer, I can commit all these enormities unchecked or undisturbed by my conscience. Honour and honesty may here be alledged as restraints upon me; with some men I grant they would, but with far the majority they will be found feeble ties against the allurments of passion, supported by the hopes of impunity. You see then into what absurdities the idea of the sufficiency of faith without works leads; you perceive what a world this would be, if such a persuasion were universally prevalent.

Let us not then separate those two friends which agree so well together, religion and morality; let us not content ourselves with taking the shield of faith, but let us put on, at the same time, the whole armour of righteousness; it is that alone which can empower us to withstand the assaults and be victorious over the malice of our grand adversary; it is that alone which can enable us to appear with decent confidence before the tribunal of our Judge and Saviour. They worship God best who resemble him most; let us then not only believe what he has revealed, but let us practice what he has commanded; let us endeavour to be like him in purity and goodness; let us conduct all which relates to ourselves with decency and propriety; all which concerns our fellow-creatures with justice and candour. Let us possess our own vessels with sanctification and honour, and do unto others, as we would they should do unto us.

Strive to enter in at the strait gate: for many, I say unto you, will seek to enter in, and shall not be able.

FAR the greater number of people appear to be in a middle state between virtue and vice; they are neither entirely good nor entirely wicked; whenever they think on the subject, they will own that there are such places as heaven and hell, and that they shall be rewarded or punished after their death, according as they shall have behaved themselves while they were in this world; but they shew sufficiently by their actions, that their belief is not firm and steady, otherwise they would not content themselves with seeking, with using some taint endeavours to gain the kingdom of heaven, but would strive, would exert all their might to acquire that invaluable prize.

I propose in this discourse, to point out to you, first, some of those persons who may be said to seek the kingdom of heaven, but who, only seeking it, shall not attain it: I propose, secondly, to shew what is meant by striving to gain the kingdom of heaven; and I propose, lastly, to bring forward the weighty motives by which we are urged to be amongst those who strive.

The first and lowest example, which I shall mention, of persons who seek the kingdom of heaven, is that of those who content themselves with desires and wishes only, who think at times, what a delightful circumstance it would be to enjoy everlasting happiness; and what a dreadful circumstance it would be, to be doomed to everlasting torments, and at those moments will call out, "Lord, Lord," but who will not deny themselves in any one instance, or stir one single step besides.

Can people of this description really expect that their wishes will be answered? I am sure they cannot reason by what they see passing on earth. Will wishing for any thing that is valuable be sufficient to obtain it here? Will wishes clothe a man, will wishes feed him, will wishes enable him to provide for his family? Can I, by desiring it only, become learned, rich, or respectable? No! I must add to my desires, endeavours; I must exert myself; I must study or I must labour, and that not slightly, or now and then, but vigorously and without remission, or my desires will avail me nothing. And is it possible I can for a moment flatter myself, that when it requires so much pains to gain any earthly good, I shall be advanced to everlasting joys in heaven without any pains at all! The thing speaks for itself.

But perhaps people, who content themselves with desires only, buoy themselves up with some general notions of the goodness and mercy of God; that God is merciful, is certain, but he is likewise just; he forgives sins, but not merely because we wish it: it is necessary that we pray heartily for his forgiveness, that we are sincerely sorry that we have done amiss, that we resolve steadily to do so no more, and that we keep our resolutions: these are the terms, the only terms of acceptance, as he has repeatedly declared in the Holy Scriptures. Both reason and Scripture therefore join to assure us, that they, who build their expectation of heaven merely on their wishes, build on no foundation.

A second description of persons that I shall notice, who may be said to seek the kingdom of heaven, are those whose endeavours are only exerted by fits and starts; who, on reading any good book, hearing any awakening discourse, or on having some serious thoughts suggested to them by God's holy spirit, are for a while religious and virtuous, but in time of temptation fall away; they are unable to resist the solicitations of vicious companions, or the enticements of desires, to which they have been used heretofore to yield; their righteousness is like the early cloud and the morning dew; it so soon passes away. It is indeed preferable to uninterrupted wickedness, because it gives ground to hope that it may by degrees become more steady; but in itself it is of no avail: he who possesses it, can only be said to seek, not to strive after the kingdom of heaven, and has therefore no grounds from Scripture to flatter himself with success. 'when a righteous man turneth away from his righteousness, and committeth iniquity, and dieth in it, all his righteousness shall be counted as nothing: for his iniquity that he hath done, shall he die.'

In the third set of persons, who come within the meaning of the text, of seeking and not striving, we may reckon those, who have discarded all their frailties and sins except one, and who flatter themselves that their good behaviour in all other particulars will atone for a single deficiency. But they will find themselves miserably deceived; either the kingdom of heaven is, or is not an object worthy of being contended for; if it is not, let drop all concern about it; let us eat, drink, and be merry; let us make ourselves as happy as we can in this world, without any thought of futurity; but if the kingdom of heaven be (as indeed it is) of the most consummate and inexpressible importance; if it be worthy that we should consider every earthly good as less than nothing in comparison of it, that alone surely ought to occupy our care and engross our affections; every thing else ought to yield to it, for it is very certain that one single preference of an earthly good, if habitually indulged, will take away all chance of attaining heaven. "Whosoever shall keep the whole law (says St. James) and yet offend in one point, he is guilty of all," he is guilty of giving a preference to his lust in one particular instance over his duty, of setting an higher esteem upon things present than things future, and therefore he must expect to reap the fruits of his abridity in being deprived of that reward to which his conduct in other respects, were it not for this one deficiency, would entitle him. I have heard of a person contending in a race for a prize of vast importance, who was prevented from winning it, by turning out of the way to pick up some golden balls, which were from time to time thrown down by the competitor for that purpose; precisely similar is the folly of these persons who suffer themselves to be diverted from attaining the glorious prize of heaven, by the riches, honours, or pleasures of this world, which the adversary of our souls is ever taking occasion to display before us.

Having given you these instances of persons who only seek to gain the kingdom of heaven, and who will therefore fail of the prize, I shall now lay before you the character and conduct of one who strives, and who striving will be sure to obtain. Such an one, in the first place, does not content himself with bare wishes, as he well knows that he may profess them in common with the most abandoned of mankind; for, however profligate a man may chuse to be in this world, he would certainly desire rather to be happy than miserable in the next; though he may prefer the pleasures of vice, he would clearly wish for the rewards of virtue; though he cannot prevail on himself to live the life of the righteous, he would indubitably be rejoiced to die his death. One who is in earnest then with respect to obtaining heaven, knows that to wish for it alone would be of no service to him. Another thing also, of which he is sensible, is, that to be devout by fits and starts only, will not answer his purpose; his exertions to please God (which can only be done by piety towards him, kindness towards men, and by temperance, sobriety, and chastity, in his own conduct) must be constant and unremitted; he does not then put on these virtues only at particular times, and on particular occasions, but makes them habitual to him; he renders himself so completely master of them, that they pervade, they make a part of his whole behaviour: another particular also, which he knows to be necessary, and therefore strives to attain is, not merely to be obedient to a part of God's commands, but, to them all; he knows, that though the Almighty will take up with our imperfect obedience, if our endeavours are sincere, yet that he will by no means suffer us to live in the willing breach of any one of his commands. Life and death, God and the world, are before us; we must make our choice between them; if we are resolved to indulge ourselves in any one known sin, we plainly shew that there is something which we prefer to God, and we must take the consequences of our folly. He who strives to obtain the kingdom of heaven, may, and probably will, sometimes fall, but he must not fall willingly; he must exert himself against temptation; he must recover himself as soon as possible; he must be grieved and humbled by his frailty; and he must use every effort to keep himself more steady for the time to come. The man who strives for the kingdom of heaven will, besides, never think that he is good enough; he will be still aspiring at higher degrees of perfection. Let it not be thought, by the command which is laid upon us to strive after the kingdom of heaven, that it is meant that we should pay no regard to the concerns of this world; on the contrary, God expects from us a diligent performance of our duties towards each other, as well as of our duty to him: now this cannot be done without an attention to worldly concerns. How shall a father provide for his family without applying to his particular profession, or working at his particular calling? How shall the greater part of mankind get even a subsistence, if they do not exert themselves in some kind, either of study or labour? without this, they must, generally speaking, either starve, or be a burthen upon their neighbours. How is the earth to be cultivated and its fruits produced, if it were unlawful to attend at all to worldly business, and what would become of the human race if this were neglected? Besides, the dangers of idleness are great, and it is impossible that the immediate duties of religion can take up our whole time; it is therefore as clearly a part of our duty to follow some honest method of getting a livelihood, and to follow it with diligence, as it is the first part to pray to, to praise, and to offer up our thanks to God.

But it is time for me to pass to the third thing I proposed, which is, to shew the weighty motives by which we are urged to be in the number of those that strive. To this a few words will be sufficient.

These motives are no less than the good or bad condition in which we shall be, from the time that we die, to all eternity, according as we are among this number, or are not.

The hour is coming, in the which all who are in their graves shall hear the voice of the Son of God, and shall come forth; they that have done good, that is, they who have strove to gain heaven, unto the resurrection of life, and they who have done evil, that is, they who have not strove, unto the resurrection of damnation.

Let us frequently dwell upon this magnificent and awful spectacle; let us represent to our minds the alarming trumpet of the archangel, by which we shall be awakened from our graves, and the summons which we shall receive to stand before the judgment seat of Christ: let us suppose him seated on a lofty throne, surrounded by myriads of angels, and clothed with that splendour and majesty with which he was seen by Peter, James, and John, at his transfiguration, and again by those chosen disciples, who were present at his ascension into heaven: let us think of the grand scene of all the nations of the earth gathered before him, and the tremendous decision about to take place, as to the final and everlasting condition of each individual. Let me appeal to your consciences; what hopes do they give you? I address myself to every one of you here present: Has thy conduct been such as to entitle thee to look for that transporting sentence, "Well done thou good and faithful servant, enter thou into the joy of thy Lord?" Or hast thou not reason to apprehend the sound of these words (of all that can be uttered, the most dreadful) "Depart from me, thou cursed, into everlasting fire, prepared for the devil and his angels?" If thou shrinkest with terror at this inquisition; if thou canst not bear thus to have thy conscience probed; if thou buoyest up thyself with some such consolation as this, "though my hopes are nothing now, I intend to repent and live better before I die," alas! how miserably dost thou deceive thyself! Attend to what I tell thee; almost all the wicked, who have gone before thee, comforted themselves in the same false manner, but they never thought the hour of reformation arrived; they were still for delaying it yet a little while longer, and were finally cut off with all their imperfections on their head. What gross folly is this! How soon does this world pass away, and how quickly does even the very remembrance of us perish; whereas to that which is to come there is no end! Let us think of these things; let us recollect that the kingdom of God is not to be got by seeking only; and when we remember of what infinite importance it is to us not to come short of it, let us resolve, and let us be steady to our resolutions, to be in the number of those who strive.

On Sins of Omission.

ST. MATTHEW, XXV. 30.

Cast ye the unprofitable servant into outer darkness; there shall be weeping and gnashing of teeth.

In that form of confession, which is with great propriety placed at the beginning of our church service, we not only acknowledge that we have done what we ought not to have done, but that we have left undone what we ought to have done. The guilt of a Christian is made up of omissions as well as transgressions of his duty, and perhaps the former, with men in general, may have the greater share in drawing on them God's displeasure.—It is certain that this is the case with one very large class, who are commonly distinguished by the name of good sort of people: persons of this description are guilty of no flagrant violations of the laws of God: they are, as far as complying with external forms, religious and devout, they attend regularly at church, they perhaps say their prayers morning and evening, they are neither profane nor debauched, they pay to every one their due; and yet, if this is all that can be said for them, they are very far removed from the kingdom of heaven.

The promises of the Gospel are not dealt out to negative virtue; Christianity requires from its votaries a continued series of positive acts of goodness. In vain shall we plead that we have done no harm, if we are not entitled to say that we have done good: we were not sent into the world to live in idleness, and to go out of it in the same state in which we entered into it: it is expected from us that we make ourselves better, that we lay out all the endowments of nature and of fortune to the best advantage, that we acquire habits of holiness and benevolence, which may fit us for that blessed society, to which on our so doing we may hope to be preferred.

The dangers which arise to us from omissions of our duties are by so much the greater, because in many cases they are incurred without our being sensible of them, and because in almost all they are not afterwards remembered.

If I commit a positive sin, if I swear, if I am guilty of a falsehood, if I defraud or bear false witness against my neighbour, I know what I am doing at the time, my guilt makes an impression on me, my crime assumes a body and a shape, I do not easily forget it, and consequently I may repent of it, and avoid being guilty of the like in future.

But when I am only negatively criminal, when I merely omit to perform either my public or private devotions to the Almighty, or perform them with carelessness and inattention, when I go on from day to day neglecting to improve my understanding, or to render my heart more enlarged, when I take no advantage of the many opportunities which are presented to me of being useful to my fellow-creatures, when I make no progress in the attainment of holiness, and in weaning my affections from the things of this world, my offences, having no immediate tendency to cause inconvenience to myself, or do injury to my neighbour, make no lasting impression on my mind; they are consequently repeated, not merely without regret, but frequently without notice, and are very soon entirely forgotten.

Notwithstanding this, they must certainly be accounted for:—what the world frequently calls a good sort of person, that is, one who neither does harm nor good, who is regular and decent in his conduct, and takes care to do nothing that would bring him under the lash of the law, or subject him to any violent censure from his neighbours, whose piety goes no further than ceremonials, and whose benevolence extends not beyond good wishes; such an one is represented by our Saviour under the character of the servant who hid his talent in a napkin.—This servant neither dissipated what was entrusted to him in extravagance, nor lost it by carelessness, but he neglected to improve it! he did no harm, 'tis true, but he did no good; and therefore the sentence pronounced against him was, "Cast ye the unprofitable servant into outer darkness, where shall be weeping and gnashing of teeth."

The admonitions and threats of the Gospel are chiefly directed against people of this class: the denunciations of our Saviour are more frequently pointed at the lamp which had no oil, the tree which bore no fruit, and the talent which was not improved, than at bad oil, corrupt fruits, and talents ill-employed.—On the latter, I suppose, as being more self-evident, it was not so necessary to insist. Flagrant violations of God's commandments speak for themselves; those who are guilty of them cannot but know their criminality, and the dangers which they incur; but it was an instance of our Lord's paternal care to awaken from their slothful dreams, to rouse from their imagined security, those who, resting satisfied with negative virtue, flattered themselves that they might attain heaven and happiness, so long as they did no harm.

Turn to the 25th chapter of St. Matthew, and you will see there clearly set forth throughout, on what sandy foundations all hopes of God's favour are raised on our merely not being wicked.—It begins with the parable of the wise and foolish virgins, the former of whom were admitted to the marriage feast, because they had oil in their lamps properly prepared to meet the bridegroom. and the latter excluded because they had no oil. It is not said that their oil was bad, that they were wicked virgins, but merely that they had no oil, that they were slothful and improvident, and had been slumbering in indolence during the whole time in which they ought to have been exerting themselves :—" when the door was shut, these virgins came, saying, Lord, Lord, open to us, but he answered and said, Verily I say unto you, I know you not."

The next parable, which immediately follows, is still more in point. I have already touched on it.—Our Saviour likens himself and his dealings with mankind, to a man, who departing into a distant country, delivered to his servants different sums of money to trade with ; on his return, summoning them to render up their accounts, he finds two of them had been provident and industrious, having greatly improved what had been entrusted to them, and they accordingly receive his commendations and rewards in proportion to their different merits ; but the third having made no advantage of his trust, but merely wrapt it in a napkin, meets with the severest reproofs, and is ordered to be cast into outer darkness, where shall be weeping and gnashing of teeth.

The conclusion of the chapter is a sort of application of the parable. It is the remarkable account which our Saviour gives of the day of judgment.— He represents himself as sitting upon the throne of his glory with all his holy angels around him, and dividing mankind into two bodies, the virtuous and the wicked, inviting the former to take possession of their reward, to sit down with him in his kingdom, and banishing the latter from his presence and dooming them to everlasting fire :—that however his justice may be manifest, he briefly runs over the principal merits and demerits, which will determine him in this distribution.

To the virtuous he says, " The rewards which I bestow on you, are obtained by your many kindnesses to your brethren ; when they were hungry, ye fed them ; when they were thirsty, ye gave them drink ; when they were naked, ye clothed them ; when they were strangers, ye hospitably received them ; when they were sick and in prison, ye were attentive and ministered to them in their necessities."—From this we see, that active benevolence is the merit which is attributed to those whom our Saviour receives up to his kingdom. It was not because they did not injure their fellowcreatures, but because they exercised themselves to be of service to them, that they are rewarded with bliss and immortality.

On the other hand, the wicked are condemned to everlasting torments for the omission of those very acts of benevolence, for having done which, the righteous are rewarded with eternal happiness : they are not in the sentence passed on them charged with having killed, defrauded, or in any shape oppressed their brethren, but merely with having done them no services. This alone is looked upon as sufficient to exclude them from the presence of God, and deprive them of the enjoyments of heaven.

Nor indeed could we in reason expect it to be otherwise. No human accomplishment, no human possession (to speak in general) is attained without pains and labour ; sitting still in indolence, and merely doing nothing to counteract their attainment, is not sufficient ; we must be assiduously attentive and actively industrious, if we would wish to succeed. Surely then we cannot imagine that immortality of bliss, bliss such as we can here have no conception of, is to be procured without any efforts, when it requires the greatest to attain even the paltry acquisitions of this world.

I shall conclude with beseeching you, that none of you, because ye think ye can do but little, will for that reason imagine, that it is unnecessary to do any thing. Ye read that of those to whom much is given, much will be required ; but can ye suppose that of him, to whom little is given, there will be required nothing ? Far from it. Expectations are formed of us in proportion to our endowments. He, who had only two talents, was not expected to gain five ;—yea find his reward was allotted him for gaining two, that is, for doing what his abilities permitted him. In the same manner he who had only one talent, was not expected to gain as much as his fellow-servants, who had more ; nor was he punished for not having done as much as they ; but he was punished for having done nothing, for having made no advantage at all of what was entrusted to him.

Let this truth then be deeply engraven on your remembrance, that all men have it in their power to do something for the glory of God, and for the good of their fellow-creatures; and that it is not by the doing no harm, by sitting still in indolence, and fancying that we can do nothing, but by an active exertion of our respective abilities, that we can alone deserve and obtain that transporting sentence, "Well done thou good and faithful servant, enter thou into the joy of thy Lord."

SERMON CXLII.

On the Impropriety of deserting Worldly Duties.

[Preached in Lent.]

ST. MATTHEW xiii. 23.

These ought ye to have done, and not to leave the other undone.

It has been the great aim of infidelity in all ages to persuade the credulous and unwary, that religion and present interest are incompatible; that we cannot at the same time apply ourselves to our callings here and secure our happiness hereafter, but that we must of necessity sacrifice either this world or the next. Those who have been deceived by this misrepresentation have, according to their different tempers, chosen two opposite modes of conduct, both very far, though not equally distant, from that which sound reason points out.

They on whose minds the goodness of God in their creation and redemption, and the immensity of the rewards and punishments held forth in futurity obtained that weight, which in wisdom they ought to obtain, have given up all commerce with this world whatever, have betaken themselves entirely to the exercises of piety, have fled to deserts and to cells, and in the ardour of performing their duty towards God, have entirely neglected that which is due from them to their neighbour.

They, on the contrary, whose warmer passions, or whose less enlarged understanding, chained them down to what was immediately before them, who preferred what was present and visible, to what was invisible and distant, have thought it the most agreeable, if not the most wise, to listen to the solicitations of their senses, and to seize the gratifications which were at hand; they have conducted themselves as if there were no God, no account taken of human actions, no judgment after death, no heaven, no hell, but that this present life was the whole of their existence.

Both these descriptions of men have. I observed, proceeded on a persuasion that their temporal and eternal interests were at variance; that the one or the other must of necessity be surrendered, and that there was no middle course by which they were reconcilable.

I shall in this discourse endeavour to point out the falsity and pernicious tendency of this error; I shall point out its falsity by shewing that a man may work out his salvation at the same time that he attends to his earthly concerns; and I shall expose its pernicious tendency, by proving, that to withdraw ourselves entirely from worldly business is not only unnecessary, but criminal; that religion does not only not command such a desertion, but actually forbids it.

First, then, I am to shew that a man may work out his salvation at the same time that he attends to his earthly concerns.

Those who maintain the contrary, ground probably their opinion on the following precepts of our Saviour, and other of the like import. "Take no thought for your life, what ye shall eat, or what ye shall drink; nor yet for your body, what ye shall put on." Here, say they, our Saviour seems to forbid all care, even about the necessities of life, meat, drink, and clothing; much more about the conveniences and delights of it. In the same chapter, he says, "Behold the fowls of the air: they sow not, neither do they reap, nor gather into barns, yet your heavenly Father feedeth them;" again, "Consider the lilies of the field how they grow, they toil not neither do they spin." Here it seems to be intimated that we ought to depend on the providence of God for food and raiment, and to use no more industry for obtaining them than the fowls or the lilies do. There are various other texts of this kind, all of which there are two ways of explaining, and either is sufficient to overturn the conclusion drawn from them, that worldly employments and religion are incompatible. One explanation is, that our Saviour does not mean to condemn all care whatever about the things of this life, but only that sort of care which is accompanied with anxiety and distrust; that he does not intend to decry every kind of diligence and industry with regard to our earthly concerns, but only such degrees of them as would take off, or too much withdraw, our attention from the duties of religion. The other explanation which is most probably the true one, is, that these commands were not designed to be general and standing laws, but were only addressed to, and intended for the practice of the first disciples; for it was necessary that they should always be attendant on our Saviour to be witnesses of his miracles, and hearers of his doctrines; and in those in particular who were to preach the Gospel after his resurrection, a peculiar degree of contempt of the world, and disinterestedness, was requisite; since they must of course quit their homes, give up what prospects they had of advancing their fortunes, and expose themselves to persecutions and deaths of every kind.

An entire freedom from care and concern with regard to temporal comforts was absolutely requisite in these; but that it is not so in all men, is very evident from various passages in the Gospel. When the forerunner of our Saviour, John the Baptist, was asked by the publicans and soldiers what they should do, what conduct he would prescribe to them to fit them for the coming of the Messiah; to the former he says, "Exact no more than that which is appointed you;" to the latter, "Do violence to no man, neither accuse any falsely, and be content with your wages." No mention, you see, of relinquishing their professions, which there certainly would have been had it been necessary, for John was sent for the express purpose of preparing the way for the preaching of the Gospel. Nor is the counsel of Christ himself on a similar occasion different: on his being asked by a certain lawyer what he should do to inherit eternal life? he replies unto him, "What is written in the law? how readest thou?" And the lawyer answering said, "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy strength, and with all thy mind, and thy neighbour as thyself." And Jesus said unto him, "thou hast answered right, this do, and thou shalt live." No injunction, you see, to forsake the world, or to give up his business; nor is such meaning fairly to be drawn from any other of our Lord's discourses.

His advice to the rich young man to sell all that he had, and to give to the poor, is certainly much overstrained by those who would suppose it binding on Christians in general; it was probably meant as a trial of the sincerity of the person to whom it was addressed, and certainly extends not beyond them to whom our Lord may have directly enjoined it. It seems to be intimated, indeed, though even this has been otherwise explained, that many of the first converts to Christianity parted with all that they had, laid the money at the apostles' feet, and lived together on a common stock; but it is probable that they still continued to employ themselves in their several trades and professions. Nor was there any obligation upon them to this communion of goods, as St. Peter expressly asserts in the case of Ananias and Sapphira; nay, among those, who were first called, there are several instances to the contrary, instances of opulent persons and in high civil and military employments, who neither divested themselves of their riches, nor forsook their occupations. They are charged indeed, to be ready to give, and willing to communicate, which they doubtless were; but neither did they look on themselves as bound, nor did the apostle require of them, when they adopted the character of Christians, to desert their duty as men. Christianity with respect to the civil relations of men to each other, and their secular employments, seems to have left the world entirely as she found it; she intended indeed on a faithful discharge of ~~to per-~~ sons new appellations, on their being adopted into new families; in like manner, we, on being made members of Christ's family, received a Christian name, which denotes our relationship to him; this name, therefore, is very aptly asked of us, when we are going to be questioned further as to the privileges which are conferred on us by baptism. These are said to be three:—we were made members of Christ, children of God, and inheritors of the kingdom of heaven; in other words, we are admitted into the society of Christ's disciples, we become one of that body of which he is the head, we gain a title to the mercy of God, and are put in a capacity of obtaining a blessed immortality after death.

Of the engagements which our god-fathers and god-mothers are said to enter into for us, the first promises that we should forsake all kinds of sin whatever (the world, the flesh, and the devil, being a phrase to that import;) the second, that we should believe all the articles of the Christian faith; and the third, that we should obey God's holy will; which we may in a great measure, though not perhaps entirely, learn from the commandments.—Now there is certainly nothing improper in our sponsors making these vows for us, and we are indisputably bound to observe them; and, for the same plain reason, they are so greatly for our own good; for, by the transgression or neglect of them, we shall draw on ourselves God's indignation, and be everlastingly punished in the life to come.

I am now to consider the apostles' creed, as it is called, all the articles of which my god-fathers and god-mothers promised I should believe. The first article requires my assent to this truth—that there is an Almighty God, the Father, and maker of heaven and earth; this is evident from the existence of myself and every thing around me, from the order and regularity with which the universe is conducted, and from the common consent and universal agreement of all mankind. Who makes the sun to rise and to set, the moon and the planets to perform their stated rounds, the seasons to return at regular periods, the grain, which is buried in the earth, uniformly to revive and to grow, and some mighty superintending power, which is God? We are next told, not to believe in Jesus Christ his only Son our Lord, who was conceived by the Holy Ghost, born of the Virgin Mary, suffered under Pontius Pilate, was crucified, dead and buried. Of the truth of all this, we have the clearest testimony:—about eighteen hundred years ago, a great personage, called Jesus Christ, was born of a pure virgin, among the Jews; he declared that he was sent from God, and that he was God's only Son; and he confirmed the truth of those declarations by the wisdom of his instructions, and by the many wonderful works which he performed. The Jews, through envy and malice, and fearing that the religion which he taught was to be erected on the ruin of theirs, falsely accused and crucified him, at the time Pontius Pilate was their governor, on the day which we now keep and call Good Friday; and, when they perceived that he was dead, he was taken from the cross and buried in a new sepulchre; a large stone was rolled at the mouth of it, and a guard of armed soldiers placed before it, lest his disciples should come in the night and steal him away.

The creed next asserts that—"he descended into hell."—Whatever is meant by this, I think we may be certain that it is not the place of torment which usually goes by that name; it possibly means that place where the souls of the dead reside during their separation from the body, between the times of death and judgment; but this I do not think material for us to inquire into; what follows is, indeed, important—"that he arose again the third day;" because it is as earnest that we also shall in like manner be raised from the grave, and live. That it was really himself, and not an apparition which deceived them, he clearly proved, by condescendingly permitting his disciples to handle him, and by eating and drinking as he had done before his death; he remained on earth and shewed himself to large numbers during forty days. The story of his body being stolen by his disciples (which the Jews pretended) is too improbable to gain credit with any person of sense and candour. He then, then, and was buried on the Friday, and rose again on the day which we now celebrate as Easter Sunday. "He ascended into heaven:" this he did in the sight of many of his followers, after having conversed with them, as I have just observed; during forty days, and given them a commission to preach the gospel to every creature.

He now sits at the right hand of God, the place of highest honour in heaven, where he continually presents our prayers, and makes intercession for us, and once he shall come in great pomp and majesty, surrounded by myriads of angels, to recompense according to their deeds, both the multitudes which during all the ages of the world have died, and those whom at his coming he shall find alive. The creed next calls on us to "believe in the Holy Ghost," who is the third person in the blessed Trinity, by whose inspiration the prophets spake, and the apostles did miracles; who is the author of all the good thoughts which arise in our minds, who sanctifies and makes holy all righteous persons.

But let me caution you against imagining that his divine being will take up his abode with you, without any efforts on your parts: you may indeed be sure, if you earnestly pray for his assistance, and sincerely endeavour to deserve it, that it will not be withheld from you; but then your own labours must be as strenuously exerted, as if all depended (as in fact it does) on yourselves. We next declare our belief "in the holy catholic church, and the communion of saints;" it is not perhaps very clear, now, what is precisely meant by these, but probably they may be best explained together in this manner,—we believe that the true church of Christ is made up of all sincere Christians, of what nation or sect soever, and that all such are and shall be partakers of the benefits and privileges of the Gospel.

The next article in the belief, to which we are called on to give our assent, is, "the forgiveness of sins." Before Jesus Christ came into the world, men had certainly some hope of their offences being pardoned, which arose probably from the general goodness of God, from his delay of punishment, and from the tendency in human nature to expect what we greatly wish; but this hope by no means amounted to that full assurance of pardon, which was necessary to make the consideration in any degree easy, under the sense of their sins, and to inspire them with ardour in the work of their reformation. Jesus Christ at length came preaching repentance and remission of sins; which I understand to mean, that if at any time of a man's life he is sincerely sorry that he has offended God, most heartily prays to be forgiven, and resolves steadily to be guilty no more, but to be religious and virtuous in future; and if he adheres to his resolutions, notwithstanding all his former transgressions, he will meet not only with mercy but with favour. This is a grand privilege; but let no one be tempted to abuse it; let no one sin in expectation, and, as he thinks, with intention, of amendment; of all difficult things to break through, bad habits are the most difficult. On account of his presumption, likewise, God may hereafter refuse him assistance, and then all his own endeavours will avail nothing; besides, no one can be certain that he shall live another day, and if he dies in his sins, he knows the consequence; let us not, therefore, trust to futurity, but do what we know to be so necessary immediately. Great is the salvation which is offered us; how shall we escape, if we neglect it!

Now follows our profession that we believe in "the resurrection of the body."—Of the truth of this the Scriptures expressly inform us; at the last day our bodies will be raised from the grave, at the sound of the trump of the archangel, they will be united again with our souls, and we shall live. If you ask me how it is possible that the flesh, part of which has been eaten by worms, part blown about in dust by the four winds, that of some men consumed by fire, and of others buried in the ocean; if you ask me how it is possible that all these scattered fragments and particles can be collected and joined together,—I ask you, in return, whether it be not as easy for God to do this as it was for him to form man from the dust at his first creation? To revive a dead man appears to require no greater exertion of power than originally to have made him. You may form some idea of the possibility of our being revived again, by what you experience every year:—"That which thou sowest is not quickened, except it die;" the grain you place in the earth first rots, and is afterwards enlivened, and arises clothed with a beautiful verdure. And if God so clothe the grass of the field, how much more shall he clothe your mortal bodies with a glorious immortality!—It seems probable that men will be first revived in the same bodies in which they died, but that an instant change will take place:—"This corruptible will put on incorruption, and this mortal will put on immortality:"—Christ gave a specimen of the nature of the change our bodies are to undergo, to Peter, James, and John, when he was transfigured on the mount; he appeared all glorious, his face shone like the sun, and his raiment became white as snow. Such a change will take place with respect to the righteous at the resurrection; for St. Paul tells us, that "Christ will change our vile body, that it may be fashioned like unto his glorious body." You will observe, that when this glorious change in the bodies of men at the resurrection is spoken of, it can only be meant of the bodies of the virtuous, although it be mentioned in general terms, St. Paul being desirous of taking for granted, that all those to whom he writes would be in that number. The bodies of the wicked will certainly be raised at the same time, but whether they will undergo any change, is uncertain; but it seems probable, that as many of the crimes of the wicked have arisen from their bodies, that they shall, together with their souls, share in the eternity of punishment which has been denounced.

The last article in the creed is our profession of belief, in "the life everlasting."—Life is often put in Scripture for happiness, and it is possible may mean so here. I believe, that if I am pious and virtuous in this world, I shall be for ever happy in the next; or probably it may have a more extensive signification, that of existence, and may mean, not only the everlasting bliss of the righteous, but the everlasting misery of the wicked: in either case our belief is supported by Scripture, which assures, in various places, that as the religious and good man shall be eternally happy in the presence of God, so the profane and immoral man shall for the same endless time, undergo the most terrible disgrace and torment. Such are the great truths to which we are called on to give our assent; it is, however, to little purpose that we obey the call, unless we join to a sound faith, a good life and conversation: what this chiefly consists in we may learn from the commandments, to which I should now pass; but this I must defer to future opportunity.

Train up a child in the way he should go, and when he is old he will not depart from it.

IN the former part of the 19th chapter of Exodus, are related the orders which the children of Israel received to attend the Lord upon Mount Sinai, and the solemn preparations which they were directed to make for that awful meeting. After that the historian proceeds in this manner:—"And it came to pass on the third day (the day appointed for God's descent) in the morning, that there were thunders and lightnings, and thick clouds upon the Mount, and the voice of the trumpet exceeding loud, so that all the people that was in the camp trembled. And Moses brought forth the people out of the camp to meet with God, and they stood at the bottom of the Mount. And Mount Sinai was altogether in a smoke, because the Lord descended upon it in fire, and the smoke thereof ascended as the smoke of a furnace; and the whole Mount quaked greatly. And when the voice of the trumpet sounded long, and waxed louder and louder, Moses spake, and God answered him by a voice."—Moses then receives orders to charge the people not to presume to ascend the Mount: and after that, God delivered the ten commandments, as we find them in the 20th chapter. You observe that this delivery was originally made to the people of Israel, and undoubtedly the ten commandments were chiefly intended for their use. "I am the Lord thy God (says the Almighty) which have brought thee out of the land of Egypt, out of the house of slavery." This is applicable to them only, and relates to their miraculous escape from the oppression of Pharaoh.— But when we consider the prodigious solemnity with which these ten commandments were uttered by God's own mouth, and that they were afterwards written with his own finger; and when we reflect, besides, on their intrinsic excellency, that they contain in them the great heads of duty both towards God and man; and when we observe the veneration which Christians of all ages have paid to them, we cannot but perceive that they are deserving of all our attention, respect, and obedience.

The first commandment is directed against those numerous objects of worship, to which the nations, who lived in and round about the country which the Jews were going to inhabit, paid their ignorant and wicked adorations; the sun, the moon, the stars, stocks, stones, animals, and deceased men, they either joined with the Supreme Being, or worshipped instead of him. To keep the people of Israel from this absurdity and wickedness, God says to them, "Thou shalt have none other gods but me."— I allow neither of substitute nor partner, to me only shall you offer up your prayers, praises, and adorations. We Christians are, I hope, in no danger of offending against this law, in the same manner as the nations above mentioned, but we may break it in other instances, and incur no small portion of guilt for so doing. We may, and alas! too many of us do, give a preference to the pleasures, honours, riches of this world, above God: now when we do this they are to us in the place of gods; it is them which we love with all our hearts, with all our mind, with all our soul, and with all our strength; it is them which we worship; it is in them that we trust; and too often it is them which we truly serve all the days of our life. Now, when this is the case, we certainly violate the first commandment; those who dedicate their whole time, and set their whole affections either on worldly honours or pleasures, are (as the apostle expressly tells us, with respect to the covetous) idolaters. "Thou shalt have none other Gods but me." The precept is delivered in negative terms, but it has a positive meaning; we are not only required by it not to worship what is not God, but we are required heartily to worship what is God.

As Protestants we are, I trust, in little danger of infringing the prohibition contained in the second commandment; but there is one sect of Christians, the Roman Catholics, who appear to infringe it grievously; they certainly make to themselves images, and bow down before them. Some parts, however, of this commandment deserve our notice: God says—"I am a jealous God;" i. e. 'I am very tender of my honour; I bear neither partner nor competitor in those duties which properly belong to me.' This jealousy does not only imply a strong dislike, but a fierce displeasure against the breakers of this law: what reason, then, is there to guard against it? "Who can stand in God's sight when he is angry?" Who can support the effects of his displeasure?

The conclusion of this commandment is remarkable: God represents himself as "visiting the sins of the fathers upon the children unto the third and fourth generation of them that hate him, and shewing mercy unto thousands in them that love him and keep his commandments." Men have usually a great affection for their posterity, and a great anxiety about them, and therefore, the more to deter them from gross sins, God affirms here that he will not confine his rewards and punishments to the good man or sinner himself, but extend them likewise to his descendants. This seems particular, perhaps, and almost unaccountable, but yet in fact it is what is constantly happening. Do we not every day see children, and even children's children, enjoying the rewards of their ancestors' prudence and virtue, and suffering grievously in consequence of their ancestors' crimes? This, indeed, is against the course of nature; but remember, against the course of nature is not of impurity—

tion of God. Observe, however, the difference between God's proceeding in the way of severity and in the way of favour! He only threatens to visit the iniquities of disobedient parents on the third and fourth generation of their children, but sheweth mercy unto a thousand descents of the posterity of them who love and obey him.

The third commandment forbids us to take God's name in vain; that is, never to mention it but on serious occasions:—"The Lord will not hold him guiltless that taketh his name in vain;"—a strong expression, which implies, that he will look on him as exceedingly guilty. This commandment certainly extends to all kinds of swearing and cursing whatever. And here I must express my wonder that there are so many men, who incur such great portions of guilt on such slight temptations! When the robber tells you he was induced to take away his neighbour's goods, to furnish him-self with the necessities or luxuries of life,—when the drunkard alleges, in excuse for his failing, the delight which he finds in intemperance and jollity,—though their wickedness is great, we are able to form an idea of the motive which incites them to it; but what can we assign as a motive to the common swearer? He cannot hope to make himself richer by swearing, nor wiser, nor more esteemed; it will gratify none of his appetites or passions: there is no wit in it, nor is there any invention; for the most stupid may arrive at the same degree of perfection in it as the most ingenious. It is shocking to every pious ear, and disgusting to every liberal mind: and though they who practise it are guilty of dreadful wickedness, I know no one end that it can possibly answer to them. The pretence that what they say is more attended to on this account, is too ridiculous to deserve a serious reply; besides, if it were true, I beg you to reflect, whether such attention would be worth purchasing at the expense of your eternal salvation.

The fourth commandment enjoins the happy observance of the Sabbath; all kinds of labour were prohibited to the Jews on of existence. We are not so strictly bound, everlasting We may attend, as occasion demands of absolute necessity: let us, abuse this Christian li-

erty, by carrying it too far; let the hours of divine service in particular be esteemed sacred; and let us, from charity and humanity, as well as reverence to God's laws, grant every reasonable and possible remission from their labours to those who depend upon us. The poorer part of mankind, forced to incessant and uninterrupted toil, to procure themselves the necessities of life, have little time, during six days in the week, for the consideration of religious subjects; and if they perform their morning and their evening sacrifice of prayer and thanksgiving, it is all, perhaps, which they are able to do; but on Sunday, if they be not prevented by hard or inconsiderate masters, they have opportunity as well as leisure to think of another world; to assemble themselves together with their brethren to worship their God, and to be instructed in their duty, and reminded of a day of judgment and a world to come. Permit me to call on those who have dependants under them, to do all in their power to render this excellent institution, of the Sabbath effective and useful; not only to free as much as possible, from their usual employments, those who live under the same roof with them, but to make those arrangements and settlements, with all who depend upon them, before the Lord's Day, which, when they are delayed till then, are gladly seized by the idle as an excuse for not attending public worship; while they are sincerely lamented by the well-disposed, as the real cause of their absence. The accounts of the poor are soon settled, the recompence of their labours for the week past is not long in adjusting. Let not then vexatiously be delayed; nor occupy with earthly cares those hours which ought to be solely devoted to God. Consider the inestimable importance, to the poor, of Sunday well-employed; consider that the certain consequence of their time being taken up, on that day, with earthly cares, must be total irreligion. Reflect how shocked you will be, and how heavy will be your account, if any of your dependants should plead at the last audit—"But for my master's inconsideration I should have been regular at church, should have worshipped my God, and have learnt and practised my duty!" An emblem on the Lord's Day, to serve the Almighty, together with his brethren, is no light part of a Christian's duty, or which he is in any degree at liberty to omit. Too many bad people, I confess, do come to church; but let it be remembered, at the same time, that none of the good stay away.

I shall in my next discourse proceed to the commandments of the second table, which contains the heads of our duty towards our neighbour.

SERMON CXLV.

By GEORGE HAGGITT, A.M.

Rector of Beechamwell, Norfolk.

On the Catechism.

PROV. XXII. 6.

Train up a child in the way he should go, and when he is old he will not depart from it.

IN my explanation of the catechism I have already gone through with the commandments of the first table; I now proceed to consider those of the second. These open with the injunction to honour our father and mother; and surely, in the regulation of our conduct towards each other, no precept could with greater propriety take the lead: after that entire and boundless obedience due from all to God, the next degree of respect and reverence is due from children to their parents.

For this you have the divine express command, with the promise of a reward annexed to it,—“Thy days shall be long in the land which the Lord thy God giveth thee.” This indeed chiefly respected the Jews, and might either hold forth length of days as a reward to the dutiful, individually; or might promise the long possession of the land of Canaan to the whole nation, if this precept were observed in general: but there is no reason to doubt but that Christians also, who conscientiously honour their parents, may reasonably look for a temporal recompence to their obedience. In the first place, St. Paul, in writing to the Ephesians, setting before them this commandment, insists on the promise annexed to it; and secondly, dutiful children are, according to the common course of things, likely to prosper and do well in the world. The whole of life is apt to take its colour from the employment of our youth, and that employment of it, which is most agreeable to our parents, is commonly the most to our own advantage.—I need not mention motives of gratitude, they are too obvious; he who is ill-behaved and cruel to the authors of his being, the fosterers of his childhood, to whom will he be kind? he who is negligent of this first and great duty, of what other can we expect that he will be mindful?

The sixth commandment forbids murder. The atrociousness of this crime is so great, and it is so certainly followed by the punishment of death from the laws of our country, that there is no necessity to dwell on it. The remonstrances or warnings of the preacher can have little effect on him who can harbour in his breast any idea of it; let us, however, devoutly pray against, and carefully avoid, those unruly passions, envy, hatred, and malice, and all kinds of uncharitableness, which are the usual steps that lead to it.

Adultery is prohibited by the seventh commandment. By many civilized nations this crime was punished with death, and even by the divine law which was given to the Jews, and that to both the parties concerned in it, and surely very deservedly; for there is no offence by which the order of society is more disturbed, none by which the peace of individuals is more cruelly wounded. On the side of the married person there is perjury added to impurity, and in every case there is the greatest immorality and the basest selfishness. What can shew a more total want of generosity than, for a transient satisfaction to ourselves, to destroy the peace of a fellow-creature—perhaps of a friend—for his whole life! The punishment among us is not now so great, at least not by the law; but let us not be deceived; the guilt is still the same, and the penalty is only delayed to be exacted with greater severity by the hand of God. I must just observe that this commandment has been judged to comprise every deviation from chastity whatever; nor is the Christian law, which threatens adultery, less severe against every other species of impurity—

"Whoremongers and adulterers God will judge."

In the eighth commandment, the prohibition of all kinds of injustice, by which the property of another is invaded, is comprised; not only he who robs me openly on the highway, or who breaks into my dwelling and bears off my goods, but he who, in any other less notorious and observable manner defrauds me, is guilty of disobeying this precept against stealing.—The great man, who avails himself of superior power to deprive me of my right, and sets me at defiance, because I have not the means of applying to the law for protection; the worldly wise man, who takes advantage of superior cunning to over-reach me in our bargains; and the tradesman, who makes improper profits, either by adulterating the commodity in which he deals, by a deficiency in the weights and measures, or by any other manner of injustice, are all of them no less guilty of a breach of the eighth commandment, than the highwayman or the house-breaker.

When understood in this extensive manner, which it certainly ought to be, it is to be feared that there are too many who would be shocked at the name of stealing, who are too intimate with the offence.

As the sixth commandment aims to guard our life, and the eighth our property, the ninth is intended for the preservation of our characters—"Thou shalt not bear false witness against thy neighbour."—The most heinous violation of this precept is that of those infamous persons who, in a court of justice, and with the solemnity of an oath, assert what they know to be untrue, against an innocent man, and bring perhaps his life, perhaps his property, but certainly his good name into danger. This is a crime of so deep a dye, that I trust there is no need to warn any of my present audience against it: the commandment is, however, too often transgressed, even in the best regulated societies, in less eminent degrees;—and such transgressions are the source of very much of the unhappiness of social life.

Next to his guilt, who swears publicly to my prejudice what he knows to be false, is that of him who affirms the same falsity in private, with a design to traduce my reputation. It is something, that the forms of justice are wanting—it is something, that Almighty God's not immediately affronted by solemn appeal;—but, in every other respect, the injury to the party defamed is often as great, and the stroke as wounding, as that which is given by the hand of the executioner. There are many other ways of infringing this commandment, where the degree of criminality, though still inferior, is yet great; as when we speak ill of others on suspicion only—on slight grounds—or on vague report—or when we do it unnecessarily—or take a pleasure in it—or do not speak in their defence, when we hear them unjustly or maliciously attacked. It is, besides, ungenerous and unjust—ungenerous to sport with the characters of our fellow-creatures, on which their reception in the world, and sometimes their bread, depends—unjust, because it is not doing unto them as we would wish they should do unto us.

The laws of the last table conclude with "Thou shalt not covet."—The actual invasion of the property of another, having been already prohibited,—the mere desire to possess it, is now forbidden; and we should set ourselves assiduously to obey it, whether we consider our own happiness, our duty towards our neighbour, or towards God.

For, first, the contrary temper to what is here enjoined, makes a man miserable; as, if he once gives free scope to his desires, he is never likely to be satisfied; success will but add fuel to the flame—the more objects of his wishes he gains, the more ardent he will still be in pursuing others—and content will be, for ever a stranger to his breast.

Secondly, it is an unjust temper, probably in itself, since we are not far from hating the man whom we envy, and for whose possessions we greatly long—and almost certainly in its effects, for he will not, when a convenient opportunity offers—long scrupulously restrain his hands from the property of another, in the hope of possessing which he permits his heart to riot uncontrolled.

Lastly, it is an irreligious temper, since it implies a discontent with God's dispensations towards us; and, as it usually en-the whole heart and affections, it shes all thoughts of piety and another world.

Such are the celebrated laws of the two tables—laws which, I have before observed, were spoken by God's mouth, and written with his finger—you perceive how excellent they are in themselves, and how proper for man to obey.—Let us, then, devoutly offer up our prayers, that they may all be deeply engraven on the fleshy tablets of our hearts!

On the Catechism.

LUKE XI. 1.

One of his disciples said unto him, Lord, teach us to pray.

IN my last discourse on the catechism. I concluded my explanation of the ten commandments. From these we are informed that we learn our duty towards God, and our duty towards our neighbour; and, in the answers to the two following questions, these duties are set down at large: but I have already, in my remarks on the commandments, anticipated the chief of what I could say on them; and as to those points on which I have not spoken, they are expressed in the catechism itself, in so clear a manner, that there is no necessity for me to dwell on them.

To understand, and to obey the commandments, should be the study and the endeavour of our whole lives; but our own exertions will not do alone; if God does not grant his assistance to them, however strenuous they may be, they will be vain:—to obtain, therefore, this assistance, it is our duty, at all times, to call for it by attentive and fervent prayer. I proceed, then, to take into consideration that most perfect form which was composed by our Lord, at the request of his disciples, and is called by his name—the Lord's Prayer. Of all the general forms of address to the Supreme Being, which are extant, it is undoubtedly at the same time the most rational and the most devout; so that (as it has been well said*) whether we have an eye to the preaching or the praying of our Redeemer, the observation is equally just—"That never man spake like this man."

The Lord's Prayer contains six distinct petitions, besides the address at the beginning, and what is called the doxology, at the conclusion. The address is concise, but replete with meaning—"Our Father which art in heaven." It is observable, that we are not directed to say my father, but our Father, which seems designed to remind us, first, of the vast authority and dominion of God, extending over all mankind—and, secondly, of the relationship which we bear to each other, he being the common parent of us all—and, consequently, of the obligation under which we lie, to cultivate and entertain an universal affection and good will.

The application of Father, of which we are permitted to make use, reminds us of our being allied to him in many respects—by nature, for he created us, and that after his own image—by providence, for he constantly preserves and protects us—by grace, for he renews us again, according to his image, after that, by Adam's fall, and our own manifold iniquities, we have detached and destroyed the resemblance—every way he is our Creator and Father. There is something, likewise, attractive and winning in the title—God, or Lord, imply such perfection, and such super eminent authority, that, conscious as we must be of our meanness and unworthiness, we might be discouraged in our approaches to him; but the name of Father supports and emboldens. What earthly parent is there who does not love and desire all manner of good for his offspring? "And if men, being evil, do give good gifts unto their children, how much more will our Father who is in heaven, give good things to them that ask him?" "Who art in heaven." God is substantially present every where alike; but he does not every where equally discover himself, nor does he display every where, with equal splendour, the beams of his glorious majesty. The Scripture frequently mentions a place of his special residence; here is his royal court, here his imperial throne, and here he is attended upon by saints and angels. This place is called Heaven, and sometimes the highest heavens, and by his presence here God is described, both to distinguish him from other earthly parents, and to increase our reverence towards him, when we bring to mind his super-eminent glory and majesty.

The first petition is "Hallowed or sanctified be thy name." God's name means himself, and when we pray that it may be hallowed or sanctified, we mean to ask that all mankind may make a distinction, observe a distance between God and other things, and that they may give to him the most decided and rivalled preference: we mean to request of the Almighty to this effect—"Mayest thou every where be had in the highest veneration! May all honour, praise, and service be rendered unto thee by men, and by us, who are now addressing thee in particular!"

"Thy kingdom come," is the second petition. 'This would be more justly and intelligibly translated, if it were—'Thy reign come.' The profession of pure Christianity is in the Scriptures constantly called the reign of God. The petition here used seems more immediately to respect the state of things at the time when Christ taught this prayer to his disciples: they were instructed here to desire, that the Gospel might be speedily and effectually extended all over the earth; then in figurative language would commence the reign of God!

There is but too much reason, however, for us at this day to continue the petition, when we recollect that a very large part of the world is not yet converted to Christianity, and that, even of those who do call themselves Christians, too many are such only in name, and that men in general are far, very far distant from the purity which the Gospel enjoins. The complete reign of God implies that the whole globe should be Christians, and such Christians as our Master commands. 'This is a state of things which possibly may never entirely arrive; but we ought to pray, and hope that we are continually making nearer approaches to it. Such prayers, I am sure, are our duty, and I think there are grounds for such hopes.

"Thy will be done on earth as it is in heaven," is the third petition. Every decree of the Almighty is unquestionably received with the utmost complacency and the most entire satisfaction, by those pious and loyal spirits who surround his throne, and they are certainly ever prompt and eager to show the most perfect obedience to his commands: such complacency and satisfaction in all events, and such obedience to all the divine commands, we in this petition desire may be exhibited by mankind. May we as fully acquiesce in all thou doest, and as exactly obey all thou enjoinest, as the blessed angels!

The fourth petition is—"Give us this day our daily bread." This is well paraphrased in the catechism itself:—"I pray unto God that he will send us all things that be needful both for our souls and bodies." Two explanations are given of this petition; it probably comprises both; either the bread of the time to come, that is, the happiness of futurity, or our maintenance in this present life. The first respects our souls, and the latter our bodies. Observe the modesty of the petition as relating to earthly things, and be careful in all your other prayers to conform to it. It asks not for riches, elegance, splendour, but for bread; and though under the term bread is, doubtless, comprehended all necessities, yet they are clearly necessities alone, not superfluities. Nor do we ask even for necessities, to make us so far beforehand that we should be independent of God; but, we say, "Give us this day our daily bread;" grant us what may suffice for our present support; for the rest we trust cheerfully to thy providence; we cast all our care upon thee, in full knowledge and confidence that thou carest for us.

"Forgive us our trespasses as we forgive them that trespass against us," is the fifth petition. The first step towards obtaining forgiveness of our sins, is to be sensible of them, and to confess them. "If we say that we have no sin, we de-ourselves, and the truth is not in us; if we confess our sins, God is faithful and just to forgive us our sins, and to cleanse us from all unrighteousness." Now this petition implies confession, in as much as by the very asking of forgiveness of sins, we own that we have been sinners: we, however, annex a condition on which we apply for this forgiveness, which is, that we ourselves pardon those who have in any way offended against us. Let us then be very careful, when we approach the throne of mercy, to bear no malice or hatred in our hearts, to wish no ill to any of our fellow-creatures, however they may have provoked us, but to be ready on any opportunity to do them all service. "If you forgive to men their trespasses (says our Saviour) your heavenly Father will also forgive you." The reverse is likewise true.

"Lead us not into temptation, but deliver us from evil," is the last petition: for I think, though it consists of two clauses, it may be considered as one petition. I have seen these words changed for others, which are in my opinion more agreeable to the sense of the original language. "Abandon us not to temptation, but preserve us from evil." The phrase, "lead us not into temptation," seems to imply, that we believe God to be the author of it, which he certainly never is of the sort of temptation here intended: whereas, "abandon us not, nor permit us to go into temptation," steers clear of this seeming impropriety. The word, which is translated deliver, means more than that—it means preserve, by which may be understood, not merely "free us from the evils into which we have fallen, but prevent us from falling into any evils at all." Temptation is of two kinds; one is sent to give the virtuous an opportunity of displaying their good qualities: such was that of Abraham, when he was commanded to offer up his son; such were those into which the early Christians fell, when they were so severely persecuted; and such are those which good men now experience, when they meet with vexations and afflictions, and pass victoriously through them. The other sort of temptations are those occasions of sin, which but too often occur, that are by their own violence, and the weakness of those to whose lot they fall, insurmountable. It is obvious that they are these latter against which we pray, as these only are prejudicial to us, the former tending to the glory of God and the good of our own souls. "Preserve us from evil:"—that greatest of all evils, Sin, and the consequences of sin, the anger of God, are here principally intended: but yet, in an inferior degree, it is certainly allowable to have in our eye a preservation from temporal evils; but this must be accompanied with the filial submission of our blessed Saviour to the disposal of the Almighty—"Nevertheless, not my will but thine be done."

The concluding clause of the Lord's Prayer is called the Doxology, the meaning of which is, a form of ascribing glory to God:—"For thine is the kingdom, the power and the glory, for ever and ever. Amen." "Thou hast a perpetual and immoveable authority, by which at all times thou directest and governest all things, wherefore we profess to rely on thee alone, and have a full confidence in thee in all our wants; thine is the glory; all honour and reverence, all love and thankfulness, are due unto thee, as in the beginning, so at this present time, and will be to all eternity."

Having thus gone through with each article of the Lord's Prayer separately, I shall conclude with taking a more connected view of it, by presenting you with it in a short paraphrase.

O thou, the great creator and preserver of me and all the rest of the universe, who art enthroned in majesty above all height, and dwellest in light which no eye can approach; mayest thou be honoured by all thy innumerable creatures, as thy unspeakable greatness requires! may their minds be impressed with just sentiments of thy wisdom, goodness, and omnipotence!

"Thy kingdom come." Oh! hasten the period when the religion which thou hast graciously revealed to us by thine only begotten Son, may be professed all over the world in its original purity, and may obtain such an influence over the hearts and lives of all its votaries, that thy will may be submitted to and performed on earth as it is in heaven! that we, as far as the weakness of humanity will allow, may as exactly be guided by thy good pleasure as the blessed angels!

"Give us this day our daily bread."

During our passage through this transitory state, do thou, who gave us life, give us the means of supporting it; we pray not for superfluities to consume on our own lusts, nor do we too anxiously look forward into futurity; we will be satisfied with a moderate present provision, nor have we the foolish desire to be independent of thee.

"Forgive us our trespasses, as we forgive them that trespass against us." Remember that we are but dust, and, on our sorrow and amendment, pardon us all in which we have offended; be not extreme to mark what we have done amiss. And as thou hast justly made it a condition of obtaining mercy from thee, that we shew mercy to our brethren, afford us thy assistance to conquer any imperfections in our temper; subdue in us all tendency towards malice and resentment; and grant that our benevolence may be universal, and without exception!

"Lead us not into temptation, but deliver us from evil." Permit us not to fall a sacrifice to the snares of the world, the allurements of the flesh, or the artifices of the devil: let us not be tempted above what we are able to bear: in every age, in every station, in every change of circumstances, surround us with the shield of thy all-powerful protection! In prosperity, and in distress, in health, and in sickness, let thy holy spirit guard us from the approach of spiritual evil; and when we arrive at the closing scene of our earthly pilgrimage, still be thou near to aid and support us; suffer us not at our last hour, for any pains of death, to fall from thee; nor let thy care of us conclude with this mortal life, but in the day of judgment also, of thy great mercy, good Lord deliver us! Save us from the bitter pains of eternal death, and receive us into the happy mansions of saints and angels. These petitions we humbly offer to the throne of thy grace, in full confidence both of thy mercy and omnipotence: thou who spaké and it was done, commanded and it was made fast, all that we can ask or want, thou canst abundantly confer on us; boundless and uncontrollable is thy power, and dominion, and to thy glory and kingdom there is no end!

On the Catechism.

ST. JOHN, xiii. 35.

By this shall all men know that ye are my disciples.

I AM now arrived at my concluding discourse on the catechism; it will be taken up with explaining the two sacraments; those peculiar rites of the Christian religion, ordained by Christ himself, as the distinguishing marks by which his disciples were to be known. In doing this, I shall observe the method of the catechism itself, and, first, explain the nature and meaning of a sacrament in general; secondly, I shall consider the sacrament of baptism; and thirdly, that of the Lord's supper.

"How many sacraments hath Christ ordained in his church?" In the answer to this first question, we are told that there are "two sacraments only, as generally necessary to salvation." The number is mentioned, because in the church of Rome they observe several others, for which we Protestants affirm there is no foundation in the Scriptures. The word 'generally' is inserted from a charitable motive; it means, that though, for the most part, the observance of these sacraments can only insure to us salvation, yet in cases, where from ignorance or want of opportunity, they have been neglected, that God may pass over and pardon the omission.

We are next told, that the meaning of the word sacrament is "an outward and visible sign of an inward and spiritual grace, given unto us, ordained by Christ himself, as a means whereby we receive the same, and a pledge to assure us thereof." That is, a sacrament is made up of an outward part and an inward part, something which is visible to us, something which is invisible; the former is some action in which we partake, which is a sign, token, or representation of the latter; this latter is some grace or favour from heaven; and the outward action in which we partake, is a means of acquiring this grace or favour, and a pledge to assure us that we shall acquire it. Now consider this explanation of a sacrament in general, with respect to the sacraments of baptism and the Lord's supper. In baptism, water is the outward sign; the purification of our hearts, the inward grace; do you perceive the resemblance? as your bodies are made clean by water, so baptism, by which you are made Christians, cleanses and purifies your minds. It was also ordained by Christ himself; you remember his command to his apostles, just before his ascension into heaven:—"Go ye into the world, and preach the Gospel to every creature, baptising them in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost." In all covenants, you know, there are conditions made by each party; the Gospel is a gracious covenant between God and man: on our part, the conditions are faith and obedience; on God's part, forgiveness of sins, and eternal life. Now by the sacrament of baptism, we become entitled to these benefits, and it is a seal or pledge of God's, that if we observe the conditions promised by ourselves, or our sureties, he will not fail to bestow them on us.

Let us now try the above explanation of a sacrament, with respect to the Lord's supper. Here the outward visible sign is, bread and wine; the inward spiritual grace, the strengthening and refreshing of our souls. As bread and wine nourish and support the body, so the celebration of the sufferings and death of Christ does, or ought to, excite in us a quick sense of gratitude for what he has done for us; to animate us to a closer attachment to Him; to create in us a stronger abhorrence of sin, and affection for virtue; and by this means to nourish and support our souls. It was likewise ordained by Christ himself: this done immediately before his death, in the presence of all the apostles; he himself partook of it with them, and left it as his dying request and command, that they should continue to observe this rite in remembrance of him. It is likewise a means whereby we appropriate to ourselves the benefits of our Redeemer's death: he has thought fit to appoint such means, and, I confess, I do not see how any Christian can reasonably expect, whilst he neglects them, to attain the glorious end. As to its being a pledge to assure us of God's mercy, consider what it represents:—the body of Christ, which was broken, and the blood of Christ, which was poured out, to make atonement for our iniquities; to procure for us the pardon of our sins. What may we not expect when we are calling to mind such an amazing instance of good-will to men, as this? May we not be certain, that he who withheld not from us his only Son, will, with him, bestow on us all manner of good gifts? Thus, you see, baptism and the Lord's supper exactly answer to the description of a sacrament; they both contain outward and visible signs; water in the one; bread and wine in the other: these signs also represent inward spiritual graces; water represents purification from sin; and bread and wine, an increase and stability in virtue: they were likewise ordained by Christ, and are means of obtaining, and pledges that we shall obtain certain graces and benefits.

We will now consider what farther is said in the catechism, with respect to each of them.

Of those who are baptized, we are told, there is required, "Repentance, whereby they forsake sin; and faith, whereby they stedfastly believe the promises of God made to them in that sacrament." The primitive church was extremely strict in this particular. Before Christianity was established, when persons grown to manhood offered themselves to baptism, no one was admitted till he could give proof of his sorrow for his past evil life, and till he could offer reasons for his faith in Christ; and it was afterwards expected, that he should shew his sincerity by his future virtuous and pious behaviour. But if this were the custom, and if faith and repentance are really necessary, it is a very natural question which follows, "Why then are infants baptized, when by reason of their tender age they can give proof of neither?" The answer is satisfactory; their godfathers and godmothers promise both for them, and when they come to years of discretion, they themselves are bound to perform them; and for this plain reason, because the engagements, which have been made in their names, are so greatly for their good. And we accordingly find, that the custom universally prevails of taking on ourselves, at our confirmation, those vows which were made by our sureties at our baptism.

It now remains that I consider the Lord's supper. There is a difficulty in the catechism, with respect to this, which should not be passed over: we are told that the body and blood of Christ are "verily and indeed taken, and received by the faithful." This expression sounds like the doctrine of the Papists: that the words which are said over the bread and wine by the priest, convert them into the real body and blood of Christ! but this certainly is not the sentiment of our church; by being verily and indeed taken, we may, and ought to understand only, that the benefits of our Redeemer's death are truly received by the faithful believer and worthy communicant alone. Of these benefits I have already spoken, and indeed they are so plainly expressed in the catechism, that it is unnecessary to dwell on them; the 'strengthening and refreshing of our souls by the body and blood of Christ, as our bodies are by the bread and wine.' The subject is closed with a description of the requisites for the worthy partaking of this sacrament, which are said to be "Examination of ourselves, whether we truly repent of our former sins; a stedfast purpose to lead a new life; a lively faith in God's mercy through Christ; a thankful remembrance of his death; and a charitable, benevolent disposition towards all men."

Now these are but the ordinary duties of a Christian; and though perhaps no man performs them in the perfect manner in which he ought, yet, without aiming at the performance of them, he is equally unfit for any other religious duty, as he is for receiving the sacrament; and if he resolves not to try to make himself more fit, he might as well cast off all religion whatever. The subject is of the utmost importance; I must be excused if, in dwelling on it a little, I repeat frequently the same arguments. Unhappy errors prevail to too great a degree with respect to this ceremony, to the very great prejudice of religion, and danger even of many well-disposed persons. Mankind were in a fallen state, overwhelmed with ignorance and wickedness, when Jesus Christ came down from heaven to teach and to save them. His whole life was passed in the former of these employments, and he willingly encountered a most painful and ignominious death to compass the latter. It was just before he died, that he appointed to be observed, in perpetual remembrance of him, this participation of bread and wine; 'This bread (says he) represents my body; this wine represents my blood; When you eat and drink them, think of what I have undergone for you, and of the great advantages which you have gained by it? "Do this in remembrance of me." Now there is nothing mysterious in this; nothing more than what all may understand: you are required to do a plain act, to shew your gratitude for the greatest instance of benevolence that ever was: do you, or do you not, believe that Christ died for us, and left us this command? If you do not, there's an end of the matter; but if you do, how can you stand excused in your own eyes for refusing to comply with his so earnest request? You will not tell me it is too much trouble! what! to pass one hour in celebrating the goodness of that friend and Saviour, who spent all the hours of his life, and lastly, sacrificed his life itself, in your service!

Besides, it is my duty to tell you, that there is much reason to fear, that to those who wilfully shut their eyes against what they ought to do in this particular, and absent themselves altogether from the Lord's table, all which he has done and suffered, will have been in vain.

* Arguments and persuasions to frequent communion were enforced by the author from the pulpit, in many sermons: these, in his lifetime, he took occasion to throw together into a small pamphlet, which he published under the title of "A Familiar Treatise on the Sacrament,"—And it is for this reason that the 'repeated arguments,' to which allusion is made above, are not reprinted in this work, as the writer himself had given them to the world in another form.

But you are afraid, perhaps, you will say; the threats of St. Paul, which are again repeated in the communion service, terrify and alarm you; you cannot flatter yourselves that you shall be worthy partakers of the Lord's supper; and you therefore think it safer wholly to abstain from it! You are then resolved still to continue in your sins; you are determined not to examine yourselves and repent; not to have hope in Christ, nor to be in charity with your brethren;—for unless this be the case, if you have but a desire to turn to God, and a wish to be in charity with your neighbour, with a firm purpose to endeavour both, you may with the greatest safety draw near unto the Lord's table. The threats of St. Paul are principally directed against those to whom he writes, the Corinthians, on account of some irregularities, of which they had been guilty in celebrating this sacrament: as we celebrate it in a different manner, the same irregularities are not now practicable; therefore the apostle's threats scarce seem applicable to the Christians of these days; and even to the Corinthians, the punishment denounced is not so great as we may suppose it. There is one word, which has been too strongly translated in our Testament; in the original, the sense of the word evidently is not “damnation,” but “condemnation.”—“For he who eateth and drinketh unworthily, eateth and drinketh condemnation to himself;”—and the word does not mean eternal, but temporal condemnation; does not mean punishment in the next, but correction in order to amendment in this world: the very next verse explains it,—“For this cause many among you are weak, and sickly, and some sleep.” Now this certainly can only relate to punishment in this life.

Not that I would be understood, that you should approach the altar with no preparation whatever, with no purposes at all of repentance and amendment; indeed, I think that is scarcely possible, but I would not have you think every little defect a sufficient reason to keep you away; I would persuade you to do what you can; and it may be, nay it will be, if you persevere, that you will acquire new grace and strength; you will grow in holiness and virtue: what you now look upon with terror, will become your delight; and finally, having finished your earthly course, you shall, from partaking of the table of your Lord here on earth, be advanced to the enjoyment of his blessed society, in the mansions of his Father.

SERMON CXLVIII.

JOHN NARLETON, D.D.

Chancellor of the Diocese, and Canon Residentiary of the Cathedral Church of Hereford.

On setting God before us.

PSALM xvi. 9.

I have set God always before me.

THE several duties of man, as a reasonable creature, are conveniently stated under three heads. The first, to revere the Creator, and to obey his will. The second, to love his fellow-creatures, and to advance their welfare. The third, to use rightly the faculties of his nature, his understanding, his affections, and his senses. In the discharge of these obligations, he is bound to follow the best conclusions of his reason, assisted by such revelation, or supernatural instruction, as it hath pleased God to give him.

In the revelation delivered to mankind by Jesus Christ and his apostles, these general duties are clearly exhibited to our view. They are laid before us in their several parts and subdivisions. They are recommended to us by the most prevailing arguments; by an appeal to our natural sentiments; by an explicit declaration of the Will of God; by a solemn denunciation of reward and punishment. The disciple of Christ is instructed to live “soberly, righteously, and godly, in this present world.”* His reason and his experience prove to him, that if he live otherwise, he is neither wise nor happy. Sobriety, benevolence, and piety, are the ornaments of his human nature, and the graces of his Christian character. His duty to God, to his neighbour, and to himself, has been the lesson of his early youth: and if he remember it in the conduct of his life, he will enjoy the approbation of his own mind, the esteem of men, and the blessing of Heaven.

This distribution of our duties, taken from their respective objects, referring to God, our neighbour, and ourselves, is clear and natural. For what is plainer than that reverence and obedience are due to the Supreme Being? that we owe justice and kindness to our fellow-creatures? that sobriety, or self-government, contributes to the health of mind and body, and to the true exercise and enjoyment of all our faculties? Nevertheless it is equally evident, that every duty, whatever be its immediate end or object, is a duty to God: it is a debt of homage to the Creator: it is an act of obedience to his sovereign, all-perfect will. He who is unjust, or cruel, or uncharitable, not only fails in his duty towards his neighbour, but also offends the common author of their being, in the violation of his benevolent and righteous laws. He who, by vicious habits, injures his constitution, degrades his understanding, and depraves his moral sentiments, while he forgets his duty towards himself, sins also against God; abusing the gifts of his providence, and overleaping the salutary bounds which his wisdom and goodness have prescribed. So that the want either of sobriety, or of benevolence, is always, in its proportion, a defect of piety.

There is a connexion also between our duty to our neighbour and our duty to ourselves. The neglect of sobriety is generally attended with an infringement of benevolence, and a violation of social duty. It is not easy, it is indeed scarcely possible, for a man to injure himself, without injuring his neighbour. The great society of mankind is a continual chain, in which every link has, on the one side, a dependence, on the other, an influence. Every breach of self-government hurts the community by a portion of bad example: very few exist without partners and abettors: and those which are of a more private and solitary nature, render a person unpleasing and unuseful to society. Pride makes him imperious; and sometimes oppressive. Immoderate love of self abates his love of others: it is apt, at the least, to blast the fruits of his benevolence; and envy withers it at the root. Perpetual dissipation chills the heart; and weakens the inclination, as it does too often the power, to be generous. In short, a due temper and rectitude of mind is the source of kind and charitable behaviour. Every corruption which any one allows within, will, in some degree, tinge his social character; and will affect the comfort of those who are connected with him, whether in civil or domestic life. But every greater failure in personal duty has a direct and immediate operation upon the rights and happiness of mankind. Some errors in private conduct render a man inattentive to the interests of his family; to the suitable support of his wife; or to the education and welfare of his children. Others put it out of his power to be just: and while he says to himself indiscreetly "may I not do what I will with my own?" he slides imperceptibly into a situation which his heart condemns, and finds himself bearing hard upon the property of others. Some personal vices are an open and decided attack upon the happiness of individuals, and the order and welfare of society. To corrupt the innocence of one fellow-creature to encourage the profligacy of another, to assist in leading both to infamy and ruin, is assuredly no dictate of benevolence or humanity. And for him who sacrifices the honour and happiness of families to his own ungovernable pursuits, or makes the dearest interests of his friend or neighbour the sport of his vanity, or the amusement of a vacant hour; he has, in all civilized communities, been truly considered not only as a depraved individual, but as a noxious citizen, amenable to public justice. So generally dependent is social duty upon private virtue: and so ill-founded is the apology sometimes offered for a person ruined by his dissipated and vicious conduct, (of which, though you may allow and commend the candour, you will I am persuaded, condemn the fallacy, and lament the evil tendency, "that he is no man's enemy but his own." That he is hostile to his own happiness, is weighty cause of repentance to himself, and of compassion to every generous mind: but has he no aged parent to lament his errors? no family to taste the bitter fruits of them? has he no connexion with his neighbour, or his country? no obligation to promote the general welfare of mankind? Let not any such false calculation deceive the unexperienced and unwary youth: let it not throw a specious veil over the unsocial qualities, and widely extending evils of vice: let it not abate his abhorrence of any conduct which is unfriendly to virtue, hurtful to others, dishonourable to the Christian name, unsuitable to a reasonable nature, and condemned by the Word of God.

Thus intimately connected are the three classes of moral duties towards God, our neighbour, and ourselves. They all stand upon the same immovable foundation, the will of God; his will growing out of his infinite perfections; being the result of his wisdom, justice, holiness and goodness; and therefore coinciding ever with eternal right and truth. They are all directed to the same end, the honour of God; that is, the manifestation of his power, and wisdom, and goodness, in the happiness of his creatures. The breach of either kind is a violation of his will, and a deviation from right and truth; tending invariably to defeat the end of his moral government, because it is a certain diminution of happiness; always to the transgressor, generally to some other part of mankind.

Of these three kinds of duty, the first in order is clearly our duty to God; as well from the transcendent dignity of its object, as because it is the foundation and sanction of the other two. And to the right apprehension and practice of this duty, I conceive nothing is equally conducive, as this memorable dictate of the holy psalmist, "I have set God always before me." As his being, his attributes, his relation to us, are the genuine source of all religious affection;

so, in proportion as we contemplate them, will our pity rise or fall. "To remember the Creator,"* is, in the just language of Scripture, a concise representation of a religious character: and the prophane and impious are emphatically distinguished by that which is the ground of their fatal errors, when they are described as "they who forget God:"† both expressions meeting in this reasonable sentiment; what it is morally impossible for a creature endued with reason and affections, at the same time to think of the Supreme Being, all-perfect in himself, and the source of existence and of every approach towards perfection in his creatures, and not to love him, fear him, and desire to obey him. He, therefore, who "sets God" most frequently "before him," is most likely to be uniform in the devotion of his heart, and the obedience of his life.

Though God is one simple undivided essence, a finite understanding must contemplate him, as the eye does every great object, in parts and succession. The attributes of the divine nature, as discoverable by reason, or revealed in Scripture, are a spacious and variegated field of contemplation. His power, his wisdom, his goodness, are daily presented to our view in the works of nature, moving before us in perpetual succession and uninterrupted order. His holiness and justice, according to our natural conceptions, are inseparable from an all-perfect being. His universal presence and providence are suggested by our notions of a being self-existent; and they are proved by the preservation of the universe. These attributes of God are declared in Scripture, with the authority and precision of divine knowledge; and illustrated with the force of heavenly eloquence. In this sublime contemplation, which way soever we turn our eyes, we meet with powerful incentives to reverence and obedience. But there is one point of view in which we may consider them, best suited to our situation, and most conducive to our improvement; uniting in a manner every other; if we

"set God before us" as the moral governor of the universe; if we behold in him our sovereign lawgiver; the witness and judge of our behaviour; the dispenser of our happiness in every state; the immediate source of it in a world to come.

If we attend a moment to our notions of God, and the relation which we bear to him, we shall not hesitate to acknowledge that he is our sovereign lawgiver; that his will is the complete and universal rule of our moral conduct. Whatever he commands, is right in itself and best for us: this is evident from the consideration of his holiness, his wisdom, and his goodness. That he has a claim to our obedience, and will enforce it, is the consequence of his sovereignty and his justice. Upon a conformity to his will, as he is the foundation and measure of moral fitness, must depend the rectitude of our conduct, and the perfection of our nature. To obey him must be the first duty, and first interest, of us and every reasonable creature.

To this end it is incumbent upon us, by every possible mean, to discover the will of God. The first way to attain this knowledge, is the use of our natural reason. "This is the law written in our hearts,"* consisting partly of those general principles which, more in number or fewer, are evident to every understanding; and partly of such particular conclusions as we are able to derive from them. It is certain, however, that the Almighty never left man entirely to this partial and imperfect guide. It appears that he gave our first parents one injunction† which was not discoverable by the light of nature. This revelation could not be made to them without an explicit declaration of his being and providence. The sentence passed upon their disobedience, laid open several of his attributes; presenting to them, in the most striking manner, his justice, power, and mercy. And yet, with all this supernatural information, transmitted, doubtless, by the first parents to their children and posterity, the reason of man was incapable of directing him to the knowledge and performance of the divine will. Of this we have abundant testimony from the conduct of succeeding generations. We learn from sacred story, the general corruption which prevailed before the flood, and the idolatry and wickedness which followed it. The volumes of profane history have left us no traces of any one nation upon earth, wherein the established worship was not in general absurd and impious, and their public and avowed manners stained with some gross enormity. The modern accounts of countries not enlightened by the Gospel, give us a like unwelcome representation of their religious knowledge and morality; all together, amounting to a decisive proof, drawn from the uniform experience of near six thousand years, that human reason, that first gift of heaven, the great distinction of our nature, the basis of our moral agency, and the channel of our wisdom and happiness, is nevertheless utterly insufficient, alone, to make us wise or happy; unable to lead us to the knowledge and the practice of the will of God.

The second, and only remaining method of discovering the will of God, is a supernatural declaration of it. That God should disclose his will to mankind by a voice from heaven, is, in itself, equally reasonable and credible, as that he should do it by the still suggestions of our understanding: the only difference lies in this, that the one happens at all times, the other at a few appointed seasons. That God should sometimes visibly interpose in the government of his universe, is just as intelligible, and as probable, as that he should for the most part do it invisibly. The ordinary course of nature is, in itself, as wonderful as any extraordinary interruption of it: each is, in its place and order, the work of an Almighty Power: nor is it more surprising, for example, that a dead body should, upon some great occasion, be restored to the functions of life, than that these very functions should be produced and supported in thousands of species, and millions of individual animals, by mechanisms and laws unvaried from the creation to this day. He who can first explain to us the union of the human soul and body, who can tell us how the mind acts upon the brain, or the nerves upon the mind, may then dispute the probability of supernatural illumination; or reject a truth revealed, because it is a mystery. We are surrounded with mysteries; that is to say, with natural appearances, the cause and manner of which we cannot explain: we therefore justly refer them to a superior agency, which superintends and regulates the whole. We see a few things; and reason obliges us to believe the rest. "We walk by faith more than by sight.*" Now this, which is incontestably true in the works of nature and the concerns of life, let us transfer to the subject of religion. That God should reveal his will to mankind, is highly agreeable to his wisdom and goodness; that he has revealed it, is a fact established: the proof of it is, that he has enabled the ministers of his revelation to suspend, or alter the operations of nature; to foretell events depending upon natural causes not yet in operation, and upon the will of free agents yet unborn: the Almighty, by such a clear communication of his power and wisdom, thus giving his sanction to their declarations, and testifying that they were sent by him. We have a chain of prophecies, from Genesis to Malachi, delivered by several persons, in different places, at many distant periods in the wide compass of more than three thousand years: these prophecies, besides other intermediate objects, point, in directions plain and perspicuous, to one great event, describing it in a variety of minute and accidental circumstances, such as no human sagacity could have conjectured separately, much less could they have been, by any finite power or understanding, combined together; and these several predictions meet and correspond in the person of Jesus Christ. That he lived at the season foretold by his prophets and related by his evangelists, we have the acknowledgment of the Jews, his countrymen, and the Romans, their conquerors; of those who in a blinded zeal rejected him, and of those who heard of him with indifference.

We have historical evidence that he proved his divine appointment and character by public undoubted miracles; a fact allowed by the enemies of his person and religion, both Jew and Gentile, in his own and in succeeding ages: and we have proof unquestionable that he foretold two events, unparalleled in the annals of mankind, which have been fulfilling these seventeen hundred years, and are now proceeding before our own eyes: the one, that twelve plain unlettered men should propagate and establish his religion, to be transmitted to distant ages, in contradiction to the favourite passions of mankind, in opposition to the influence of power, wealth, and learning, against the prejudices of every religious communion and every civil society then in the world. The other, that the Jewish kingdom, their religious and civil polity, founded as they were, and once long protected, by the visible hand of Providence, should be dissolved within the lifetime of some of his hearers; that the people should be scattered among all nations; that they shall continue in this dispersion till the completion of another great event, of which the Scriptures give us intimations.* The Jews are actually in this situation, under such circumstances, as never happened (that we know) to any nation upon earth; three millions† perhaps, of a persecuted and persevering race, neither uniting with the people among whom they sojourn, nor forming any separate empire of their own. Let any one weigh these evidences maturely and impartially, let him consider moreover the nature of the Christian Revelation, the importance of its discoveries, and the purity of its precepts; and if he does not receive the Gospel as divine, as a complete revelation of the will and the designs of God, I fear he would not be convinced, though an angel should appear to him, or though a prophet or evangelist should arise before him from the dead. But let him seriously reflect, that if he do not receive the Gospel, and conform to it, it is at his own peril. It is the first duty of man to listen to the voice of his Creator, by whatever medium it may come to his ears. It is not sufficient for him to say, "God hath given me reason, I will conform to this heavenly monitor, and I shall be accepted." God hath also given him instinct, and passions; they also will sometimes stimulate and conduct him rightly: yet if he conform to these monitors only, he will not say he shall be accepted. Now, as his reason was given him to guide his instinct, and to regulate his passions, so revelation is offered to him, to inform and improve his reason: and as it is, does it not claim his acceptance and submission, on the same divine authority, and under the same awful consequences? If it appear that God hath spoken, it matters not whether it be as to Moses, face to face, or as to David, by the mouth of his authentic messenger; it is a dangerous trifling to reject the declaration in either way conveyed; its authority and importance are in both cases the same; "he that receiveth whomsoever I send, receiveth me."*

* Luke, xxi. 24. Rom. ii. 25, 26.

† Basnage Hist. des Juifs.

We have therefore in the Christian Revelation an authentic discovery of the will and designs of God. He has therein given us the terms of our acceptance with him: he has marked out a line of conduct which will lead us to our final happiness. The laws which he prescribes to us correspond with the best conclusions of our understanding; and if at any time they draw us to higher degrees of perfection than unassisted reason would have suggested, what is this but a new proof of their heavenly origin, and a fresh argument for our obedience? If "the day-spring from on high hath visited"† and enlightened us, we are to walk by this light; in a plainer path, with better assistance, with more extensive and more inviting views. The disciple of Christ has this great advantage, that his duty is chalked out to him in clear and intelligible characters; the means of performing it are placed in his hands; and his reward is laid before him. Surely, then, he will not employ himself so ungratefully or so unprofit-ably, as to misinterpret the precepts of his heavenly teacher, or to dispute his obligations to follow them. Will he plead the passions of human nature, or the infirmities of his own constitution? His divine lawgiver "knew what was in man;"* and hath doubtless well adapted his laws to their subject and to their end; to assist and correct the imbecilities of his nature; to improve and guide his understanding; to restrain his passions within salutary bounds; perhaps to render his infirmities an exercise of his virtue, and an increase of his reward. Will he argue, that his particular violations of the Christian law are not injurious to society, to individuals, or even to himself? But can he trace that endless chain of effects and causes which connects the most distant actions, and the most remote events? Does he consider at how many points innumerable the members of society touch each other? so that the undue impulse of one may disturb the temporal order and happiness of thousands? Can he calculate exactly the moral influence which his conduct may have on others? can he measure the imperceptible gradations of human depravity, and foresee the general and incurable corruption which his present actions and habits may one day bring upon himself? Does he know the manner of his future existence? his state and destination in another world; or can he tell precisely how far acquired habits of obedience and holiness may be as essential to his well-being there, as freedom from pain, remorse, or anxiety, are here? In a word, does he reflect, that God is infinitely wise, and good, and powerful? that man is the creature of his hand, and the dependant of his bounty? that his duty is the reasonable tribute of faith and obedience; to believe the declaration of his Creator, and to endeavour to perform his will? that God hath spoken to him in a manner not to be mistaken; "I have shewed thee, O man, what is good;"† walk thou before me in humility and sincerity, and thou shalt be accepted through my covenanted mercy?

As God hath given us, by the united light of reason and revelation, a clear declaration of his will, so is he a perpetual witness of our attention to it; of our obedience or our disobedience. The universal presence of the Supreme Being is a truth of which philosophy cannot doubt, and which revealed religion supposes and declares. It is the invisible bond which holds together all created nature; "in him we live, and move, and have our being."* One of the first lessons of moral wisdom is, to have this attribute continually in view; "to set God always before us," as an impartial spectator and judge of our thoughts and actions. "How shall I do this wickedness," how shall I omit this duty, "and sin against God,"† will then be the constant suggestion of conscience, the faithful monitor within. "Am I not in the presence of that best of beings, who created me in order to make me happy? who knows my present interest and my future destination; and imposes no laws upon me, but such as are in every period conducive to my welfare? who is leading me in the ways of his kind and righteous providence, to the full enjoyment and perfection of my whole nature? And shall I be ungrateful to this gracious benefactor? Shall I withdraw myself from his protection? Shall I incur his displeasure? Shall I cease to venerate him with all the faculties of my soul? Shall I neglect to worship him in the retirement of my closet? Shall I refuse to offer him my public homage in the assembly of my brethren, united as we are in the same high obligations, and the same important prospects? Shall the pleasure or the business of the world ever make me forget who it was that created it; that sent me into it; and will soon call me out of it? Shall I pursue the gratification of the present moment, thoughtless of its nature and consequences, as if I had no reason given me to guide me; no rule of prudence, humanity, or religion, to walk by; no equal to feel my injustice; no superior to see, control, and punish it? Shall I receive every blessing of nature; every advantage of Christian education; perhaps every comfort of society; and forget that gracious Providence, by whom I am thus highly favoured? Shall my whole life and conversation discover no marks of reverence for his sovereignty, his attributes, and his laws? In a word, shall I become, of all the beings in the universe, the most unworthy and the most wretched? a creature endued with reason, assisted by revelation, designed for immortality, living in the presence of the Almighty, without morals, without religion, without God in the world?"

Lastly: we shall do well "to set God before us," not only as our sovereign lawgiver, the spectator and judge of our moral conduct, the supreme dispenser of our happiness in every stage of our being, but also as the immediate source of it in the next approaching period.

The Holy Scriptures give us a very slight view of the world of spirits whither we are going; as extensive, probably, as we are able to comprehend while we are in this material universe; and sufficient to direct and console us in our passage through it. However, they plainly intimate, that the happiness of a future state will principally consist in some nearer contemplation of the divine nature, and in the society of angels and good men. It will be of importance therefore to form ourselves here to such an imitation of the Supreme Being, as is possible for a creature in our imperfect state. In this and every view, it will be true wisdom "to set God before us" in the moral or imitable perfections of his nature; his holiness, his justice, his truth and faithfulness in his declarations and promises; but above all, to admire and imitate his goodness to all his creatures, and particularly to ourselves; his goodness to us in every dispensation of his providence, especially in that which exceeds and crowns them all, the redemption of mankind by Jesus Christ. I the rather mention the divine goodness as a peculiar object of our contemplation, as it conveys, not only the most pressing argument for a life of gratitude and obedience to God, but also a striking lesson and example for our conduct to our, fellow-creatures: "if God so loved us, we ought also to love one another."* The duties of social life form a very considerable part of religion; upon the due performance of them depends the greatest portion of our happiness here below; we know how deeply it will affect our future expectations; "I was hungry, and ye gave me meat, sick, and ye visited me."† The duty and the reward extends to every relation, civil or domestic. Let it then be the favourite study of the wise and good, to contemplate the divine philanthropy, the love of God to man, and to imitate it. Remembering that the happiness of all mankind is the universal care of Providence, the good man will not suffer it to be interrupted or diminished by his own imaginary interests or pleasures. It will rather be the first satisfaction of his life to forward, in the sphere allotted him, the benevolent designs of heaven: to improve the comforts of his friends and relatives, of his neighbours and dependants; to promote the good order of society; to advance the prosperity of his country; to extend his kind offices, as situation may enable him, or as occasions may arise, to every nation under heaven, whether civilized communities or savage tribes; to pour forth his prayers and wishes where the influence of his conduct may not appear to reach: above all, to advance the interests of truth and virtue, of Christian faith and Christian morality; diligently to promote, by his own example, and by every method of wisdom and prudence, the everlasting happiness of mankind in the honour and service of God.

SERMON CXLIX.

BY JOHN NAPLETON, D.D.

Chancellor of the Diocese, and Canon Residentiary of the Cathedral Church of Hereford.

On Exemplary Conduct.

MATTH. v. 16.

Let your light so shine before men, that they may see your good works, and glorify your Father which is Heaven.

THIS exhortation, addressed to the first disciples, is a lesson of duty universal and perpetual. It applies to the Christian in every age: and it may be supposed to admonish him in some such manner as this. "Content not yourself with the private satisfaction of thinking and acting rightly. Let your religious knowledge and virtuous conduct be manifest to the world. Let all men know by your actions and conversation, that you are a disciple of Christ. Appear to be what you are: a believer in the Gospel; determined, with the divine assistance, to obey its precepts; and hoping, by the divine favour, to receive its rewards. Thus let your light shine before men. Your knowledge will instruct them; your example will encourage them. They will see your good works, and imitate them. They will praise your heavenly father for his blessings conferred on you and on themselves."

This duty seems at first sight to be easy and delightful. It is natural to an ingenuous mind to express the sentiments, which it has embraced with a deep conviction of their truth and importance. A heart warmed with rational affections will be disposed to pour them forth in action and conversation. He who is engaged in the contemplation of a substantial and eternal good, will probably be moved by self-love alone to speak of the object of his hopes, as a topic pleasing to himself: benevolence will excite him to communicate his principles and his expectations, as an incentive and encouragement to others. One would imagine, therefore, that a good Christian would need no command or persuasion to suffer his "light to shine before men," and to afford the world the full benefit of his example. There are however some considerations which, misconceived or misapplied, may tempt him to a different conduct.

First. It is in the nature of a virtuous mind, to be modest in estimating its own good qualities, and backward in displaying them. Conscious of its natural imperfections, and of its wilful errors, it is slow to offer itself to observation and inquiry: and if at any time it can, in some degree, satisfy its own notions of duty, it is content with an humble hope of the divine approbation, and is not forward to seek the praise of men.

Secondly. A good person is naturally fearful of any appearance of ostentation; and much more, of any suspicion of hypocrisy. His private, unseen, piety is exposed to no such uncandid interpretation: it lies open to no charge of vanity; it has no witness to dispute its motives, or to doubt its sincerity. He is tempted therefore to conceal his virtues, rather than hazard an imputation of pride or simulation, which would injure the cause of religion; and which he himself would feel the more, in proportion as he deserves it less.

Thirdly. He is confirmed in this modesty and caution, by the admonitions which he finds in the Holy Scriptures, and particularly in this discourse of our Saviour, against an ostentatious and vain-glorious piety: "do not your alms before men, to be seen of them: when thou prayest thou shalt not be as the hypocrites are: appear not unto men to fast."*

These three considerations are pardonable, though mistaken, reasons, why men sometimes throw a shade over their piety. They are indeed in their principles laudable; because they spring from an unfeigned love of virtue; an apprehension that religion may suffer by false imputations; and a reverence to the authority of Christ.

There is a Fourth reason, of which we cannot speak so well. This is a fear of appearing singular; a dread of reproach or ridicule from the libertines and the profane. There are persons, who have the wisdom to discern their duty; and the resolution to perform it; and yet they have not courage publicly to avow their principles, and present their conduct to the world. They are awed by the tyranny of fashion, and the boldness of vice. They dare not patronise that virtue, which they love and honour. They offer their secret vows at the shrine of truth; and yet "bow down" publicly "in the house of Rimmon."† They condescend to the most foolish of all hypocrisy; they appear less wise and less virtuous than they are.

In answer to these pleas and temptations, the friend of religion will attend to the following considerations.

First. Though humility be a quality inseparable from a good person, sincerity also is essential to him. What humility may induce him to suppress, sincerity may oblige him to declare. To conceal his belief in the truths of Christianity, is in some degree to deny them; it is at least to convey a presumption contrary to his convictions. To disguise his obedience to the laws of the Gospel, is a sort of insinuation that he doubts their authority and excellence. The love of truth and goodness, which warms his heart, guides his understanding, and forms his conduct, requires him to give them his public testimony and avowed encouragement.

Secondly. With respect to the suspicion of ostentation or hypocrisy, the first maxim of a wise and good man, is to follow the clear dictates of reason and conscience, not diverted from a path so safe and honourable, by any groundless interpretations which may be put upon his words or actions. Such duties as are of a private nature, he performs in retirement: the rest he discharges openly, with sincerity and discretion: giving no occasion to malignant imputations, and leaving any which may possibly arise, to be confuted by the general tenor of his life and manners.

Thirdly. The passages cited from the holy Scriptures, and others similar, are

* Matth. vi. 1. 5. 18.

cessures of actual hypocrisy and ostentation. They condemn an appearance of piety and charity which do not exist in the heart; and a vain display of these virtues, when they do; designed to promote the reputation of him who thus imperfectly cultivates them, not the honour of God, or the good of mankind. The admonition is, "when ye give alms, when ye pray, when ye fast, be not as the Hypocrites: put not on the appearance of religion without the reality. Do not your alms, pray not, fast not, to be seen of men; let not the applause of men be your motive." There are virtues which, on some occasions, are more advantageously exercised, and in a manner more becoming, in retirement and privacy: we have an example in the devotion of the closet, and in such acts of charity, as do not require the concurrence of others to obtain their full effect: and yet these same virtues are, on other occasions, exercised more laudably, because more beneficially, in large assemblies and societies; as, for instance, divine worship in churches and families, and public charitable subscriptions. So that these particular precepts of our blessed Lord do not interfere with his general exhortation to a public profession of religion, and an avowed practice of virtue.

The Fourth excuse for concealing our religious sentiments and actions, namely, the fear of reproach or ridicule, is such as no wise man will plead, or attempt to justify; however he may sometimes have the weakness to feel its influence. For what is the opinion, real or pretended, of profligate and thoughtless men, compared with the established truth and everlasting importance of religion, and the unchangeable excellence of virtue? What is their momentary, or even deliberate, censure, opposed to the testimony of conscience, and the approbation of the wise and good? In a point thus intimately connected with our duty to God, the welfare of society, and the eternal happiness of mankind, no difference is to be paid to numbers, rank, or talents, if they happen to be adverse to truth and right. But, in fact, since the propagation of the Gospel, the general sense of mankind has been on the side of religious principle and virtuous behaviour; and the more so in every age and country, in proportion as its doctrines and precepts are more clearly apprehended. Many who fail in practice, do not err in speculation; and they who err in speculation, do not probably deviate so widely as they may seem, or so decidedly as may be supposed. They have doubtless their moments of recollection, when the strength of reason, the weight of evidence, the natural bias of the human mind to religion, the anxious monitor within, all conspire to recal them from their wanderings. The friend of mankind will not surely, by any appearance of approbation, encourage and confirm them in their transient delusions; or accelerate and precipitate them in their unwise career. He will rather watch the moment of their returning reason, and warn them of their danger: he will at least invite them to the forsaken path, by the inoffensive light of his own sentiments, and by the silent guidance of his example.

Having removed these slender objections to a public profession of religion and an avowed practice of virtue, we come to the argument which imposes this duty upon us. The end of all our actions is happiness, the happiness of ourselves and others; the imperfect, transitory, happiness of this present state; the perfect, permanent, happiness of a world to come. The means of obtaining happiness in every stage of our existence is, without a question, religion; reverence of God, and obedience to his laws. In proportion as the means are generally adopted, and actively pursued, the more generally, and the more surely, will the end be obtained. The duty therefore, and wisdom of every one, is to cultivate religion himself, and to recommend it to others for his own, and for the general good. How then will he most effectually recommend religion? Is it by the reading and meditation of his closet? is it by his private prayers? by his secret alms? by the purity and simplicity of his retired manners? These are excellent beginnings; they are the essential elements of moral perfection; the seed and principle of the Christian life: but as they are studiously withdrawn from observation, they have little influence on mankind. If he desire to propagate in the world the sacred truths which he believes; if he wish to recommend the heavenly laws which he endeavours to obey; and the everlasting blessings to which he aspires; he will make known his principles, his practice, and his expectations. The general tenor of his conduct and conversation will shew his unvaried piety, free from all suspicious ostentation, or affected singularity. You will perceive, in his whole demeanour, a deep conviction of the attributes of God; a reverent apprehension of his power, his holiness, his justice, his goodness; an habitual sense of his watchful providence, extending over all his creatures, and over every event and incident of their being; a constant recollection of his moral government, dispensing reward and punishment, partly in this present state, completely in a life to come. He will manifest his firm belief in the revelations which the divine mercy hath afforded, to guide and encourage us in the path of duty. That supplication and thanksgiving which he daily presents to Heaven in his retirement, he will at appointed seasons offer in the congregation: publicly testifying his reverence for the Author of his being, his gratitude for all his mercies, his dependence upon him for preservation and happiness. Whenever he speaks of the Supreme Creator, he will express that profound veneration and dutiful affection which he feels continually; a veneration proportioned to his transcendent excellence, an affection inspired by his unbounded goodness. Impressed with a deep conviction of the purity and equity of his laws, he will represent them as the dictates of eternal reason, the measure of human perfection, and the unfailing source of happiness.

In this manner will a wise and good man suffer "his light to shine before men:" not to display his own merits: not to reflect a lustre upon himself; but to recommend religion to their observance, and to lead them to their eternal good. He will consider the Christian revelation as a sacred treasure, which by the blessing of heaven he hath received from his fathers; which he is bound by every obligation of piety to God and charity to man, by the nature of the dispensation, and by the command of its blessed Author, according to his situation and ability, to diffuse in the present age, and to deliver down to posterity. That love of virtue which the Gospel inculcates, which the Holy Spirit inspires and confirms, which his reason tells him is the perfection and happiness of his being, that sacred flame, he will study to kindle and cherish in the breasts of others. He will point out to them its heavenly origin, its excellence, and its end. For virtue is no other than an imitation of the attributes, and obedience to the will, of God. It is a conformity to the eternal reason and unchangeable truth of things. It is the perfection of every intelligent creature. It leads us to the ultimate object of all our contemplations and affections, the center of all our energy and activity: it leads us to happiness. And that happiness is adequate to every desire and capacity of our immortal nature. It is spiritual; it is unchangeable; it is eternal. For its foundation, it rests upon the truth and promises of God. For its source and measure, it flows from his inexhausted bounty; from his essential goodness, and his covenanted mercies. For its nature, it arises from his indulgent approbation and gracious favour. For its situation, it dwells in his immediate presence.

SERMON CL.

BY JOHN NAPLETON, D.D.

Chancellor of the Diocese, and Canon Residentiary of the Cathedral Church of Hereford.

On Temporal Happiness.

PSALM iv. 6.

There be many that say, who will show us any good? Lord lift thou up the light of thy countenance upon us.

"Who will shew us any good? who will guide us in the way to a happy life?" It is the universal language of mankind. It is the question of the wise, and the foolish; of the serious and the thoughtless; of every station, and every age. The inquiry is suitable to the nature of man. Instinct impels him to it irresistibly:

reason approves it: the experienced goodness of the Creator adds a sanction and encouragement. It is to be regretted, that an end so just and so important, should not always be pursued by the most wise and efficacious means. It is to be lamented, not only that misery should exist in a world originally designed for happiness, (this in our fallen state is unavoidable;) but that the large portion of happiness yet allowed us, should be diminished and adulterated by our own misapprehension and misconduct.

To correct this fatal error has been the study of the wise and good in every age. The philosopher has appealed to the reason of mankind; the lawgiver has alarmed his passions: and both have called in to their assistance, so far as their knowledge extended, the doctrines and sanctions of religion. To add to the sum of present happiness is the natural result of the precepts of morality: it is the end proposed by the institutions of civil government; it has been always the ostensible object, and sometimes the real one, of false religions; it is one undoubted purpose of the true. Temporal good and evil were the explicit sanction of the law of Moses. Though doubtless, the enlightened worshipper extended his religious prospects beyond the limited period and capacity of the present life; yet the primary reward of his obedience was security and prosperity in the land of Canaan. The proper, peculiar, rewards of the Gospel are perfection and happiness in a life to come; and yet, the blessed Author of it employed himself in soothing the miseries of the present. The works of power, by which he shewed himself the promised redeemer of mankind, and the giver of eternal salvation, were at the same time acts of mercy and compassion, which proved that their present happiness was not unworthy of his care. He not only opened to the view of his disciples the glories of another world, but condescended to sympathize with them in the afflictions of this: he restored to life the only son of the widow;* and he wept over the grave of Lazarus.† His doctrines correspond with his life and miracles; while they lead us to purity and happiness hereafter, they instruct us how to be virtuous and comfortable here: while they prepare us to be blessed saints in heaven, they make us good citizens, capable of many gratifications upon earth. They tend to soften every evil, moral and natural, which can afflict the human race: showing us that the author of our being designs the happiness of his creatures universal and perpetual; that his kindness knows no limitation or interruption but what arises from their own voluntary errors, from the extensive plans of his gracious providence, and the essential justice of his moral government.

It is permitted therefore to the disciple of Christ, though he hath in prospect a state of glory, splendid beyond imagination, and certain as the attributes of God, to turn his eye to the scene which lies immediately before him. He will not be less worthy of the goodness of the Almighty, if he desire to enjoy his bounty in every place of his habitation, and in every period of his being. Though he be engaged in the duties of religion, in the regulation of his moral conduct, in preparing himself for eternity, he may still ask which is the fairest way to temporal happiness. He is, indeed, too well instructed to consider it as his sovereign or final good; but so far as it is consistent with that higher object, so far as the same way leads to both, he thinks it a just and reasonable pursuit. Nor will the divine or the moralist be employed improperly, if he mark its boundaries, point out its genuine sources, and describe the sentiments and habits, without which it is in no degree to be attained.

With respect to its boundaries, two things are to be considered. One, that the happiness of the present life is, in its nature, imperfect; it is not proportioned to the capacities of the mind, it never arrives at a point beyond which no wish remains: it is unfinished and progressive. It is also subject to abatement, interruption and decay. Its duration is precarious, its end is certain. Such is the constitution of the world, it is the decree of Providence, it is the consequence of the fall. To expect unabated, continued, happiness, is to look for an earthly paradise, or to aspire after the nature of angels. The object of our inquiry is the happiness of man in a degenerate and mortal state.

The other point to be considered is, that as man is now in one short, transient, period of his existence, and is preparing for another, eternal and unchangeable; nothing can promote his happiness in the present state, which will destroy or diminish it in that which is to come. And this is true, not only because time is nothing compared with eternity, but also, because man being a reasonable, a thoughtful creature, ever looking into futurity, his happiness depends not more upon his actual enjoyments than it does upon his hopes and fears; and the apprehension of future eternal evil must of necessity destroy the satisfaction of present good. This is so evident that it needs no proof; and it will scarcely admit of illustration. For what are the pleasures of the morning to him who expects assuredly to pass the day, or to close the evening in misery? What would be the amusements of infancy, and the enjoyments of youth, to him who could foresee that they were certainly to be followed by an afflicted manhood, or a wretched old age? And yet these allusions bear no greater proportion to the point before us, than earth to heaven, or a moment to eternity.

Having stated these principles concerning the imperfection of our present enjoyments, and their necessary dependence upon our future expectations; having thus marked the boundaries of temporal happiness, let us inquire into its genuine sources.

First. The foundation of happiness in the present state, is an habitual sense and consideration of the universal presence and providence of God. This is a necessary consequence of the nature of man; a creature endued with reason and thought. As he is a creature, his well-being depends in common with that of the world around him, on the Creator: as he is a reasonable, a thoughtful, creature, ever looking beyond the present, and anxious for the future, a creature that has hopes and fears; his well-being depends also upon his right apprehension of the Creator. The brute enjoys his present existence, thoughtless of the past and future.

To him, therefore, it is of no importance, that the almighty power which sustains him is not invisible only, but utterly unknown. But man is sensible of the condition of his being. He understands his situation to be precarious and dependent. He reflects that his outward frame is frail and corruptible; that his spirit is an immaterial substance, in its nature and operations inexplicable; subject to the vicissitudes of pain and pleasure; aspiring after truth and happiness, but limited in the attainment of either; capable of immortality, but fearful of extinction; piercing into the abyss of time, and into all the possibilities of things, with light sufficient just to render the "darkness visible;" to whom eternal existence and perfect happiness are holden out as objects of reasonable expectation; but to whom annihilation is possible, and even misery, on some suppositions, not improbable. Such a creature is man, seen to himself by the light of reason. Upon whom then can he depend for existence which he so highly values; upon whom, for happiness to which he so ardently aspires; if not upon that gracious self-existent power who created and sustains universal nature? If he forget his presence, or deny his providence, to whom does he look for the preservation of his body in this visible universe; or for the protection of his spirit in new scenes and situations, of which he has strong and interesting presentiments, but of which he can form no idea? He has no guardian to contemplate in the daily vicissitudes and unavoidable anxieties of life! no sovereign to implore for the continuance of health, or the removal or mitigation of sickness! no friend invisible to support him under the loss of parents, of children, or of friends! no guide to conduct him in that awful moment, when he shall be called to follow them! The whole creation is, to his clouded and distempered sight, one vast incomprehensible machine, wherein he discerns no regulator or governor. He knows not therefore what tremendous changes every movement may present to him; nor has he any reasonable security, that the next great revolution may not destroy his being, or suspend his pleasures and expectations, or even place him in a state of suffering. Such is the situation of the man who lives without a sense of the presence and providence of God; and it is evident that in such a situation he cannot be happy.

Secondly. An essential ingredient of happiness in the present state, is a belief in the revelations of God concerning his future dispensations to mankind. A distinction between virtue and vice is impressed by the Creator upon the human mind. No bad education, no art or prejudice, however they may weaken the impression or abate its influence, can entirely erase it. This distinction is followed unavoidably by the ideas of duty and obligation; of reward and punishment. The best among the sons of men are conscious of frequent deviations from the rule of right: they feel themselves accountable, and obnoxious to the justice of a moral governor. They repent, and form resolutions of better conduct: they amend, relapse, and repent again: and thus their life is a continued conflict between reason and passion, a course of imperfect virtue. Now who shall reflect upon the purity and justice of God, and affirm, without a revelation, that he will accept this partial obedience? Who can assure us, that remorse, the natural consequence of sin, shall be also an atonement for it? or that the virtue of to-day shall clear us from the guilt and punishment incurred by the vice of yesterday? This is a point which it is impossible for unassisted reason ever to ascertain; and yet it involves no smaller interests, than the favour of God, and every prospect of perfection and happiness. To have offended the justice of God without any clear discovery of his mercy; to repent without the assurance of pardon; to live under a state of trial which shall turn upon this precarious issue, and shall decide our unalterable fate; this is surely a situation far removed from happiness.

Again, the expectation of another state after death, is so agreeable to the feelings of nature, so conformable to reason, and so powerfully supported by universal tradition from the first ages, that it has been warmly cherished in every country, in every state of society, and in every generation of men. Such is the instinctive anxiety of mankind to look into this unknown scene of things;

a scene so near them, yet disparted from them by an impenetrable veil; that imagination hath supplied the place of knowledge; and every heathen nation, whether polite or barbarous, hath formed some fabulous representation of it. And yet this high probability of a life to come does not satisfy man's native love of being and anxious desire of immortality: neither can all the conjectures of reason or fancy concerning the nature and condition of that expected state, remove the solicitude which he feels in the contemplation of so important a change.

Thus, in the view of unassisted reason, the consideration of a futuro state, in itself not absolutely certain, and far less so in its event and consequences, must ever have been a large abatement of earthly happiness. If this ignorance concerning the divine mercy, and the certainty and nature of a future state, was a source of disquietude to the heathen of antiquity, it presses much more severely on the unbeliever of modern times. It is a misfortune to him, even with respect to present happiness, to have been born within the period of the Christian revelation. The Pagan, having less perfect notions of morality, measured his conduct by a more favourable standard: his remorse and apprehensions were, in proportion less frequent, and less painful. He was moreover instructed to believe that sacrifice and ceremony would expiate his errors, and procure the favour of the Deity: and the fair representations which he heard of Elysian happiness, partly soothed his imagination, and partly imposed upon his understanding. But the Christian revelation has long since corrected this imperfect standard of morality, and dispelled these flattering phantoms of superstition: and therefore he who is so unhappy as to neglect it, loses every source of confidence and expectation: he enjoys not a ray of hope, either in the glimmering of fable, or the light of truth. He has not the consolation of heathen ignorance, nor the benefit of Scriptural information. He knows too much to be void of reasonable fears, and believes too little to be capable of well-grounded hope. But the Gospel opens to the believer a clear and animating prospect. It holds forth an adequate atonement for sin: it offers mercy to repentance: it promises acceptance to a sincere, though imperfect obedience: it confirms the hope of nature concerning a future state; and declares expressly the final reward of virtue in a blessed immortality. We see then, that a belief in the revelations which God hath given us, is essential to the comfort and satisfaction of the present life.

A Third qualification necessary to present happiness, is an attention to the duties of religion and the laws of moral virtue. This follows immediately from the preceding considerations. Reason assures us that we cannot be happy without the approbation of our Creator; and that his approbation cannot be obtained without a reverence for his attributes, and a conformity to his will. It instructs us also, that virtue is in its own nature, and in its genuine consequences, essential to the perfection and happiness of our being. The same truths are affirmed by revelation in a more clear and decided manner. The advantages and promises of the Gospel depend upon religious belief and purity of life. So far then as present happiness is connected with the expectation of future; as it rests upon a conscious sincerity of heart, and an humble hope of the divine favour; it can have no foundation without a virtuous and religious life. Moreover, besides the terrors of conscience, and the apprehension of future recompense, the general tendency of vice is to deprave and diminish the enjoyments of the present hour. When it impairs the constitution, it poisons the very source of earthly happiness. It weakens the native energy of the mind; and robs it of all activity in business, or taste in pleasure. It casts a cloud over the meridian of life, renders it a state of mortification and painful discipline; and hurries it to an untimely end. When vice injures the reputation, and degrades the offender in the opinion of mankind, it destroys the pleasures of society by abating that civility, respect, and friendship, without which it is not a scene of enjoyment, but of punishment: and at length it sends him into a fearful solitude, wounded by the contempt of others, and the reproaches of his own mind. When vice embarrasses his fortune, it deprives him of those accommodations, and that rank in society, which education and habit have rendered necessary: evils indeed, which unfortunate virtue will estimate at their real value, and bear with cheerful resignation; but to a mind enervated with dissipation and luxury, without the resources of reason, the testimony of conscience, or the hopes of religion, they shut up every prospect of happiness on earth, and leave it to unceasing mortification, and as to this world, unavailing penitence. It is a fatal error in "the science of living," to presume, that a contempt of moral obligation will enlarge the sphere of pleasure; to suppose that the libertine, whatever he may lose or suffer in a future state, obtains the better portion in the gratifications of the present. All calculation and probability are clearly against him; and experience decides the question every day.

A Fourth qualification necessary to present happiness, is a disposition to live in harmony with all mankind, and to promote their welfare: a love of peace, and an active benevolence. These qualities are indeed comprehended under the former head, as they hold a high rank among the moral virtues. But for their peculiar importance to the comfort of life, and to the well-being of society, they deserve a separate consideration. With regard to a peaceable disposition, the want of it is not only an evil to society, and a blemish to the moral character, but a great abatement, and sometimes the destruction of private happiness. A state of enmity with our fellow-creatures is so repugnant to nature, that it is painful to every mind which is not depraved and hardened by bad habits; and where the genuine feelings of humanity are extinguished or weakened, the usual effects of variance are reciprocal hatred and injury. It is a divine maxim of virtue and prudence; "if it be possible, as much as lieth in you, live peaceably with all men."* Every disagreement and contention wounds the sensibility of a good heart, and aggravates the callousness of a bad one. It is always an interruption of happiness: it is generally, more or less, a temptation to sin.

With respect to benevolence, or a desire to advance the welfare, and to mitigate the misfortunes of others; it is a disposition so congenial to our native sentiments, so suited to our situation as indigent and dependent creatures, so forcibly recommended by the Christian law, that it is needless to enlarge upon it as a duty; I speak of it here as a source of pleasure. St. Paul reports a saying of our blessed Lord, which is not recorded in the Gospels, but is highly agreeable to his divine character, and to his unlimited knowledge of the best feelings and interests of human nature: "Ye ought to support the weak: and to remember the words of the Lord Jesus, how he said, it is more blessed to give than to receive;"* more blessed, not only in the grateful prayer of the indigent, and in the benediction of heaven, but in the dignity of the action, and in the conscious satisfaction of the heart. For, to receive is an act of necessity; to give is an act of choice: to receive, is to partake only of happiness; to give, is also to communicate it: to receive, is the condition of a creature; to give is the delegated power of the Creator; it is to gratify the noblest affections of the human nature, and to imitate the perfections of the divine. It is a well-known advantage of superior rank and fortune, that it enables men to draw from this source of delight and honour in copious and diffusive streams. It is a spur to activity and industry in the second orders of society, that as they increase in wealth, they will have a larger scope for virtue. It is an encouragement to the third, that benevolence may be active and useful without the aid of riches. There are numberless offices of kindness, which depend entirely upon a well disposed mind. And the happiness of families and other smaller circles, in every station, is completed by a goodness of temper and humanity of heart, when the advantages of affluence, and even many substantial virtues, would, without these social qualities, have contributed in vain.

Fifthly. I mention one more qualification for temporal happiness, a cheerful and contented mind; a disposition to enjoy the blessings of the present hour; to suffer, without repining; to hope, as far as may be, without anxiety. This temper will chiefly arise from a due consideration of the nature of this world; the shortness of our continuance in it; and our expectations in another. This world presents to us many reasonable enjoyments, not unworthy the attention of a wise and virtuous man: but while he receives them gratefully, as the gifts of heaven, he will consider them as transient imperfect pleasures: he will not expect from them that complete or lasting satisfaction, which, as he well knows, they are not intended to bestow. His meditation on the shortness and uncertainty of life will instruct him daily to contract his plans of happiness; to pass the present moment innocently, cheerfully, and usefully; and not to look forward continually to days which he may never see, for the enjoyment of his being, or for the exercise of his virtue. "This day," he will say, "I will be as good and as happy as I can; providing at the same time, by the rules of religion and prudence, for the goodness and happiness of to-morrow. I will enjoy the present, and prepare for the future." The contemplation of his eternal home will improve the amusements, and soften the inconveniences of his journey in every stage. As the day of life declines, he will in a less degree be affected by its pains and pleasures: and the nearer it approaches to the setting sun, the more steadily and earnestly will he extend his views beyond the narrow horizon of this sublunary world. Nature indeed, and habit, will attach him to this earth: friendship and affection will disincline him still more to leave it: but religion will reconcile him to his departure, and even render it an object of cheerful expectation. This heavenly guide, like some guardian angel, will display to his mental vision the glories of the spiritual world; point to the city of the living God, and to the mansions which his Saviour hath prepared for him; to the spirits of just men made perfect; to holy persons of all ages and countries, some of them the dearest connexions and companions of his pilgrimage; to an innumerable company of angels; to Jesus, the mediator of the new covenant; to God, the Judge of all men.* This prospect closes the scene of earthly hap-

On Sickness.

JOB ii. 10.

He said unto her, what? shall we receive good at the hand of God, and shall we not receive evil?

THE propriety of this question does not immediately appear upon a bare consideration of the divine attributes. We know that God is infinite in all perfections; benevolence is a part of his transcendent nature; it is abundantly displayed in the works of his creation, and the proceedings of his providence. His creatures therefore, when they contemplate this eternal source of good, seem to have little reason to apprehend that evil can flow from it. When they consider the gracious power which fashioned and preserves them, they have grounds of confidence in the continuance of his bounty. If we look up to beings of a nature superior to our own, we are instructed to believe that they enjoy uninterrupted happiness. If we view man at his creation, we find him in a state of perfection. And when God surveyed his other works, he saw that they were good. From a being essentially benevolent, so gracious in his dispensations, so bountiful to his creatures, why may we not receive and hope for good, without the apprehension of evil?

To solve this difficulty, we have only to carry our thoughts from the attributes and acts of the Creator, to the moral conduct of the creature. We know what brought evil into the world, and what continues it there. The benevolence of God would have for ever shut it out from his creation; but the abuse of free-will in the first parents, drew it from his justice. Their posterity have inherited the sentence passed upon their transgression, the mortal children of mortal parents. They have inherited also the moral corruption of their nature, they imitate them in their disobedience; which is at once an argument that they are partakers of a fallen nature, and is also a personal demerit incurring the divine pleasure. The evil of punishment necessarily followed the evil of sin: and thus, what never would have proceeded from a gracious and benevolent Creator, we are taught to receive, with patience and humility, from the hand of a righteous moral governor. Hence human life is a mixture of pain and pleasure: the bounty of God, unwearied and inexhaustible, affords to it many comforts and blessings; intermingled, however, with plain marks of his justice: for a display of his goodness, ample and unlimited, we are instructed upon equitable conditions to look forward to another state.

The evils which this holy person suffered when he offered this meek and just expostulation were three, the most afflicting to human nature: a sudden fall from worldly prosperity; the decease of his nearest relatives; and the anguish of a loathsome sickness. The first of these, the loss of wealth, may be borne by considerate and religious persons with an equal mind: it may be repaired or relieved by industry and activity; by generous friendship; by providential dispositions, or natural vicissitudes, of things: at the worst, they may find, by a consoling experience, that the real necessities and comforts of life lie within a narrower compass than they once imagined. The second, the death of friends is a severe trial to the native sensibility of the human heart. Mutual good offices, long habit, religious principles, increase the warmth and constancy of natural affection, and proportionably aggravate the pain of separation. If the past intercourse hath been laudable and affection-etc, the heart of the survivor is more tender, and the regret more forcible. If either party hath failed in duty, the errors of the departed friend are viewed with candour and partiality; while the faults of the survivor pierce him with regret, and afflict him with unavailing penitence. On every supposition it is a great calamity; and it falls most heavily upon the most worthy and generous minds. However, the kindness of Providence hath supplied a healing quality to these wounds of the mind, as it hath to those of the body. Reason suggests, that separation is the unavoidable consequence of a mortal condition: that the order of the world requires, that we should enter it and leave it in succession; handing down to those who follow us the principles of religion and the arts of life: and consolatory topics of a higher order spring from the enlightened contemplation of a future state. The incidents and engagements of life divert the attention from a melancholy theme. Time, though it do not diminish our good opinion, or abate our affection, yet it weakens the recollection, and softens the impression. Habit, as it once enhanced the value of possession, so does it gradually reconcile us to the loss. And thus the mind is by natural means, and by the divine blessing, restored to tranquillity at least, and frequently to happiness.

The Third calamity, the loss of health, involves in some measure the evils of the other two; and adds many severe ones of its own. In this afflicting situation, a competent fortune is indeed, in one respect, of considerable importance, as it affords in a more ample manner the aid of science and all external accommodation; alleviating the disorder, and often leading to the removal. But for every other comfort, and for every enjoyment, the bed of sickness, like the grave which follows it, levels all distinction between the rich and the poor. So far as a mind oppressed by a distempered body can receive consolation from society, nothing can sooth it equally with the attention, the duty, the affection, of friends and relatives. But how little of enjoyment, how much of suffering, from the sympathy of those who are dear to you? when the natural desire of life and health is increased by the recollection of past happiness, by the thoughts of a separation, perhaps by a reasonable anxiety for their future welfare? Thus does the loss of health abate or destroy the relish of other blessings. Its own evils, the privations and sufferings attending it, are great and many. All sensible enjoyment, having the body for its seat and vehicle, must depend entirely on the due order of this curious and frail machine. In proportion as its parts or movements are injured or deranged, the genial feelings and activity of health give way to pain, and languor, and weariness. The gratifications which the bounty of the Creator hath indulged to it, become insipid, or even disgusting. As to intellectual pleasures, the material organ being distempered and obstructed, the mind loses her free communication with external nature, and seems deprived even of her own native energy. "The eye no longer delights her with seeing, nor the ear with hearing:"* conversation is perplexing and oppressive: meditation is clouded and confused. Her operations, depending in this present state of union with a body upon a wonderful contexture, temperament, and action of matter, shall sometimes subside into idiotism, at others shall be wound up to a delirium. A strong and cultivated understanding shall lose all the resources of inventive genius, and be despoiled of the precious stores of memory: and the immortal spirit of man, overwhelmed in the ruins of this earthly prison, shall scarce show a remaining faculty equal to the instinct of a brute. Add to this, that in every evil of life it is the mind alone that can afford support and consolation: "the spirit of a man will sustain his infirmity."† Now in other calamities, death of friends, poverty, slander, persecution; the mind, if conscious of integrity, calls in her ample and powerful resources; and recollects every lesson of wisdom and prudence which may instruct her to cure, to mitigate, or to suffer. But in sickness, the arrow which assails the body pierces also its ally; it wounds the immortal guardian,* who should shield it in the hour of danger. The mind, in this state of debility, is less able to represent to herself, with force and perspicuity, the arguments of reason and the promises of religion. In proportion as her activity is weakened, she bears up less firmly against the present evil: as her operations are disordered, and her views obstructed, she sees less distinctly, and with smaller impression, the future good. Though sometimes she cheer herself with the prospect of better days on earth, though at others she raise herself to the contemplation of heavenly scenes; yet still "the corruptible body presseth her down"† continually, and recallevh her attention to its infirmities. Extremity of pain is succeeded by languid and imperfect ease; and the hours which she hath now learned to value, and would wish to employ, move on so heavily and so unprofitably, that she is tempted, in the expressive language of the Prophetic Lawgiver, to "say in the morning, would God it were even, and at even, would God it were morning."‡ These natural causes of distress may be aggravated by moral and spiritual considerations. The sick person, suspended, perhaps suddenly, in his course, may be apt to entertain a doubt whether he has proceeded hitherto with caution and diligence, proportioned to the light and strength which he has enjoyed. His errors may be great and many; or his present weakness may enlarge or multiply them to his view. His habitual piety and humility may impress him with too keen a sense of his imperfections: or he may have lamentable cause of remorse and apprehension in the recollection of an ill-spent life.

* Eccl. i. 8.

† Prov. xviii. 14.

What then will be the probable reflexions of a reasonable and considerate person in the beginning of sickness? It is an inquiry universally interesting: many have experienced the situation, and all may expect it: perhaps it is in some degree the wish of all; for if with propriety we pray against sudden death, it is because we consider the hour of sickness as a season of recollection and preparation, which Christian humility hath taught us to esteem a blessing. If the representation which I shall lay before you appear to correspond with reason and experience, the application will be obvious; for it is a plain rule of prudence, so to act to-day, as I shall wish I had acted, to-morrow; it is a striking lesson of religious wisdom, so to form our sentiments and manners in the days of youth and health, that they may afford us agreeable recollections in age and sickness, and pleasing expectations of a life to come.

The first consideration which offers itself to a sick person is mortality; the immediate prospect of that great revolution which shall remove him into another world. This important object, which always presents itself when we look down the short vista of human life, is then brought nearer to the eye: and though neither reason nor imagination can paint distinctly the scene which lies beyond it, yet of its general nature and complexion, he may form a probable conjecture: whether it shall be light or darkness; happiness or misery. He knows that the determination of this point depends upon the pleasure of his Creator; and that it will be adjusted in equitable proportion to the moral conduct of his life. His guide was the reason which God had given him; the distinguishing faculty of his nature, which renders him accountable; capable of virtue and vice; subject to reward and punishment. "How then (he will ask himself) have I employed this gift of Heaven? Have I applied it faithfully to that great and interesting inquiry, what is the will of God? what are the means of being accepted by him? If I have fancied, that these things are discoverable by my reason, without any communications from himself, have I so found them? Alas! no. If God has been pleased to assist my reason, to instruct me by a Revelation of his will, have I received this Revelation with reverence, gratitude, and obedience? I have not surely neglected to inquire into its evidence? I have not shut my eyes against the light which presented itself? I have not refused to listen to the voice of my Creator, presumptuously rejecting the terms of mercy which he offers, and vainly framing to myself other conditions of his favour? If the pride of my heart has thus blinded me; if the corruption of my manners hath seduced my understanding; if education, or company, or books, have drawn me into these fatal errors; if the love of singularity hath perverted my reason, or habitual indolence hath destroyed its activity; let me pray to God to recal me from my wanderings! to give me time and ability to correct my errors, and to amend my faults! For how shall I appear before him, remembering the talent which I have abused, the instructions which I have disdaind to hear, the mercy which I have rejected, and the laws which I have disobeyed?

* Iliad v. 335. † Wisdom ix. 15.

‡ Deut. xxviii. 67.

If he has received with reverence the revelations of Heaven, he will consider whether he has sincerely and diligently attended to them: whether he has weighed impartially the doctrines and precepts of the Gospel: whether he has formed his sentiments and manners upon his faith; or laboured to adapt his faith, to his own preconceived opinions or erroneous conduct. As the will of God is the measure of moral obligation, and the adequate rule of human life, so the holy scriptures are the authentic promulgation of his will. If therefore in the regulating of our manners we do not appeal to them, or if we interpret them partially, what is this but to act in contradiction to our convictions and professions? If a fashionable crime, or a favourite passion, is to be justified upon general arguments of honour, necessity, or frailty, when the scriptures have laid down other measures of duty, and marked with precision the boundary between right and wrong, this is plainly to set up conjecture against demonstration, and inclination against law. Or, if we admit the precepts of the Gospel in their full extent, but narrow the sanction and dispute the punishment, this is a continuation of the same fatal error. In each case we are beguiled by the ancient sophistry of the great Deceiver "hath God" really "said ye shall not eat of every tree of the garden? Ye shall not surely die.*" These palpable fallacies, however they may pass in the hour of health and dissipation, will not satisfy the serious inquiries of a sick man. Impressed with a lively sense of the truths and blessings of the Gospel, he will put these important questions to his heart. "Have my reverence of the Supreme Being, and my desire to please him, been suitable to the high advantages which I have enjoyed, in the clear discovery of his attributes, in the revelation of his mercies, and the publication of his will? Have my thanksgivings expressed my gratitude, to the Author and Preserver of my being? have my supplications acknowledged my dependence upon the Governor of the universe? Have I thought of him continually with filial duty; with love and fear; with a confidence in his goodness; with an awe of his holiness and justice? Have I spoken of him with reverence proportioned to his transcendent nature? with the profound veneration due from a creature to his Creator? or have I called upon his sacred name with levity and profaneness? debasing my conversation with impiety? meanly condescending to imitate the language of ignorant idolaters, presuming to treat the name of the most High God with the same contemptuous familiarity, which they shewed to fabulous deities and departed heroes? Hath my piety to God laid the foundation of my charity to man? Have I loved my fellow-creatures, as objects of the divine bounty, and as partakers with me of one common nature? Have I obeyed the best feelings of my heart, the dictates of my reason, and the prospects of my religion, in desiring universal happiness, in promoting it to the extent of my ability and influence? Have I visited the fatherless and widows in their affliction? have I pitied the evils of poverty and the infirmities of age? have I administered consolation to those pains and sorrows, which are now become my own? Hath my self-government been agreeable to the purity of the Christian law? proportioned to the instruction which it affords, and to the grace which it offers? Have I judged it unworthy of an enlightened mind to be the slave of sense and passion? and ill suited to a generous spirit of humanity, to disturb the order of society, and to assail the virtue and happiness of others?"

If these inquiries end to his satisfaction, sickness will receive great alleviation, and death will be divested of half its terrors. He will look back upon the pleasures and pursuits of life, with a regret indeed which is natural: but with a complete conviction of their vanity, and insufficiency to happiness; with a faint desire, if any, to repeat them. He will say perhaps with a wise man of antiquity, "if I might change this bed of sickness for my cradle, and again run the course of life from infancy to age, I would earnestly decline the offer."* He will reflect upon the goodness of the Creator, which formed him in the womb; and one day called him from a state of darkness and insensibility, to the enjoyment of a reasonable nature, and to the satisfactions of this visible world: he will therefore rely with confidence on his indulging providence in the changes which may still await him, and in such other scenes as may open to his sight. He will imagine the amazement and delight with which he would have beheld the wonders of this material universe, if he had entered it, like the first parent, in a state of maturity, in the full vigour of his senses and understanding. Not less, he may presume, will be his admiration and rapture, when this veil of flesh shall suddenly be removed, and the world of spirits shall be presented to his view. He will recollect the mercies of the Redeemer, who hath assured him that "in his father's house are many mansions," and that "he hath prepared a place" for his disciples.† He will consider that he is removing from a scene of pilgrimage, by a path which millions have trod before him: that he is passing from the few to the many; from mortals struggling with natural and moral infirmity, to "the spirits of just men made perfect:"‡ that he is going to the wise and good of every age; to those whom history hath taught him to admire, and whom personal acquaintance hath endeared to him: that he shall be admitted to the society of natures superior to his own; of whom, though little is revealed, he reads in the page of Scripture this engaging character,—perfect obedience to the Creator, and benevolence to the human race.

In this situation, he is prepared to obey the call of Providence, whithersoever it may lead him. He hath "committed his soul to God in well-doing, as unto a faithful Creator."§ "Lord now lettest thou thy servant depart in peace, according to thy word."||

It may indeed be the pleasure of God to continue him long in this state of infirmity; to exercise his suffering virtues; to improve his moral character; and to increase his reward. Or it may be the design of Providence, after this solemn warning, this gracious correction and admonition, to recal him for a season to the duties of active life; to restore him for a few months or years to health and strength, and to grant him the opportunity and ability of testifying his reverence of the supreme Creator and Disposer, by a more punctual conformity to his will. If such should be the destination of Heaven, I need not inquire what will be his religious feelings and resolutions, on this his resurrection from the bed of sickness. From a situation thus deeply affecting every interest of his nature, so distressing to his corporal frame, so trying to his mental faculties, so nearly decisive of his everlasting fate; from such a situation, he will arise with a lively apprehension of the Divine goodness, and renewed vows of reverence and obedience. He will come forth out of the chamber of pain and weariness; he will pass from a scene of gloominess and anxiety; he will look out once more upon the cheerful face of nature;¶ and will probably address himself to Heaven in some such meditation as this.

"Blessed Author and Preserver of my being, I humbly praise thee, that thou art pleased to restore me to the sight of this material universe, to the enjoyment of my senses and understanding, and to the duties and comforts of life. Give me grace to dedicate to thy service the residue of my years. May a sense of thy experienced goodness increase my piety to thee, and my benevolence to thy creatures. Teach me to employ the faculties which thou hast once more given me, in promoting the designs of thy providence; my own well-being, and the happiness of mankind. May the uncertainty of life and health instruct me in the proper use of them: to improve my moral nature under the assistance of thy Spirit, and to obtain thy favour through the mediation of thy Son. Though, in thy wisdom and goodness, thou hast been pleased to bring back the "shadow of the dial, by so many degrees as it had" rapidly "gone down,"* let me remember that the sun still pursues his course; "the day is gradually declining; the shadows of the evening are already stretched out,"† Prepare me continually for that awful change, which, though suspended by thy good pleasure, is yet approaching. And so conduct us all by thy grace and providence through this state of trial and infirmity, that our life may be comfortable, our death happy, our resurrection glorious."

Approach towards Perfection.

PHILIP iii. 12.

Not as though I had already attained, either were already perfect; but I follow after—.

WHEN we contemplate the visible universe, one of the earliest subjects of our admiration is the unbounded variety of form and quality, with which it hath pleased the Creator to diversify his works: and a distinguishing character of this variety is, that it is not an accumulation confused and indigested, but a series orderly and progressive; carried by regular advances through species and kinds innumerable. In things inanimate upon this our globe, there is a continued gradation of apparent utility, beauty, and magnitude. There is a similar variety in the planetary bodies; in their size, in the length of their periods, and in their distance from the fountain of light and heat. There is a like order, proportion, and system, in the vegetable world. In the animal creation the process is more conspicuous: whether we trace it by the size of the body, by its strength, by its activity, or lastly and more particularly by the vigour and compass of instinct, from the first degree, which scarcely exceeds vegetation, to the last, which borders upon reason. From this methodical diversity which we see in the material world, we are led to suppose it not improbable, that the same procedure may prevail in the world of spirits. In this conjecture we are so far supported by the testimony of sacred history, as to be informed that there is ~~no~~ one kind of intelligent creatures, superior to ourselves. Two orders therefore of spirits exist assuredly, angelic and human. We read of angels and archangels: whether these are distinguished by natural constitution and endowment, or only by office and employment, we are not instructed. What divisions there may be of angelic natures; what other spiritual existences there may be above us, or what below us; we are entirely ignorant. We know indeed that the power and goodness of the Creator is unbounded: we find a gradation and proportion in these his works which we see: we may imagine that they bear some analogy to others which we do not see: it is possible, therefore, that there may be a series of reasonable beings, approaching nearer and nearer, though at a removal infinite, to the fountain of existence. But these are questions which reason cannot reach, and which revelation hath not resolved.

The various forms, endowments, and progressions, of material things, whether inanimate, vegetable, or animal, are the immediate work of the Creator, marked out by the sovereign "counsel of his will:" which hath assigned to each kind its own station and quality, and separated it from its neighbour by boundaries which no effort of its own can pass. Whatever changes matter may undergo from one manner of being to another, from unorganized to vegetable, from vegetable to animal; whatever revolutions may affect the animal body, from health and vigour to infirmity and dissolution; these migrations and alterations are executed by the settled order of nature, prescribed by the supreme Artificer, and imposed upon the creature by a law irresistible. But when we rise to the contemplation of a Being like ourselves, in which is added to the material and animal substance, a spirit, rational and free, the procedure is far otherwise. Our material part, like all other animals, grows up to maturity, decays, and is dissolved. It has no powers to better its condition, or to preserve itself from growing worse. But the intellectual and moral part of us has a choice and action of its own, upon which depends the degree of its well-being; it has, inherent in its constitution, the power of approaching nearer to perfection, or receding further from it: inasmuch as its perfection is a willing conformity to the proper law of its nature; it is the choice and practice of virtue; it is a desire to imitate the divine attributes; it is a voluntary submission to the will of God. A creature reasonable and free is so far, and in such proportion, perfect, as he useth his understanding successfully in finding out what is right, and as he exerciseth his freedom effectually in choosing and following it. We see then what is the standard of Human Perfection; whether we call it a life of reason or religion; whether we give it the name of virtue or piety; (in different views either appellation may strictly apply;) it is ultimately obedience and resignation to the will and dispensations of God. As man had greatly fallen short of this measure, knowing the divine will imperfectly, and still more imperfectly performing it, God was pleased to promise in the early ages, and to send in his appointed time, a Teacher and Saviour: a Teacher to instruct and guide him in the way of perfection; a Saviour to encourage him in it, by obtaining for him pardon in the beginning, assistance in his course, and eternal happiness in the end.

† Jorem. vi. 4.

As the disciple of Christ is well acquainted with the nature of perfection, so is he instructed in the means of approaching towards it. He knows indeed that, though the means are certain, and the approach infallible, the attainment is, in this world at least, impossible. But this consideration, far from a discouragement, is a fresh incitement, to perseverance and activity. Every advance towards perfection is an improvement of his nature; and a motive not to content himself with any degree of goodness, which he may have already attained. He will not be satisfied with the habitual exercise of any particular virtue, or the occasional practice of all. Uniform perseverance and continual improvement will be his aim. The argument for this plan of conduct is clear and irresistible.*

First, It may be presumed that every reasonable creature has originally a propensity to enquire after, and to practise, that which is right. It is the exercise of the faculty, and the law of its nature. Though the faculty be weakened by any lapse or corruption; though it sometimes err in its decisions, or be diverted from executing them; yet still, so far as those disorders are remedied or abated, it pursues its native tendencies. This is our case. We are in a state of degeneracy and imperfection. We discern our duty, not without a mixture of error. We perform it with great deficiency. The revelations of heaven are given us to correct our errors, and the Holy Spirit to aid our infirmities. Directed and strengthened by these divine assistances, our native love of truth and virtue leads us to various degrees of goodness. If we suffer it to pursue its tendency, it will carry us to higher and higher: to stop it in its progress is to offer it equal violence, as to keep it down in its beginning; with this aggravation, that it was strengthened by exercise. So that every argument in favour of virtue, drawn from the reasonableness of it, that is, from its conformity to the dictates of our understanding, enlightened and assisted by revelation, impels us with equal or increasing force, to the first good resolution and successful effort, to every degree of improvement, and to every further advance towards perfection. It is a contradiction to reason "not to have known" and entered "the way of truth;" it is a greater contradiction, "after we have known"* and walked in it, not to pursue it with growing diligence and activity to the end.

Secondly, Though virtue must ever approve itself to us as conformable to the suggestions of our reason, yet the real ground of its obligation is the reverence due to the Creator, who hath given us our reason; who hath impressed these sentiments upon it; who hath confirmed them by communications from himself; and therefore, in both these ways, hath published the laws of virtue, as the dictates of his sovereign and gracious will. It is our reverence to his authority, our deep sense of his goodness, our veneration for his holiness, our desire to please him, our anxiety to obtain his favour and protection in every stage and period of the being which he hath given us;—it is all these combined considerations, (for though they may be viewed distinctly, they cannot actually be separated) which make up the essence of moral obligation, and bind us down to the observance of every duty. Now these considerations affect us in every instance, and every degree, of piety. They concern the repenting sinner, and the happier "just person who needeth" little "repentance."† They influence the good man on earth, and the saint in heaven. The only difference in these situations is this: the longer and the more diligently you have walked in the way of religion, by so much the more deeply rooted, and the more present to your mind, is your reverence and gratitude to the all-perfect Author of your being; the more lively and incessant is your desire to please him; the more earnest is your expectation, and the more encouraging your hope, to obtain his eternal favour. Your past progress in obedience incites and enables you to advance still further: and every distinct contemplation of the divine attributes, which moved you to begin a religious life, presents to your reason and affections, with greater force, your obligation to carry it on towards perfection. We can form no conception of any rational creature, who may not go on improving to all eternity: as for ourselves, every one can bear authentic testimony to the present imperfection of his own religious obedience; and to the capacity which he feels, under the grace of God, to correct and improve it. Religious obligation is like that powerful gravitating energy,† spread through the material world, which acts necessarily on every portion and particle; and draws it, with an increasing force, towards one point in the system. Religious obligation in like manner presses incessantly on every part of the rational creation, whatever be its endowment, native or acquired; still soliciting it to higher degrees of moral excellence, and drawing it, with a like increasing force, to a nearer approach to the centre of perfection. We may indeed, having freedom of choice and action, resist the impulse, divert its tendency, fly off from the prescribed orbit, or move languidly and slowly in it: but in proportion as we do so, we refuse obedience to the Author of universal nature: we degrade ourselves from the station in which he hath placed us: we renounce our expectation of such higher allotments as he destines to us. As therefore the love of virtue will not suffer the reasonable mind to be completely satisfied with any attainment whatever; so with the love of God more forcibly constrain us to make daily advances in religious obedience, as a continued and increasing testimony of our reverence to his nature, our grateful sense of his favours, and our dependence upon his providence.

Thirdly, It is not easy to preserve any habit, moral or intellectual, if we do not improve it. Habits are very rarely stationary: they either strengthen by exercise, or weaken by disuse. 'This is an awful consideration, when applied to habits of religion. To perceive that I have less respect for the dictates of my reason, and follow them with less willingness or activity, now, than at a former period, is a mortifying and degrading reflection! To be conscious that I feel less reverence for my Creator, and offer less lively and punctual obedience to his laws, is a debasing and a dreadful thought! And yet this retrogradation in virtue and piety, in every quality honourable to our nature and indispensable to our happiness, is a probable, I had almost said, a certain, consequence of making no progression. Daily improvement, therefore, in piety is not only necessary as an act of duty, but expedient as a measure of security. If we do not proceed in this spiritual building, it may waste and crumble to its base, even "though it were founded upon a rock." As a human work, it is by nature perishable: the divine co-operation may be judicially suspended; and "the rain and the winds may beat upon it."

* 2 Pet. ii. 21.

Fourthly, We have seen that a life of virtue has two recommendations: the one, that it is conformable to the dictates of our minds; the other, concurring, and far more powerful, that it is the declared will of God, both considerations moving us to begin, to persevere, to suffer no hazardous intermission, to go on towards perfection. To these there is a third recommendation added by the free gift of God; the promise of an everlasting reward. We may venture to pronounce from our own feelings and the reason of the thing, that the desire of well being is inseparable from being: that nothing can exist, and not wish, in the way suited to its nature, to be happy. We may suppose, further, that every rational creature in the universe will, in the end and on the whole, be happy or miserable, in proportion to his degree of virtue or vice. Probably this would be a natural effect, resulting from the established order of things; we may conclude that it will be the decision of a righteous governor: the tenour of scripture confirms this conclusion with respect to ourselves. If therefore you aspire at the highest possible degree of felicity, you will aim at the highest attainable degree of goodness.

Thus do your love of virtue, your reverence of the Deity, and your ear of good, impel you to proceed. The path of duty and happiness, in which you are walking, hath no termination: the prospect before you is unbounded: every step you take increases your ability, and your inducement, to go on: until at length your faculties will be so strengthened, and your affections so determined, that under the heavenly light and guidance which you enjoy, it will be very improbable that, even in this state of trial and infirmity, you should stand still or go backward. The day will come when all the hazards of your earthly journey will be past: when, by final continuance in an accepted obedience, "you will have made your calling and election sure."† You are instructed to hope that, in the next period of your existence, you will be, as we suppose of the blessed angels, in a state of confirmed virtue: that either by so clear a view of truth and good, as shall preclude all possibility of error and mischoice, or by an abound in effusion of grace, or by some other means unknown, your perseverance will be made as certain as your reward.

On Consolation.

1 THESS. iv. 18.

Wherefore comfort one another with these words.

To comfort is to lessen the sense of an evil which you feel or fear, by the consideration of some present, or approaching, good : which good may either be, in all reasonable estimation, some balance to the evil suffered or apprehended, or may in fact diminish or remove it. Arguments of comfort may be raised in different methods and on various grounds ; but this must be the foundation of them all ; the possession or expectation of some good, which may countervail, or mitigate, or take away, the evil : and to lead the mind to the contemplation of this good, to divert its attention from any cause of pain to some source of pleasure, and thus to teach it to suffer less, and to enjoy more, this is comfort. Comfort then is adapted to a reasonable being, who is subject to a mixture and alternation of good and evil ; who has his pleasures and pains : his hopes and fears. It is therefore suited to man in his present state. To an angel, or a saint in heaven, whom we believe to be free from the suffering or the dread of evil, consolation would be superfluous : for there is no pain, or fear of pain, to lessen or remove. To a fallen spirit, or an unpardoned sinner departed, whose condition we believe to be desperate misery, Consolation would be impossible : for there is no pleasure, or hope of pleasure, to hold forth. But to us in this middle state of being, placed in a mixed and variable scene, passing through a perpetual circulation of good and evil, and agitated by endless revolutions of hope and fear, consolation is the one acceptable, and practicable, offer. He who should either bid us be completely happy, or consign us to unmingled and incurable misery, would betray either an ignorance of our situation, or a malicious desire to mislead us. These therefore are commonly the short-lived illusions of our own imaginations, or the persevering arts of the great deceiver. In youth, health, and prosperity, our hopes are likely to be extravagant ; in age, sickness, and adversity, our fears are apt to be excessive. In each case the insidious tempter aims to take advantage of the frailty of our nature, and to confirm us in our errors ; at one time raising us to the lofty "mountain, and shewing us all the kingdoms of the world and the glory of them ;" * at another, following us into the garden of affliction, † presenting to us a bitter foretaste of the cup of sorrow, and aggravating the horror of impending evil. But the holy scriptures, dictated by that all-seeing and gracious spirit, who knows our condition and destination, and condescends to correct our errors, and "to help our infirmities," ‡ make no representation which is not conformable to truth and fact : they give us no precept or exhortation, which is not suited to our situation and prospects. They describe our nature, as we feel it ; and the world, as we find it. They paint no present scene of perfect enjoyment, such as the goodness of God may be imagined to have granted to his creatures in a state of innocence : nor any present scene of hopeless suffering, such as may be the result of his justice in a final state of unexpiated sin. They prescribe no insensibility to pain or pleasure. They suppose not any entire exclusion of either. They point out the genuine sources of both ; and the causes, original and accessory, of their increase or diminution. And representing it as the gracious design of the Creator, that pleasure shall ultimately prevail, even to the complete and perpetual banishment of pain, they instruct us how to add continually to the scale which shall at length preponderate. They teach us not only to prevent, or diminish, the impending or present evil ; but also to abate its influence on the mind, by a wise application, and a prudent anticipation, of the present or future good. Thus exhibiting the Supreme Being in every view of ourselves, and in all his dispensations towards us, as the object of our dutiful affection and humble gratitude ; in our faculties and enjoyments, as the author of "every perfect gift ;" § in our defects and sufferings, as "the God of all consolation." ||

The evils incident to our original nature and present condition, and the † Matth. xxvi. 36.

§ James i. 17.

goods by which they are largely balanced, and will one day be completely remedied, may be briefly digested into the following particulars.

Our first reflexion upon ourselves suggests to us that we are creatures; contingent beings, which might never have existed, began to exist as yesterday, and may cease to exist to-morrow. Annihilation is an object of dread to every creature conscious of its being, whether endowed with instinct only, or with reason also. Instinct flies its approaches: reason contemplates it afar with horror. What then has man, a reasonable, a thinking, creature, to console him under this anxious uncertainty, naturally inseparable from the condition of his being?—He hopes that He who made him will preserve him. He trusts that the attributes which moved the Creator to call him out of nothing, will disincline him to reverse his bounty, to undo his own acts, and to reduce him to nothing again. This expectation is strengthened by the consideration of the spiritual part of him, framed, as it should seem, for long duration, high attainments, and solid enjoyments. It is further confirmed when he views himself as a moral agent, an object of reward and punishment; the due distribution of which appears to require a protracted existence. These arguments amount to a high probability, that his being will be continued to an endless period. But they do not satisfy his natural aspirations: they do not calm his unceasing apprehensions. They are, however, all that uninstructed reason can offer.

Our second reflexion upon ourselves reminds us that we are mortal creatures. Although we should be permitted to exist for ever, we shall not long continue in this present form of being: and we know not what other form awaits us; whether better or worse than the present; whether fixed or changeable. The apprehended evil is certain; namely, the dissolution of our compound nature; a separation from this visible world, from all that is in it, pleasant to our senses, entertaining to our understandings, dear to our affections. Now what consolation have we to meet us in the distant, or the nearer, view of this awful crisis?—Here again we rely upon the goodness of the Creator, that, if he be pleased to continue our being in some other state, he will not withdraw his bounty in its modification: that he will give us faculties and objects of enjoyment, equal at least, perhaps superior, to those which he hath granted hitherto. Every preceding argument for the continuance of our existence, suggests a hope of its improvement, if not prevented by our misconduct. Yet the whole series hangs only on a strong probability. It depends on the pleasure of the Supreme Being, whose perfections are infinite, but “his judgments are unsearchable. For who hath known his mind” concerning us, “or who hath been his counsellor?”* The smallest of his gifts deserves our reverent thanksgiving: and there is none so great that may not be the object of our hope: but this hope requires, for its confirmation, a knowledge of his will.

Our third reflexion upon ourselves admonishes us that we are sinful creatures; who, by disobedience to the Creator have weakened our reliance upon his goodness, and have lamentable cause to apprehend his justice. Whether, or to what extent, he will be pleased to pardon our disobedience; if he do not pardon it, in what manner or degree he will punish it; whether by the extinction of our being at some unknown period, or by the continuation of it in some less pleasurable, or even painful, state; these are questions which no unenlightened view of his attributes, no calculations of unassisted reason, can resolve. We feel at present many infirmities of mind and body, which seem to be the necessary effect, or judicial punishment, of our faults. This experience shews us an established connexion between natural and moral evil. We cannot ascertain how far, or how long, in what way, or with what aggravation, this connexion may hereafter affect our happiness.

This seems to be a just picture of the natural state of man, as seen by the lamp of reason: a fair representation of his

evils and his comforts, as they appear without a revelation: a scene like the chaos, wherein the rays of light were so entangled with the opaque elements, that "darkness was upon the face of the deep; until God said, let there be light, and divided the light from the darkness."* But when we look into the authentic history of man, we find that the all-gracious Creator did from the beginning enlighten his understanding and cheer his prospects; and hath from time to time afforded him consolation suited to every evil of his condition.

Is he, as a creature, liable to an extinction of his being? is he, as a reasonable creature, conscious of this liability?—No sooner had the Creator "breathed into him the breath of life,"† than he gave him a conditional promise of continuance in it, implied by the sanction of the prohibitory law: "in the day that thou eatest thereof thou shalt die."‡ And when, after his transgression, the sentence of mortality was pronounced upon him, the intimation of a Redeemer signified the preservation of his being. Thus did he receive by an early revelation, an assurance which his reason never could have given him: and he was guarded against the fear of annihilation, before he had time to contemplate his danger. Every subsequent communication from heaven confirmed his security: teaching him that his hope of a continued existence is not ill founded, whether drawn from the benevolence of the Creator, or from the nature and endowments of the creature: until at length the promised Saviour, by a larger discovery of the divine counsels, "brought life and immortality to" the meridian "light,"§ which his disciples now enjoy.

Are we mortal creatures? subject to a dissolution of our compound nature, an extinction of our animal frame, and a removal from this visible world?—We are assured by revelation, that, if we conform to the prescribed conditions, our spiritual part will pass immediately into a better state; that it will one day be restored to its primeval union with a body; and will enjoy satisfactions suited to its faculties, inconceivable in extent, and endless in duration.

Are we sinful creatures? prone to imitate the disobedience of our first progenitor? unable therefore to rely with confidence on the goodness of God; because we cannot exclude the consideration of his justice?—Revelation hath calmed these well-grounded fears of reason; discovering the stupendous mediation, by which the goodness of God is conciliated with his justice, and displayed in the gracious attribute of mercy. It consoles the repenting sinner with the offer of pardon. It invites him to a renewed obedience by the promise of present aid and final acceptance. It soothes him under every effect, experienced or apprehended, of moral evil, by the prospect of scenes wherein it will exist no more. It shews him the path which leads to them, and affords him light and strength to walk in it.

This revelation has been delivered by messengers, who proved their delegation from God, by communications of his infinite power and knowledge in miracles and prophecy. These attestations, exhibited in a variety of times and manners, have been recorded from age to age: and are come down to us with such a correspondence and accumulation of evidence, with such harmonious diversity of testimony, such universal marks of certainty, that we are bound, in reverence to "the Father of Spirits,"|| to believe what he hath ordained to appear to us, his reasonable creatures, under every impress and criterion of truth. We rely upon his goodness that he will accept the homage of our faith and obedience, when all the inquiries and deductions of our understanding terminate in this sure conclusion, "this true saying, and worthy of all men to be received, that Christ Jesus came into the world to save sinners."¶

This then is the actual state of man instructed as he is, and assisted, by revelation. He no longer fears the extinction of his being, which the sovereign donor, in his original designation, and merciful restoration, hath made "to be the image of his own eternity*." He awaits with firmness the dissolution of his body, being assured that his spirit will survive in some better state, adapted to its nature; and will one day be united with its material vehicle, "fearfully and wonderfully"†, re-made, spiritualized and glorified, in a manner past all inquiry and conception, by him to whom all creation is subject, and all things are possible. He no longer trembles at the consciousness of his disobedience, having the assurance of mercy: nor is he discouraged by a sense of his infirmity, having a promise of grace. He will say with an humble rapture, "Blessed be God, who hath given me a reasonable nature, designed for an eternity of happiness. When it was fallen from innocence, he gave it the hope of pardon. When it became prone to sin, he gave it a capacity of offering an acceptable obedience. When it was dismembered by the infliction of his justice, he gave it the expectation of a renewed integrity. "He leadeth me then in the paths of righteousness, for his name's sake." Oh may I always obey his guidance! and then, "though I shall walk through the valley of the shadow of death, I will fear no evil." I am persuaded that he who hath created, redeemed, and sanctified me; who sustaineth, blesseth, and comforteth me in this stage of my existence; will not forsake me in any other. Warden of St. Mary's College, Winchester.

On receiving the Gospel with Meekness and Humility.

ST. JAMES i. 21.

Receive with meekness the engrafted word, which is able to save your souls.

THE persons, whom the Apostle addresses in this Epistle, appear, through the prevalence of a most impious opinion, to have fallen into corrupt practices; and under the influence of vanity and presumption, to have refused paying that attention to the Gospel, which could be productive of right judgment and modest temper. With respect to their first error, we may observe, it has ever been a weakness natural to man, that he should impute the blame of committing a sinful action to any and every, but the right cause. Constitution, situation, condition, circumstances, all are brought forward as extenuations of guilt; nay, and though the object of religion is to promote benevolence, purity, and holiness, yet the very name of religion hath been frequently used as a cloak for the grossest enormities! But of such palliations, some are wicked and blasphemous; all are weak, false, and groundless.

God created man in a state of innocence: He implanted in him passions, the furtherance of his happiness: He gave the light of reason, and the direction of positive law, by which those passions should be governed: He forewarned him that the effect of disobedience to what reason and duty suggested, must be extreme misery: He made his mind susceptible of immediate apprehensions upon any danger of swerving from reason and duty. Man, nevertheless, suffered his passions to blind his reason, weaken his sense of duty, and allay, by subtle persuasions, the alarms of conscience. Under this infatuation man rebelled against his Maker; he yielded himself a slave to sin and Satan, and thus worked his own woe!

In the fall of Adam, we not only see the original source of that depravity, which has since vitiated human nature, but we behold also an exact picture of what happens to ourselves. Inordinate affections; and ungovernable appetites, are the instruments by which the enemy of mankind seduces us from our duty. Affections and appetites are essential parts of our nature, interwoven in it for the purpose of increasing the enjoyments of the individual, and the comforts of social life. Reason and religion exhort us to restrain, within their due bounds, our inclinations and propensities: the experience of ages, no less than the Word of God, demonstrates to us that the consequence of intemperate and criminal indulgence must be bodily and spiritual misery: yet, like Adam, we allow our passions to mislead our reason and overcome our scruples; like him we transgress the commands of God, and render ourselves captives to the vilest of masters, our own lusts, and that fallen Spirit, whose malignant delight is to triumph over virtue, and seduce man from the love and obedience which are due to God!

As the most effectual method by which we may be rescued from the dominion of impetuous and imperious passions, we are admonished by the Apostle to "receive with meekness" the Gospel, "the engrafted Word."

And what should impede the reception of it? That by the profligate and abandoned the Gospel should be rejected, is nothing extraordinary: those, who "love darkness rather than light, because their deeds are abominably evil*," cannot be expected to embrace a system, which prohibits altogether their vicious actions. But the generality of men are not so entirely wicked as to be utterly reprobate: we commonly at least commend good actions, however little we practise them: we at least would be thought to have some religion, however negligent we are in observing the duties of it. What then could hinder those, who can talk much of God and virtue, from embracing the Gospel, which conveys to us the most sublime ideas of God, which prescribes to us the most unexceptionable and most consummate rules of virtue; nay, and more than this, which confirms all the hopes, and dispels all the fears, that have ever been attached to human nature unenlightened by the Gospel? The impediment arises from a want of that meekness, which is necessary for the effectual reception of religious truths; our vanity and presumption disdain to hear attentively, and examine candidly, a plain recital of incontestable facts.

The persons, whom the Apostle St. James had in view, are directed to be "swift to hear, slow to speak, slow to wrath*." An exhortation of this nature had not been requisite, were not the objects of it censurable for contrary conduct. Probably they belonged to that description of men, which first corrupted Christianity by idle speculations, tending rather to provoke disputes, than promote religion. A display of abilities, a shew of superior understanding, and the hope of attracting popular applause, might be the purposes for which they would obtrude their fanciful conceits: the simplicity of the Gospel was too humble for minds that aspired to the reputation of being uncommonly penetrating; they must therefore substitute their own conceptions in the place of Gospel doctrines, and contend for them with more vehemence than is commonly used by men who know and follow truth: for it is generally the case, that mistaken men are more† noisy, eager, and zealous to support and propagate the paradoxes of error, than right thinking and right judging men are solicitous to diffuse sound and true wisdom.

As the other vices of former generations are entailed on the present, so the intellectual pride of our forefathers has descended down to us. Like the disputers of old, we are not satisfied with what is written in Scripture, though that already be more than sufficient to exercise all our rational and moral powers; but we must model a Revelation in our own way, and set up our own opinion, as the standard by which the Almighty God is to direct his counsels! Impious presumption, and ridiculous self-sufficiency! Shall the creature dare dictate to the Creator the measures of his acting? Shall the sinner, who receives mercy, take upon himself to mark out the method, in which that mercy shall be shewn him, by a Judge all-powerful, who could avenge iniquity with the severest evils, if he were not more disposed to pity than to punish? Pride of no kind was made for man; and least of all, intellectual pride; for if we consider what, after all, are the faculties of man, we shall perceive that humility and diffidence are better suited to our nature.

Whatever part of the universe we may chauce to contemplate, we soon find in it abundant reason to convince us, that although the extent of the human understanding be of wide comprehension, yet it is circumscribed by limits, beyond which no sagacity can penetrate, no strength of intellect can carry its researches. If we explore the deep caverns of the earth, we there discover inexhaustible beds of metals and minerals; the nature and property of these productions, by experience we can precisely ascertain; and thence convert these valuable treasures to our utmost advantage. But who, after all the most elaborate enquiries, hath been able to explain the formation of minerals? Who hath shewn any second cause adequate to the effect, that in different quarters of the earth should be deposited ores of such different qualities? Who, when he hath described the several properties of any the most common metal, can point out from any source, palpable to our senses, why and whence such particular properties are given to such particular subterraneous bodies?

If we ascend thence to the vegetable kingdom, we see the face of the earth most richly adorned and plentifully stored with herbs and plants. The class of each is distinctly known by the botanist; the medicinal virtue of each is accurately understood by the physician. But by whom is it known, by whom is it understood why a peculiar soil, and a peculiar climate, are necessary for the perfect growth of many herbs and plants? By whom is it known, by whom is it understood, from any appearance or texture of a herb, why and whence it should be endued with certain appropriated qualities?

From herbs and plants let us proceed to animals. That the scale of existence in the animal creation should be so gradual and so extensive; that animals so various should be assigned to various regions; that the powers imparted to each class should be so exactly adapted to the exigences and nature of each; all these circumstances excite our admiration, and we know in fact that such provision is made for every animal from the lowest to the highest; but nothing in the world appears competent to produce effects so wise and beneficent.

If we look to the heavens, we are struck with the splendour of the sun, moon, and stars: we can calculate the motions of the planets, foretell many phenomena which will happen in our system, and thence establish observations highly useful to man. But whence the sun derives its heat and light, and why the planets describe their orbits in a particular line, we know not from any power in them self-originate.

To the Almighty word, which first called into being every part of creation, to the divine will, which first decreed that every particle of inanimate and animate, irrational and rational matter, should be endued with certain peculiar properties, we must ascribe the modes and essences operating around us in a manner so wonderful. "Canst thou by searching find out God, canst thou find out the Almighty unto perfection? It is as high as heaven, what canst thou do; deeper than hell, what canst thou know? The measure thereof is longer than the earth, and broader than the sea*." It is God that ordains the laws of nature; why those laws are ordained after this or that particular manner we know not, otherwise than that they are founded in wisdom infinite. Into God's wisdom and omnipotence we must, with all humility, resolve the original principles on which every system in the universe is conducted, and forbear presumptuous and vain enquiry into the divine counsels, which from the mind of man will ever be hidden. That the world, and all things therein, are made as they are by God's appointment, should, and indeed must satisfy us in all our investigations into primary causes: why He so made them, and wherefore such an appointment, it becomes us not to ask, it concerns us not to know; it is the lot and infirmity of man to be ignorant.

From the state of ignorance, in which as men we must ever remain, with respect to the divine appointments in the natural world, we should conclude that we must be ignorant of God's counsels in the spiritual world. If the reasons, which moved the Almighty to create the works of nature in their present form, be not known to us, it were arrogance to expect that the reasons, on which the scheme of man's redemption is founded, should be fully revealed to us. It is enough, in the natural world, that God has decreed certain laws, by which all things are directed: the remote causes, on which these laws are decreed, we enquire not: and it should be enough in the work of grace, that God has decreed a certain mode, by which man may be raised from his fallen state: the remote causes, on which this particular mode is decreed, we are neither concerned to enquire, nor competent to explain. It is the will of God, that the natural sun should give light to the eyes of men; the fact is so, and we take it as such: the will of God is also, that revelation should enlighten the minds of men; the fact is so, and as such we are bound to admit it. But in that fondness for their own conceits, which obstructs the progress of right knowledge, men have first formed to themselves an idea how they would disclose a revelation; and having previously settled it in their minds, that no other method can be so proper as that which their own fancy suggests, they are not duly influenced by the gospel-dispensation. "The Jews (says St. Paul) require a sign, and the Greeks seek after wisdom*." Each had been prejudiced by notions preconceived; and instead of receiving the doctrines of the Apostle in the manner he preached them, they would have him substitute some other system, such as might correspond with the different opinions they had severally framed. But what is the conduct of St. Paul? He persists in delivering simple truths, without gratifying the unreasonable demand of the Jews on the one hand, and without entering into subtle and refined arguments with the Greeks on the other. He preached "Christ crucified; Christ the power of God, and the wisdom of God†." "That Christ died for our sins, according to the Scriptures; that he was buried, and that he rose again the third day, according to the Scriptures; that he was seen of Cephas, then of the twelve; after that, he was seen of above five hundred brethren at once; then of James, then of all the Apostles, then by St. Paul himself‡." These are plain matters of fact, easy to be understood by the most ignorant of his hearers; and on the indisputable certainty of these facts, the Apostles all rested the truth of their religion. Whether God, in his wisdom, could have devised other means, by which to vindicate the honour of his own moral government, to redeem man from his fallen condition, and re-instate him in immortal happiness, the Apostles were not commissioned to enquire; they were concerned to establish the certainty of the extraordinary circumstances, which proved the divine mission of Christ, and on that ground-work to inculcate the duties of faith and repentance. The life, death, resurrection, and ascension of our Saviour being most credibly attested, and most incontrovertibly authenticated, it follows that we are to receive his doctrines as positive laws, and obey them with implicit confidence that they are founded on the unsearchable wisdom of the Almighty, in whose name and authority our Saviour came. The facts, which establish the revelation, we are bound to examine: but as the facts by which the revelation is established, are certainly more clear than the evidence of any transactions in past ages, we are not at liberty to call in question the terms of the revelation itself: and to all those, who may be prompted to explore, what must ever exceed the bounds of our finite understanding, to those whom either curiosity or self-sufficiency would incline to ask, "How can these things be?" may be applied this general answer: "The secret things belong unto the Lord our God: but those things which are revealed, belong to us, and to our children for ever, that we may no the word of this law." To God only can be known the counsels, on which the christian redemption by the sacrifice of his eternal Son, was first designed: but we know, that to "our Lord Jesus Christ, in whom we have redemption through his blood, even the forgiveness of sins, according to the riches of his grace," are due, from us and from our posterity, adoration and obedience.

That if the work of obedience we may begin successfully, we are to follow the direction given by St. James, "we are to receive the Gospel, the word of Christ, with all meekness." The same humility, with which we acquiesce in the ordinary administrations of Providence, though to us incomprehensible, should be shewn in admitting the truths of revelation, though by us inexplicable: as in the one case we account for the general course of nature by ascribing all to the sole will of Him, who ordained and who can suspend the laws of nature; so in the other, we should rest satisfied with the doctrines of the Gospel, from conviction built on undeniable facts, that the Gospel is a dispensation coming from God, who alone has power to appoint the means, by which He will receive into favour the sinful race of men, and who can by revelation impart much more than could be discovered by reason, even as through reason is discovered much more than what is obvious to our senses. The result of long and careful enquiries into the several parts of the world's constitution should be, and usually is, a proportionable degree of veneration towards the Maker of the world, and of submission to the laws by Him established: and the effect of continued and serious examination into the grounds on which the Gospel stands, and into the important truths which it communicates to us, should be, and usually is, a diminution of our own self-sufficiency; a confession of our own inability to conceive, that any other than the Gospel-dispensation, would be equally expedient for the purposes to be accomplished; and a full assurance that the manner in which God hath spoken to us by his Son, is precisely that which seemed best to unerring wisdom and unbounded goodness.

In humility of this kind we are first of all to shew the meekness, with which we are to receive the word. *

And when we have humbled the pride of our understanding, we may proceed to subdue the violence of our tempers; so that our meekness may be farther shewn by receiving all the admonitions of the Gospel with dispassionate attention. "Let every man (says the Apostle) be swift to hear, slow to speak, slow to wrath." †

The sacred writings abound with precepts of general application, with truths of universal concern: and as † every reader and every hearer of them has in his nature more or less tendency to some particular vices, it is impossible but that the consciences of some or other must be frequently stricken, when the doctrines of Holy Scripture are delivered and expounded. To reject, or even to dislike the word, because it forbids the sins to which we are inclined, because it pierces fortibly our own hearts, because it warns us of danger to which we were heretofore either ignorantly or wilfully blind, to reject or even to dislike the word of God on these accounts, were to betray † impatience unreasonable, excessive, and criminal. In all other cases, where morals are not concerned, we incur expence and encounter difficulties to procure knowledge, to correct errors, to proceed in the course that may be most safe and right; and prudent it is, when we thus adopt every measure, by which our temporal affairs may be more successfully regulated. Why then are our passions and manners, why are the affections of our hearts and the propensities of our tempers to be left unimproved? On the due government of these depends our real happiness; for neither a vindictive nor impure, neither a selfish nor an envious spirit can enjoy lasting satisfaction in this or a future life: it were wiser therefore to hear with greater frequency, rather than to mark with disapprobation, the word of God, for the very reason that it does exhibit our infirmities in their true light, rebuke our faults with the severity they deserve; and prohibit our sins with unsparing impartiality, which gives no man permission to do evil.

In receiving the word then, we may shew our meekness, by patiently attending to the doctrines of it, though to our inclinations they may be contrary, to our views adverse, to our intentions repugnant.

The Apostle calls the gospel the "engrafted word;" meaning thereby the word which had already been planted, and which must be planted still deeper in their breasts, in order to produce that temper, and those dispositions, which become the disciples of Christ. The energy with which every principle influences our conduct, is in proportion to the force with which that principle has sunk into our minds. Whatever maxims we have so thoroughly imbibed as to have them constantly recurring to our thoughts and impelling us to action, those maxims will in general so far predominate, as that the course of our lives should correspond with them. If we would conform our lives to the gospel precepts; if we would exemplify that humility, patience, gentleness, and forbearance, which are required to complete the christian character; the word, which is our law, must be grafted so inwardly and thoroughly in our souls, that our first and last thoughts, desires, and endeavours, shall be to "walk worthy of the vocation wherewith we are called." §

When the gospel is thus received by us as the revelation of God's will, and admitted into our hearts, with a temper more inclined to obey the known doctrines than to search the hidden secrets of its dispensation, it will then be "able to save our souls;" able by its motives, able by its means, able by its helps.

The motives by which the Gospel perpetually incites us to work out our salvation, are the fear and love which we should bear towards God. "I will forewarn you," says our Saviour, "whom you shall fear; fear him, which after he hath killed, hath power to cast into hell; yea, I say unto you, fear him." Fear him so effectually, as that through awe of Him, no temptation should prevail on you to sin. For how hateful in the sight of an All-righteous God must our sins be, that he should send his own eternal son to condemn them; and even require the sacrifice of our Redeemer, as an atonement through which we might recover divine favour? And who, that knows the displeasure of God against iniquity; will yet presumptuously and designedly dare to offend him? See we not that God is the controul-er of nature? See we not, that from the greatest mass to the smallest atom, from the height of heaven to the depth of the sea, every particle that exists is at the disposal of his will, either for continuance in being, or utter destruction? And what are we, that we should dare defy the Omnipotent? We are neither so mighty as to resist his decrees, nor so artful as to elude his search, nor so insignificant as to escape his notice. Present with all his works in power and knowledge, God, infinitely perfect, must be: if we sin, we cannot be concealed: our conscience tells us we are accountable to Him; and the Gospel assures us, that in proportion to our guilt shall be the future misery with which we shall be punished in body and soul.

To the fear of God is added the love of God, as a pressing motive to work out our salvation. "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy mind," says our Saviour;† and the reason for which we should thus devote to him all the gratitude and all the veneration our souls can conceive, is because "God hath loved us;"‡ and his divine love is not only evident by his first creation and continual preservation of us, but it is still more abundantly and mercifully manifested in that "God sent his only begotten Son into the world, that we might live by him; that he should be the propitiation for our sins." To those who look forward beyond the grave, for a state of immortality, and who are anxious to secure in that state the approbation and favour of their Maker; to those who know that the approbation and favour of their Maker cannot be secured without holiness of life, and that nevertheless not a soul of man is perfectly holy; to persons who thus consider the nature of the soul, the nature of sin, the imperfections of man, and the divine attributes, the sending of his Son to be a propitiation for sins which, with repentance, have been forsaken, and for transgressions which, through our frailty, we ignorantly or unwillingly commit; the sending of his Son for so merciful a purpose must appear an instance of paternal goodness to man, which should animate us to evince our deep sense of thankfulness by every act we can think acceptable from rational children to a most benevolent and gracious Father!

These motives are impressed more forcibly on our minds by the means which the Gospel ordains; such are the appointment of ministers, the reading of scripture, the offering up of private and public prayer, the observance of the sabbath, and the celebration of the sacraments; ordinances which are all sanctioned by authority of the Gospel.

Frail and sinful as ministers are, yet the appointing of men whose solemn profession and engagement it is to take the lead in prayer, to study divine truths, to instruct the ignorant, and remind the better informed, to exemplify by their practice that at least they endeavour to conform their lives to their principles; the appointing of such an order, however imperfectly their ministry may be executed, must nevertheless be of insinite utility in cherishing a general sense of religious obligation, and in promoting the duties which are thence derived

By the reading of scripture we gain that knowledge which no other works could ever impart; knowledge of God our Almighty Father, of his Eternal Son our Merciful Redeemer, of the Holy Spirit our Director, Sanctifier, knowledge of a law so pure and holy, that, if duly obeyed, it would exalt human nature to the utmost perfection of which it is capable

By prayer we raise our souls from earth to heaven; from the grossness of a carnal, to the purity of a spiritual world, from converse with men, weak and sinful as ourselves, to intercourse with that most powerful, most righteous Being, in whom dwelleth all perfection.

The observance of the sabbath calls off our attention, at seasonable intervals, from the cares or pleasures which have diverted us from moral and religious reflection, it leads us to meditate on subjects that relate to God; it gives us leisure to examine how far our thoughts and actions correspond with his laws.

And he that on the sabbath commemorates the death of our Saviour; he that, by partaking of one sacrament shews his wish to receive the benefits of the other; he that with sincerity professes sorrow and shame for sins past, exalts his Maker for the infinite mercy manifested in the work of redemption, and earnestly prays that the divine assistance may enable him for the future to amend his life; such a man cannot be conceived to return from the altar of God without at least forming resolutions to be virtuous and religious.

These are the motives, and these the means, by which the "engrafted word" has a powerful tendency towards forwarding the work of our salvation, but the full efficacy of these motives and means is completed by the assistance which the Gospel promises to those that devoutly pray for it

The Gospel is not only a new promulgation of the original moral law, but only an offer of pardon to all who with unfeigned repentance shall forsake intransigence, but it is moreover a dispensation of assistance which the Holy Spirit will impart to our souls, that we may be enabled to purify the corruptions of our nature, and render ourselves continually better qualified for that future state to which we are advancing. Under this dispensation are given spiritual powers, which, however they may be disregarded by the thoughtless and irreligious, are sensibly felt by the serious and humble supplicants for divine grace; felt they are, not as the wild transports of fanatical enthusiasm, but as the gentle influences of sober reason and unaffected piety they suggest good actions, dissuade from evil practices, remind us that to God all our works must be known, admonish us of the consequences that must ensue from guilt, strengthen us to overcome the temptation which assails us, and excite that agreeable joy in the souls of those who with patience have struggled unto victory against the insidious attacks by which their innocence has been fearfully endangered, and their peace of mind alarmingly disquieted. Such is the help, and such the comfort, which we may derive from the grace of the Holy Spirit, if we lift up our souls with a fervent desire, that we may not yield to the sin which besets us, but resist and surmount its violence.

To conclude, the end of all religion is, that we should "live soberly, righteously, and godly," that in ourselves we should be temperate and pure, to our fellow creatures, just and benevolent, to God, obedient, thankful, and devout. The reasons which would induce us to discharge these several duties punctually and conscientiously, are the confident assurance of thence deriving greater happiness in this life, and the certain hope of ensuring bliss, and escaping misery, in a future state. For the attainment of these ends there neither is, nor ever has been in this world, a system so calculated by its motives, means, and helps, as the Gospel system if therefore we regard ourselves, if we value the satisfaction of a clear conscience, if we wish to increase the virtue and comforts of mankind, if we are concerned for our condition beyond the grave; if we are bound to obey the laws revealed to us by the Almighty, let us receive with meekness, preserve with watchfulness, and follow with diligence, the engraving word, which if carefully observed, is able to save our souls.

SERMON CLV

By GEO. ISAAC HUNTINGFORD, D.D.

Bishop of Gloucester.

On the Choice of Friends, and reading the Scriptures.

PSALM I. 1, 2.

Blessed is the man that walketh not in the counsel of the ungodly, nor standeth in the way of sinners, nor sitteth in the seat of the scornful; but his delight is in the law of the Lord, and in his law doth he meditate day and night.

THOUGH every portion of Scripture in the Old Testament is highly valuable, yet the Book of Psalms in a particular manner appears to be incomparably excellent. These sacred hymns recommend themselves to our attention under several characters, and deserve our admiration on various accounts. For, whether we would be elevated by the noblest strains of the most sublime poetry; whether we would pour forth the effusions of pious gratitude to the author and giver of every blessing; whether we would find consolation to our souls in the hour of distress and anguish; or whether we would furnish our minds with precepts of virtue and maxims of religion; we need but have recourse to the several subjects of which they treat, and according to the different styles in which they are each adapted to the different arguments they illustrate. Hence, on every occasion, in every condition, and under every circumstance of life, we may find in one or other of them something applicable to ourselves, something that will speak forcibly to our own bosoms, something that will either gratify the pious affections which is predominant in our hearts, or something that will rightly inform the understanding in that wisdom which is good, and leadeth unto salvation. Under this last description stands the psalm immediately before us. For it is considered as earnest exhortation to the right conduct of life, enforced on the one hand, by considerations of that happiness which the pious and religious enjoy; on the other, by a contrast arising from that misery which the corrupt and impious experience.

A blessing is first pronounced on him who does not associate with the ungodly, with sinners, with the scornful; but who rather meditates on the important truths of religion, and endeavours to follow the duties they enjoin in all his actions.

It is to be observed, that when in the Old Testament a blessing is promised to the righteous, the law-giver, or prophet, who utters the benediction, refers in the first instance to the peculiar covenant by which the Jewish nation was directed. That government was carried on by the sanction of rewards and punishments, not spiritual and remote only, but temporal and present also, hence the effect of obedience to the divine law was to the Jews productive of immediate prosperity. With us, who live under the Gospel, the case is different. For though a due observance of virtue and piety has a natural tendency towards promoting our happiness, yet it does not uniformly and invariably terminate in worldly success. We are taught to act on higher principles than merely expectations of welfare in this state; we are animated to pursue what is just and right with the prospect of a recompense to be given hereafter, a recompense which will consist neither of wealth, nor power, nor grandeur: satisfactory reflexions on past endeavours to obey the commands of Christ; increase of knowledge in divine truths, progressive improvement in moral perfection, these will be the essential parts of that recompense, the attainment of which is reserved for a future period of our existence in the world of spirits.

It is necessary to recollect this distinction between the sanctions of the Old and New Testament, that we may not now take in a literal sense expressions which, though strictly applicable under the Jewish dispensation, are not to be used without a considerable degree of latitude and spiritual interpretation, under the Christian covenant. With this precaution we shall not be in danger of creating to ourselves groundless anxiety, if, in the experience we have of the world, we should find that the virtuous and religious are not always rewarded with outward prosperity, though they always will be comforted with inward satisfaction, and a consciousness that God and good men approve of every action proceeding from motives of sanctity and benevolence.

In this enlarged acceptance, and with reference chiefly to spiritual happiness, though not without some view to worldly prosperity, we may proceed to examine the Psalmist's assertion, and demonstrate the truth of it.

The actions of men proceed in great measure from their principles, and their principles depend very much upon the companions with whom they contract familiar friendship. The effects which are produced through familiar friendship, arise from the natural influence of conversation and example. Conversation, carried on without restraint or reserve, by frequent repetition, imprints on the mind whatever opinions are entertained by the persons with whom we are closely connected. Hence it has happened, that in process of time a fatal change of sentiment has been made in many, who once abhorred the very thought of what was bad, and who turned away with disgust from the very conception of what was improper. A charge of sentiment from good to bad, prepares the way for a reverse of conduct in the same unhappy extreme. Added to this, is the powerful impulse by which example hurries us on to imitate the actions of those whom we consider as our patterns.* Man is of all creatures the most prone to imitation; and it is almost impossible but that similarity of manners and actions must be contracted by those between whom there subsists long intimacy. Sometimes imperceptibly, sometimes designedly, either with a view of gratifying those with whom they associate, or from a persuasion that what their companions do, cannot be blameable in themselves; men in general conform themselves to the principles and practice of their most intimate and confidential friends.

Such then being the effects of conversation and example we may indeed pronounce that person happy who has never listened to the instigations of the corrupt, has never been the companion of the vicious, has never connected himself in close intimacy with those who in their folly "make a mock of sin,"† and treat religion with disrespect.

Of all companions, the scoffers at religion are the most dangerous and pestilential. It is their unreasonable and unnatural pleasure to sap the very foundation of all virtue; to destroy the distinction of right and wrong, to subvert the main ground on which society subsists, to disturb the peace of good minds, and to take from the world the providence, the attributes, the existence of God. Of him that is negligent in the duties of religion merely from inattention, there may be hopes that he will at length see his error, and return to a sense of piety towards his Maker and Redeemer: of him who, though he has deviated from the paths of virtue, has not yet learned to justify his vicious irregularities, there may be hopes that he will at length amend the evil of his ways; but of him who has so far perverted his judgment, so far resisted the strongest suggestions of conscience, so far opposed the clearest reasonings of the human mind, of him who has so far differed from the general consent of mankind, and is so far lost to all sense of decency, and to all love of virtue, as to deride the leading truths of religion; of such a person there can be formed no hopes that he will desist from being a monster in the rational world, and a nuisance to the society which he frequent. The pains which he must have taken to destroy the best instincts and most favourable prejudices in his nature, preclude all expectation that such a person can be reclaimed. Sooner shall the "Ethiopian change his skin, and the leopard his spots,"* than the empty and petulant scoffer at religion and virtue return to a just way of thinking and acting. From him, therefore, in a more particular manner, should we turn away on any advances of intimacy which he may be disposed to make. Nothing that can tend to diminish our reverence of Almighty God, nothing that can tend to loosen our principles of morality in thought, word, or deed, should be so admitted into our daily habits as to become familiar: from "the counsel of the ungodly, from the way of sinners, from the seat of the scornful," we must remove ourselves in the forming of our friendships, if we value and wish to secure peace of mind and the favour of God.

Thus cautious are we to be in the forming of friendships, and in the choice of companions; and the happy consequence of our circumspection will be, the preservation of our innocence. For such a reward, it is not only our duty, but our interest also, to observe the Psalmist's admonition.

It is however to be remembered, that, although the Psalmist most powerfully dissuades us from contracting intimacies with the vicious and wicked, yet he does not fall into that rigid and supercilious austerity, which would prohibit all intercourse with men as they chance to be found in a mixed multitude. There is a wide difference between forming intimacies with particular persons, and transacting the common concerns, or following the common pursuits of life, with the public in general. In the forming of intimacies we must be scrupulous: in transacting of business with the public, and in discharging the ordinary duties of civil society, we must be content to take men as we find them. Nature and reason point out the propriety, and even

Man is born for society, and feels in his mind an irresistible propensity to mingle with the company and engagements of his fellow-creatures. In the common intercourse of life, and the general business of the world, it is utterly impossible for the most prudent and cautious person to avoid all connexion with others whose character perhaps may be suspicious, or whose principles and practice may be highly censurable. Should any man be so unreasonable as to expect strict morals in every individual member of an extensive community; or should any be so morose as to withhold all converse with persons perhaps more vicious and more imprudent than himself, such a man would shew neither experience in the frailties of human nature, nor christian charity in bearing with condescension and lenity the imperfections of others. It is the duty of every individual to look well to himself, to correct what is vicious in his own conduct; to rectify what is erroneous in his own judgment; to watch over himself with unremitted vigilance; and then to keep himself not unconnected with the world, but unsullied by it. If by uniform adherence to virtue and piety he may silently admonish others through the force of example, or if in seasonable opportunities of prudent insinuation he may instruct, by gentle counsels, those who have candour enough to receive advice, such a man, by living and mixing with society, will produce in it infinitely more moral good than if he were in peevishness to desist from taking his share in the common concerns of mankind and the world.

Still however, in these commendations of the patience and forbearance with which every good man should conduct himself in carrying on the general affairs of society at large, no arguments can be found, no reasons can be implied for the defence of particular intimacies with the debauched and wicked. When the duties of his station are fully discharged, society has no further claim on any man; it remains with himself, in his private capacity, to select those friends whom he may most approve, and to follow those pursuits which he may think most agreeable. To his own folly must it be imputed, if he make a wrong choice either in his friendships or his retired employments. He is warned by experience, he is warned by reason, he is warned by the word of God, to contract no intimacies with the wicked, to flee the contagion of "evil communications*," to abstain from every thing which in any degree may tend to violate innocence or corrupt the soul: and that he may be enabled the better to act with this regard to his most important concerns, he is encouraged "to delight in the law of the Lord."

"The law of the Lord," in the Psalmist's acceptation, means that part of Scripture which was written by Moses: and it is scarcely possible to meditate on it, without a gradual disapprobation of whatever is contrary to the purity and holiness which that law inculcates.

Of all the studies in which we can be engaged, those which concern man are to man most interesting. Whence came he? what his destination? what his history? whence the mixed condition of his nature? what consequences will ensue from a certain course of actions? All these are subjects of inquiry which force themselves on minds at all habituated to reflection. "In all these questions we are resolved by the writings of Moses: that man was originally created by God; that immortal happiness was designed for him; that he forfeited his title to immortal happiness by disobedience to the Divine commands; that he became degraded from his primitive rank, and introduced moral evil, by the abuse of his free-will; that the connexion between moral virtue and mental happiness, between moral evil and mental misery, is ultimately, if not immediately, inseparable; these circumstances, by the fairest inference, we collect from the Mosaic history. A renewal of that moral law, which was originally stamped on the heart of man, but which through the corruption of ages was effaced and obliterated, we find to be contained in those positive precepts which form a striking part of the Mosaic ordinances. The grateful and pious adoration of God, the discharge of all duties which man should observe towards his fellow-creatures, and the self-command with which he should govern his own appetites, are the three leading points enjoined and inculcated by the two tables: points they are so consonant with reason, and so conducive to the happiness of man, that whoever will reflect on them must be convinced of their fitness and utility; and whoever will meditate on them, must see the impropriety, the indiscretion, the folly, the wickedness of acting in defiance of principles which have God for their author, and human felicity for their object. The impression left on our minds by continually reading the same books, is in no degree less forcible than the influence arising from intimacy with the same companions. If "he that walketh with wise men shall be wise*," he that is conversant with "the law of the Lord," will feel in himself a disposition to observe that law, a disposition which will continue to grow more prevalent in proportion as its tendency is more pursued, and the good effects of rational and religious conduct are more sensibly apparent.

But if moral instruction and religious wisdom are to be derived from the study of what the Psalmist meant by "the law of the Lord," much greater advantages in the improvement of our hearts, and in the enlargement of our knowledge respecting divine truths, may we expect from meditating on what we understand by "the law of the Lord."

"The law of the Lord," to us Christians, is the whole body of Scripture. It is therein given us to see the completion of prophecies, which to the Jews were obscure; to comprehend the design of ceremonies, for which the Jews could not account; to view the important end to which the Providence of God directed for ages the concerns of Jewish and Gentile nations: it is given us to see the Saviour of mankind; to hear from his voice the spiritual doctrines which raise the soul to aspire after the most exalted virtue; to be assured by him, that through the sacrifice of himself once offered for the sins of the world, mankind are put into a capacity, of recovering their lost condition, if they will follow the precepts of his holy religion: it is given us to know beyond doubt, that there shall be a future state, in which the soul of every person shall be rewarded with spiritual happiness, in a degree suitable and proportioned to the use which, in this life, each of us has made of the powers, opportunities, and abilities to do good, imparted to us by God, according to his unerring wisdom.

As in its moral precepts the Gospel explains, by a wide and refined sense, the commandments of the law, and tends more immediately to prevent what is vicious, by restraining even the first emotions of the heart; as in its narrative of facts the Gospel most strongly points out the heinous nature of sin, by exhibiting the death of an immaculate and divine person in atonement for the transgressions of the human race; as in its assurances the Gospel is express and positive, that good deeds shall be rewarded and bad deeds punished in a future state, to which this present life is but preparatory; as the Gospel is thus essentially conducive to vital principles of real-excellence, thus instructive in teaching us the enormity of moral evil, thus persuasive in urging us to the practice of every duty intrinsically virtuous, and thus earnest in deterring us even from every thought of what is immoral, unjust, or unholy; as the Gospel, in these respects, is so superior to the Jewish law, Christians are blessed with advantages in point of knowledge, incitements, and prospects, which the Jews did not enjoy in so ample a manner; we therefore should be influenced more by the study of the whole body of Scripture, as received among us, than the Psalmist could be when he meditated on what to him had been communicated as the "law of the Lord." If contemplating the "law of the Lord" in a more limited form were to him productive of good dispositions; much more should reflection on Gospel truths create in us a love of whatever is laudable, and repel us from partaking of any measures which stand condemned, either in the sight of God, or in the judgment of discreet men. Whoever has considered the "law of the Lord," with attention so serious, and recollection so frequent, as to have effected this great purpose of all religious exercise, may be pronounced a man happy in this world, and blessed in his prospect of that which is to come: happy is he in the only sense which deserves that name, in having a mind intent on thinking and acting as becomes a reasonable being who hopes for immortality; and blessed is he in his hopes, that he shall receive the approbation of his Creator and Redeemer, for having endeavoured to think and act conformably to that degree of knowledge and conviction of divine truth, with which he is enlightened.

What times are most seasonable for religious reflection on Gospel truths, must be left very much to the discretion and circumstances of every individual. The Sabbath, however, is expressly pointed out as peculiarly proper for meditating on God, Christianity, and eternity; and to continue in habits of passing over the Sabbath without a thought on religion, is usually the fore-runner of dissolute principles, profligate manners, and a debauched life. Whoever begins to feel in himself a disinclination to observe the Sabbath, would do well to suspect that all is not right within his own breast, and to search out the vice that entices him from discharging the duties which he owes to his God, to his Saviour, to himself.

A less portion of time for religious meditation, and for the reading either of the Scriptures, or of books that are calculated to impart religious wisdom; a less portion of time for such useful and proper employment, than what the leisure of every sabbath affords, would be accounted sufficient by no one who thinks at all of his own imperfections and the work of salvation. How much greater portion should be allotted for sacred studies it is impossible to prescribe, as the rule must vary, not only according to the disposition and abilities, but also according to the worldly callings of every single person. For though the Psalmist encourages us to exercise ourselves in "the law of the Lord day and night," yet reason and common sense will tell us, that this admonition is not to be taken so strictly as to preclude industry in our worldly concerns. A prayer to God at the return of every morning and evening, is indeed the reasonable and easy service, which every dependent creature is bound to pay daily to his Almighty Creator and most merciful Protector: and if some part of Scripture were daily read, it cannot be doubted that impressions of a religious nature would remain more deeply and strongly on our minds: but this daily reading of Scripture must not be enforced as of indispensable necessity in all situations; because, as the world is made for our habitation, and we are made to people and possess the world, so in general, when our first thoughts have been turned to the Author of our existence, we are obliged to resume the business belonging to that station which the providence of God has allotted us. Those who are preparing for any particular employments must be diligent in qualifying themselves for those employments by gaining previous information, and by acquiring suitable habits. Those who are actually engaged in business, are required to be industrious in their several occupations. To the greater part of mankind, their very subsistence makes bodily labour necessary: to many, a competency for themselves and families depends on mental exertion: on many is imposed a debt of gratitude, which, on every principle of honour and equity for maintenance received, should be repaid by services performed: regard to character and reputation demands the efforts of many others: and consideration of public welfare claims of every person, in every situation, that he should contribute his share towards the prosperity, the happiness, the credit of the nation in which he lives, and by which he is protected. But in executing the several offices to which we are appointed, much care, much attention, much thought is employed; yet in all this business we are acting religiously, if we are acting faithfully and honestly. Industry in our calling is part of religion; so material a part, that he who neglects this, may be suspected of insincerity in his religious professions on other occasions; for if he will not endeavour to do good for those with whom he is connected by every tie of endearment, it is scarcely to be conceived that he should be much in earnest when he contemplates subjects relative to concerns of a nature remote and invisible. The best proof of acting conscientiously towards God, is acting strenuously for the good of man; and he that hath spent his day in useful labour for society, with approbation may reflect on his past employment, and with propriety may supplicate his Almighty Preserver to give him such rest, as may fit him for the business of the succeeding day.

The spirit of Christianity, rightly understood, has nothing in it inapplicable to general use; on the contrary, one peculiar excellence of the Christian religion is, that it enters into all the concerns of man, and is meant to pervade, direct, and influence all sorts and conditions of human life: so that even in those hours when we are most busied in the engagements of society, we may shew by our actions how far we are improved by religion; and may judge from the rectitude, or defects in our temper and conduct, how far we need pay greater attention to the government of our souls by the restraints and precepts of the Gospel. Happy is he, who hath so long habituated himself to obey the Gospel, that he can display the Christian character, in all his behaviour: such a man will secure peace to his soul, that first and greatest of all blessings; and (though it be but a secondary consideration), yet he will be pursuing the most direct course towards ensuring prosperity in his worldly calling: "He shall be (as the Psalmist says) like a tree planted by the water-side, that will bring forth his fruit in due season; his leaf also shall not wither; and look, whatsoever he doeth, it shall prosper*." The only ground on which we may reasonably hope for success in our undertakings, is in possessing the qualities, and practising the virtues, which, from their general utility, will procure recompense, and gain esteem from the public. Skill, assiduity, sobriety, civility, justice, upon the whole cannot fail of meeting with encouragement: for as they are extremely instrumental towards the well-being and comfort of civil society, those who are known to be uniform in the application of such excellent talents, will be sought out and encouraged by their fellow-citizens. But these endowments, which greatly recommend us to the favour of others, are all pointed out as accomplishments which every Christian, who hath capacity to acquire them should labour to attain. When on one occasion St. Paul exhorts his converts to be "not slothful in business†;" on another, "to study to be quiet and to do their own business‡;" when he enforces that striking summary of perfection, "Finally, brethren, whatsoever things are true, whatsoever things are honest, whatsoever things are just, whatsoever things are pure, whatsoever things are lovely, whatsoever things are of good report; if there be any virtue, if there be any praise, think on these things§;" what does he less than instruct us in the means which are most effectual towards conciliating universal esteem? and what is more conducive than universal esteem towards promoting our general prosperity? The best Christian therefore has the fairest prospect of being the happiest man on all accounts. In obedience to that Gospel which he professes to observe, he will take pains to render himself useful to society, and to acquit himself with credit in the discharge of those duties which on all occasions may be required of him: hence, with reason, he may expect from others some return for the services conferred on them; at least, in justice and common right, he is warranted in such expectations; and therefore, when he hopes for prosperity, he does not hope for what he has not endeavoured to desert. And in this persuasion, he will persevere without murmurs, be the event in this world what it may! If prosperity should attend him he will be thankful to God, who has blessed his labours; if adversity should be his lot, he will nevertheless feel an inward consolation in reflecting that he has acted his part with propriety; and still more will he be animated, when he looks forward to that future period of existence, in which every Christian expects to receive the final recompense of his upright intentions and honest actions. As "the leaf on the flourishing tree shall not wither," the good designs and virtuous deeds of the true Christian shall not perish. Disregarded or unrewarded they may be in this world; but this world is not the limit of man's continuance in being: the effects of probity, of charity, of piety, of intrinsic excellence, will follow the soul beyond the grave; and then will be the season in which we shall have "our fruit unto holiness, and the end everlasting life."*

Victory by Faith, over External Condition, Inward Temper, and Infirmities of Mortality.

I ST. JOHN, v. 4.

Whatsoever is born of God overcometh the world; and this is the victory that overcometh the world, even our faith.

To be born of God, is to obey from the heart that influence of the divine spirit which directs and enables us to forsake the paths of wickedness, and to follow the commandments of God, made known to us by Christ. Whoever hath corperienced in his soul, and manners so entire a change, as that from being regardless of religion he should become serious; from scarcely acknowledging God, he should now make it his first and chief care how to serve, honour and glorify God; from bestowing not a thought on the state of his soul, he should now be anxious to secure his salvation in a future life, by embracing the Gospel promises, and observing the Gospel precepts, by believing and acting as a Christian; such a man is styled, in the language of Scripture, a "new creature:"* new he is in his thoughts towards God; new in the feelings and reflections of his own mind; new in his actions towards his fellow-creatures. By unfeigned piety to his Creator, his Redeemer, his Sanctifier; by the reasonable practice of religious exercises; by resisting the temptations of corrupt appetite; by conscientiously avoiding every kind of sin; by a disposition to supplicate his heavenly Father in all wants and necessities either of soul or body; by reliance on his mercy and goodness for such relief as may be expedient; by a firm confidence that those who walk humbly with Christ, shall be recompensed in a future state; by strict justice in all his dealings; by sincere benevolence to all mankind; by forgiveness of injuries, and pardon even of enemies, so far as consideration of his own safety will allow; by all these tokens will the convert from sin manifest, that through God's grace he is in a manner "born again;"† and to him it will be given, by the strength of religious faith, to overcome the world. Let us examine how faith is to operate with an energy so powerful.

By the world may be understood, the various circumstances which affect the conduct and happiness of man during his continuance upon earth; and of these the chief are, external condition, inward temper, and the infirmities of mortality. In all these, religious faith will make us spiritual conquerors.

That which we all most naturally desire, is a state of prosperity: it is not only innocent to wish for such a condition, it is even laudable to labour for it. But what are the general effects of prosperity on a man of no religion? Presumptuous security in the abundance of what he possesseth, excessive indulgence in the gratifications of appetite, total indifference to the distress of others, immoderate value of the riches which belong to him, undue attention to the second causes that have made him opulent; but not a thought of gratitude to the God by whose providence every good gift is dispensed to man; these are the evils to which prosperity inclines the person who devotes himself entirely to the world. Against these evils the religious are guarded by faith: for by faith they are constantly reminded, "not to trust in uncertain riches, but in the living God;"* "to do good, to be rich in good works, ready to distribute, willing to communicate; to lay up for themselves a good foundation against the time to come, that they may lay hold on eternal life."† Faith will extend their views through all the changes which are daily and hourly happening in every walk of life; it will convince them that stability is not the law ordained for things sublunary; it will teach them that God putteth down one, and setteth up another, as seemeth best to his infinite wisdom; it will carry their souls beyond the precincts of this world, to a state more perfect and altogether spiritual, where, with God, there can be no other respect of persons, than as in their trial they have done righteously.

As faith, by some motives, discourages the insolence of prosperity; so, by others, it alleviates the afflictions of adversity. The language of faith is, "Humble yourselves under the mighty hand of God."‡ And why? because God is wise, because he is good, because he is powerful.

The wisdom of God at once comprehends the whole arrangement of man's life. Human prudence can at best but conjecture the result of any action immediately to be performed; through a ong. series of causes and effects our bounded view is not able to reach. From the contracted limits of our foresight must naturally arise extreme ignorance of our future destiny: the very measures we adopt for the attainment of some worldly advantage, may terminate in consequences directly contrary to our expectations; and the acquisition of an object which we think most desirable, may be the occasion of some circumstances that may embitter our days. Observation of occurrences that happen constantly, should teach us to know our own blindness; should convince us, that all we can do towards the forwarding of our prospects, is to act circumspectly, diligently, and uprightly, in our peculiar station; which duty, when we have carefully performed, then, as "the race is not always to the swift, nor the battle to the strong;*" as the tendencies of the second causes are not uniformly in the same direction, but are made subservient to the Divine will in the government of the universe; and as God in his wisdom must know better than ourselves the condition best suited to us as beings in a state of probation; faith bids us "commit all our works unto the Lord,"† and bear the event with becoming patience.

This submission of our will to the Divine administration, is recommended to us by consideration not only of the wisdom, but also of the goodness of God.

God, who is infinite in all perfection, can will nothing but the happiness of his creatures. If in the course of our lives we encounter so many difficulties, which, at the time of suffering, diminish our happiness, still the goodness of God is thus to be justified. God hath called us into existence, not as creatures of some few days, but as beings designed perhaps to continue for some years in this world, and certainly to live through eternity in a future state. The Providence of God hath respect unto both these conditions; and therefore, in its dispensations it considers not merely the present moment, but so ordains all events as that the present should be preparatory to a more distant period in this life, and the whole of this life be a course of moral discipline for* another which is to follow. The goodness of a parent is manifested, not by momentary indulgence, of perverse humour, not by permitting a child to abandon himself to pleasure, not by consulting only how to make provision for the morrow: the good parent corrects whatever is vicious, trains up his child in temperate regularity, lays the foundation of his future character by a suitable system of learning, and imprudence considers how to furnish him with some means of support, when he shall have arrived at years which remove him from parental direction. In some such view we should consider the dispensations of God. We are born for† higher and nobler purposes than merely to eat, drink, and perish like brute animals. We have duties to discharge towards ourselves, towards our fellow-creatures, towards our Maker: we have bodies to be preserved for a mature season by temperance; we have souls to be prepared for spiritual improvement, by various methods suited to our various dispositions and various exigencies. God, in his goodness, appoints for us that succession of prosperous or adverse circumstances, which may best fit us to act as becomes men endued with reason, intended for society, and destined for immortality; and if in this appointment the portion of adversity should be the greater, yet faith in God's goodness will bid us conclude, that however unsearchable may be the ways of his providence, yet they must necessarily be conducted with mercy and benevolence. Perhaps we have need of apparent severity to teach us humility: perhaps we are of tempers that can be kept under restraint only by distresses: perhaps we have been imprudent, perhaps we have been indolent, perhaps we have been debauched and prodigal, and are now only reaping the natural fruits of folly and negligence, of corruption and profligacy: perhaps we may have been attached to the things of this world more than we ought, and are now admonished to recollect that God and virtue should be the first objects of our heart. Or put the case another way: Conceive a man excellent in principles and manners as the frailty of human nature will admit, and yet struggling with adversity. Think ye that God's goodness doth herein fail? Assuredly not. The misery of every man is just so much as he feels it to be: but whoever hath devoted his soul to God, and directed his actions by the commands of religion, experiences not from adversity a degree of sorrow in any proportion adequate to the consolations of piety and right conduct. Nor to such a man will adversity appear under the same view in which it is seen by persons indifferent to religion. In the opinion of him that believes and trusts in God, prosperity and adversity are no marks either of God's favour on the one hand, or of his displeasure on the other. The distribution of temporal gifts to individuals is indiscriminate; wealth and power imply not merit;* poverty and low condition bespeak not demerit; in these allotments the best and the worst of men meet together. But faith looks beyond these transient circumstances: to the peace of the soul arising from a conscience void of offence towards God and man, it turns for its most pure, lasting, and independent happiness; and in finding that, it says, in the midst of adversity. "O heavenly Father, not my will, but thine be done;" † for that will which created, which preserves, which enlightens, which redeems man, cannot be otherwise than benevolent and good in all its appointments.

By suggesting God's power, faith also gives comfort in adversity. It ascribes to God an absolute control over all creatures in the universe; a control which, to dispute were folly, to resist were madness. In this acknowledgement of God's irresistible power, it is not to be implied, that man should not exert, to the utmost of his abilities, all his active and reasoning faculties, both in temporal and spiritual concerns: the calls of nature, the voice of reason, the commands of God, urge him to unwearied diligence in honest and religious pursuits; and a woe is denounced on that unprofitable servant, who neglects to improve his talent. But by faith we are taught, that though "there are many devices in man's heart, nevertheless the counsel of the Lord, that shall stand;"* and the conviction of this truth which leads to resignation, prevents unreasonable murmurs and unavailing fretfulness. A full persuasion of God's omnipotence affords consolation in another view. However distressing may be our adversity, yet he hath power to relieve and reverse it. The proud may treat us with contempt, the wealthy with insolence; companions of our better days may be faithless; friends may want ability to help us: but as in God there is nothing of human weakness, so on him alone can we place our reliance, confident that he is able to remove the evils which oppress us, and that he will remove them so far as in his wisdom and goodness he may judge expedient for us.

Such then is the influence of religious faith on the two leading distinctions of man's condition, prosperity and adversity. Let us now see its efficacy on some of our passions and dispositions.

Through faith our chief joy is founded, not on temporal possessions, not on sensual gratifications, not on fanciful amusements, not on pleasures that are fleeting; a sound mind, an enlightened understanding, a pure heart, a quiet conscience, domestic harmony, intercourse of friendship, works of benevolence, the exercises of devotion, a love of God and virtue, and a hope of salvation through his blessed Redeemer; these are the substantial and permanent grounds on which the Christian builds his joy, a joy "which no man taketh from him."

Occasions of sorrow are to all of us manifold, and to most of us bitter. The imprudence of some friends, the distress of others; the sickness of some whom we dearly love, and the loss of others who were to us as our own souls; these are causes of grief, which, as we can neither prevent, so neither can we experience with cold unconcern. Faith does not condemn, it only regulates grief: our feelings of humanity are not to be suppressed, but they should be moderated: reasonable indulgence of them is craved by our nature; excess is forbidden both by nature and grace. That we "sorrow not as men without hope," † is the precept of faith, applicable to all circumstances of worldly concern.

* That which creates the most piercing sorrow, is the recollection of sin. On this, as we make farther advances in goodness, we look back with increasing abhorrence. We stand, in our own judgment, self-condemned; we lament our folly, our weakness, our wickedness, in the committing of offences against our conscience, and against the known commands of a righteous and good God. In such sorrow there can scarcely be excess; yet faith bids the truly penitent be comforted; bids them come unto Christ for rest in their souls; bids them "return unto the Lord, for he will have mercy on them; and to our God, for he will abundantly pardon them." ‡

Are we by nature disposed to hastiness of temper, which, in moments unguarded, betrays us either into improper language or violent behaviour, impelling us to offend against established manners, and to disregard humane forbearance, in some such way as will afterwards occasion to us remorse and shame?

Are we by nature disposed to such hastiness of temper? By faith we are led to overcome this enemy, to the repose of ourselves and of all around us. The Word of God pronounces thus: "He that is soon angry, dealeth foolishly." * "An angry man stirreth up strife, and a furious man aboundeth in transgression." † "Be not hasty in thy spirit to be angry." ‡ "Let all bitterness, and wrath, and anger, and clamour, and evil-speaking, be put away from you, with all malice; and be ye kind to one another, tender-hearted, forgiving one another; even as God, for Christ's sake, hath forgiven you." § By faith in God we shall believe, that what he condemns must be sinful, what he forbids must be avoided, what he counsels must be wise, what he commands must be indispensable: and by continual recollection of his declarations against violent passions, we shall gradually form those habits of gentleness, which sweeten the whole intercourse of life, and which peculiarly adorn the Christian profession.

Is there in our natural disposition a tendency to envy? A more tormenting passion can scarcely be harboured in the breast of man. On every side perpetually arise occasions which excite uneasiness to the envious person: the flourishing condition of one, the reputation of another; the success of this, the general esteem of that man, are never-failing sources of vexatious and corroding anxiety. His own circumstances, however in themselves desirable, are overlooked: his own attainments, of whatsoever kind they may be, give him no satisfaction; there are those whom he fancies ‖ to be in a better situation, though of less desert, than himself; and on them he fixes a jealous and malignant eye. Not so the man who is "transformed in the renewing of his mind;" ¶ the spirit that is in him hath overcome an affection so vile and so uncharitable. He does not pretend to despise the gifts of Providence; he knows their value, and is thankful for that portion of them which is conferred upon him: but thou he has learnt to check every wish that the liberal bounty of God should be limited towards others; he has learnt to prefer the satisfactions of equanimity to the restless agitations of discontent; he has learnt to consider worldly possessions, which are fleeting, as infinitely less worthy his attention than spiritual blessings. That charity "which suffereth long, and is kind; which envieth not; which vaunteth not itself, and is not puffed up; which becometh not itself unseemly, seeketh not her own, is not easily provoked, and thinketh no evil; which rejoiceth not in iniquity, but rejoiceth in the truth; which beareth all things, believeth all things, hopeth all things, endureth all things;"* if thereby the advantage of a fellow-creature may reasonably be promoted; that most excellent endowment, the fruit of God's spirit, it will be the object of faith to obtain and manifest.

Faith in God through Christ directs us to overcome the temptations which may arise, either from our own appetites, or from the corruptions of the world.

He that believeth on the Son of God, hath every inducement, every motive, every help towards the resisting of temptations.

He hath an example of perfect virtue set forth for imitation in the life of Christ. "Holy, harmless, undefiled;"† intent on the great purposes which he came on earth to accomplish, by no allurements of worldly pleasure could our Lord be seduced, by no proffers of power could he be diverted, by no sufferings of torment could he be deterred from fulfilling all righteousness. It is an advantage peculiar to Christianity, that we have a pattern of consummate excellence, after which we should be careful to direct our conduct. "Tempted like as we are, yet without sin;"‡ our Lord hath shewn us, that man, with all his infirmities, if he will strive to regulate his passions, and pray fervently to God for divine assistance, may make considerable progress in spiritual perfection, though he cannot resemble Christ in unblemished innocence.

He that believeth on the Son of God, knoweth the recompense that is promised to well-doing, and the vengeance which shall overtake sinners; he considers that a glorious immortality awaiteth him who overcometh in the contest with sin and Satan; but that tribulation and anguish must be the doom of him who has yielded his body and soul to the dominion of corrupt appetites; and in defiance of every warning which nature or grace could give, hath persisted wilfully and knowingly in trespasses. As "by faith, Moses, when he was come to years, refused to be called the son of Pharaoh's daughter, choosing rather to suffer afflictions with the people of God, than to enjoy the pleasures of sin for a season; esteeming the reproach of Christ greater riches than the treasures of Egypt; for he had respect unto the recompense of reward: as by faith he forsook Egypt, not fearing the wrath of the king, for he endured as seeing him who is invisible;"* so by faith will he that is born of God relinquish the indulgence of vicious gratifications, for the more pure joy of a soul undefiled, and the approbation of God.

That promise of divine assistance which is given "to us, to our children, to all that are afar off, even as many as the Lord our God shall call;"† that promise will be received with full assurance by faith, and will encourage us, in the hour of trying temptation, to supplicate our compassionate intercessor, "that we may obtain mercy, and find grace in the time of need."‡ In our petitions for § worldly things, we know not whether the object of our prayer may eventually produce the greater degree of happiness, or the larger portion of misery; requests therefore of this kind, we must beg to be granted so far only, as God may foresee them conducive to our welfare: but when we pray for the Holy Spirit to strengthen us against the force of any temptation, we are confident that the result of our petition can lead only to good. The reformation of our lives, and the purifying of our hearts, are the chief works we have to perform as preparatory towards the attainment of salvation. When to the accomplishment of these ends we ask for that ability, which by nature we have not, we ask for what must prove a spiritual blessing, and as such, what God will certainly grant to our earnest prayers. "If ye, being evil, know how to give good gifts unto your children, how much more shall your Heavenly Father give the Holy Spirit to them that ask him?"* If men, with all their infirmities, are nevertheless inclined to make their children happy, by conferring on them favours which may innocently gratify them, much more will God, whose most adorable attribute is love, impart to us that portion of divine assistance, which may be needful to secure us, from the most formidable of all dangers, the dangers of sin. For this assistance, faith will impel us to pray; and the effect of our prayer will be spiritual victory.

As the prevalence of faith corrects our inward dispositions, so its strength sustains our infirmities of mortality. Look to the bed of sickness, and see the patient resignation and lively hope of a Christian animated by faith in God! The pains of disease, however they may torture him, and force from his body deep groans of agony, yet they excite not in his soul any thoughts of complaint, as though God were not gracious in all his dispensations. That in the midst of life we are in death; that in Adam all die; that "by one man sin entered into the world, and death by sin, and so death passed upon all men, for that all have sinned;"† on these truths he has frequently meditated, and has thus prepared himself for an approaching dissolution of his mortal body. But faith looks beyond the present scene: it says to the soul, "though in Adam all die, yet in Christ shall all be made alive‡;" "though through the offence of one, many be dead," yet "by the obedience of one, shall many be made righteous;" "and as sin hath reigned unto death, even so grace shall reign through righteousness unto eternal life by Jesus Christ our Lord."* This is the encouragement, the comfort, the assurance which faith imparts to the dying Christian, in confidence of which he exclaims triumphantly, "O death, where is now thy sting! O grave, where is now thy victory!"† To him that hath believed and sincerely endeavoured to obey the Gospel, the terrors of death and the grave cannot be formidable. For however, upon a review of his past life, he must feel himself humbled and contrite for many actions which he now condemns, yet he trusts that God, for Christ's sake, will consider repentance as a recommendation to his favour; that he will regard sincere and earnest efforts of amendment as grounds for his mercy, his approbation, his blessing!

Thus powerful as faith is in its influence on the various conditions, affections, and prospects of man; it well deserves the high appellations with which it is extolled in Scripture. It is the principle which first turns us to God; it is the inducement which prompts us to conform our wills and actions to his Gospel; it is the spring whence flow our most admirable virtues; it is the grace which adorns those virtues in the sight of God; it is the source whence we derive the most substantial comforts; it is the only solid foundation of religion in this world; it is the only firm rock on which we can securely rest our expectation of spiritual happiness in a life immortal! In faith therefore towards God, through Christ our Redeemer, and the Holy Spirit our Sanctifier, may we "be steadfast and unmovable; always abounding in holiness, that work of the Lord; forasmuch as we know that our labour is not in vain in the Lord."‡

SERMON CLVII.

BY GEO. ISAAC HUNTINGFORD, D.D.

Bishop of Gloucester.

On Thanksgiving for the Fruits of the Earth.

PSALM lkv. 12.

Thou crownest the year with thy goodness.

THERE was a law among the Jews, which ordained that they should annually observe "the feast of harvest;" and in the celebration of this feast, they were to offer unto the Lord "the first fruits of the principal grain, which they had sown in their fields." * The design of this ordinance was to impress their minds with a due sense of gratitude for that goodness of Providence, which, with every returning year, gave them "fruitful seasons," and thus "filled their hearts with food and gladness." †

The ritual part of this ordinance, the waving of a sheaf before the altar, the simplicity of Christian worship cannot adopt; but it should adopt that part which is spiritual; it should embrace thanksgiving to Almighty God for his unbounded beneficence in supplying our wants with a rich abundance of herbs, fruits, and corn. At this ‡ season of the year then, let us meditate on the divine goodness, as it is exhibited in the sustenance of man!

The regions of the earth are immenso-ly extended, and from the diversity of their situations, are exposed to different degrees of heat and cold; yet notwithstanding the world is so wide, and its climates are so various, there is scarcely a spot inhabited by the human race; which does not produce some sort of vegetables, peculiarly accommodated to the support of those who are placed in any particular quarter. The Almighty word, which first said, "Let the earth bring forth grass, the herb yielding seed, and the fruit-tree yielding fruit after his kind," * still continues to make the earth productive, either by the force of natural growth, or by means of human industry. Whether it be from spontaneous fertility, or from the labours of man, that the earth gives provision, still the praise belongs ultimately to God, since the innumerable kinds of plants which contribute to our support, were first furnished with seeds, and are propagated to us with increase, by the wisdom and Providence of God. It was in wisdom that he first formed them; it is by providence perpetually exerted, that he continues to multiply, and make them yield fruit in due season.

We who inhabit this quarter of the globe, experience the effects which arise from vicissitude of atmosphere, and sensibly feel the influence of climate. Thankful should we be to God, that notwithstanding this perpetual change in the air which surrounds us, we yet see "our barns filled with plenty." † Hath it pleased God at one season to "give snow like wool? hath he scattered the hoar frost like ashes? hath he cast out his ice like morsels?" ‡ Yet, in all this severity of winter, the fruits of the earth have been but retarded in vegetation, they have not for ever lost their vital qualities; their native properties have been only hidden, but not destroyed. Hath God at another season caused "the spreadings of the clouds?" § hath he made darkness his secret place, hath he made dark winters and clouds of the sky a pavillion round about him? ¶ Yet in his hand were the balancings of the clouds;" ¶ yet by his decree was there "a course for the overflowing of waters,"  so that rain descended in mercy on our land; ¶¶ not to the corruption, but the growth and refreshment of our fruits. The effects of blasting, of mildew, of drought, hath been graciously averted from us; the locust, the canker-worm, the caterpillar, those avengers of heaven, have been mercifully kept from doing us injury!

The value of these blessings escapes our notice, from the frequency with which they recur. Objects, which are repeatedly familiar to our view, excite less admiration: gratifications, which are continually offered to our senses, by degrees lose their pleasure: and even the favours of heaven, which are enjoyed without interruption, are in general received with a hand not uplifted, with a heart not attentive in gratitude to the all-bounteous donor. But let us reverse the scene of a land blessed by God's Providence! let us conceive a country, where inclement seasons, where intemperate elements, where the displeasure of God have sorely vexed the inhabitants! Instead of fertility, there will be found barrenness; instead of plenty will appear dearth; instead of the joys which proceed from sufficiency, there will prevail the anxious suspense which scarcity creates. Call to your remembrance that part of Holy Scripture which sets forth the history of Joseph. What, think ye, must have been the condition of Jacob's family when the land of Canaan was afflicted with dearth? The sons of Israel assembled in the habitation of their father, to devise measures for the supply of provisions: but stricken as they were with consternation, and oppressed with sadness at their deplorable situation, they viewed each other in silence with reciprocal compassion, till at length their aged father exclaimed, "Why do ye look one upon another?"* In which short address the Patriarch seems to say, "I read in your countenances the distress of your minds; I see you are oppressed with apprehensions lest your families should perish with want; the powers of your understanding are weakened, the faculties of your speech are disabled by the horror which hath seized you; I therefore must dispel this consternation, and suggest to you the only expedient that can preserve us." The same family meet again a second time; but with this aggravation of sorrow to the aged Patriarch; his son Simeon was detained as a prisoner and bondman in Egypt. The famine was still sore in the land; and the quantity of corn, which had been heretofore purchased by the sons of Jacob, was now almost exhausted. "Go again (says the father) and buy us a little food;" buy us not that measure which in times of plenty we might consume without stint, but that little supply which necessity requires for the bare preservation of our existence. A second purchase of corn could not be made, but at a price which Jacob valued almost dearly as his own life: Benjamin, his youngest and darling son, was to be sent to a country, whence the father apprehended he never would return. But even this price the patriarch was compelled to pay, so earnest were the solicitations of his other sons in their anxiety lest themselves and their households should die with hunger.

Pitiable is the sight of a family, which conceives even fears of extreme want; but infinitely more pitiable is the lot of those, by whom all the miseries of actual famine are really felt. There is not a calamity incident to man more terrible in its consequences than famine, and therefore is it frequently denounced in Scripture as a most severe threat of punishment for the wickedness of a people. We need but recollect the dreadful accomplishment of our Saviour's predictions against Jerusalem, to be convinced of the dire evils produced by famine. The Jewish historian tells us, the famine was so great, that it destroyed all respect to decency, and dissolved all the ties of natural affection. Wives snatched the meat out of the mouths of their husbands; children, from their parents; and mothers, from their infants. The aged who defended their bread, were beaten; the women, who had concealed it, were torn with violence: neither infancy nor age was treated with pity; but some were put to the rack, and others suffered exquisite torments, that discovery of their food might be forced from them. The dearth of all wholesome provisions was at length such, that the famished Jews were driven to eat what even the vilest beasts would have refused: and to complete the scene of woeful desperation, a mother fed upon the flesh of her own child!

A view of the miseries sustained by others, sets our own happiness in a more striking light. When we hear that such are the evils occasioned by *famine, and then reflect on the competency of food with which we are supplied, our hearts are lifted up with fervent gratitude to the Almighty, and with the Psalmist we say, "O that men would praise the Lord for his goodness, and declare the wonders that he doeth for the children of men! for he satisfieth the empty soul, and filleth the hungry soul with goodness."†

The royal psalmist, in another passage, has thought it neither unworthy of particular notice, nor degrading the dignity of his subject, to mention in express terms the grain of wheat as a most valuable gift of Providence.‡ And in imitation of Ps. lxxxi. the devout author of Ps. cxlvii. [whether Nehemiah or Haggai] has praised God for "silling the land of Judea, with the finest of wheat."§

The people of Judea, like the inhabitants of this our country, were much given to agriculture; with singular propriety therefore were they reminded of that, which above all things best repays the labour of the husbandman.

There is moreover an especial mark of Providence, which we of this land should observe, in the nature and fruitfulness of the grain, that contributes chiefly to our support. "It is worthy the noting, (says an ingenious || naturalist,) that wheat, which is the best sort of grain, of which the purest, most savory and wholesome bread is made, is patient of both extremes, heat and cold; growing and bringing its seed to maturity, not only in temperate countries, but also, on the one hand, in the cold and northern; on the other, in the hottest and most southerly." "Nor is it less observable, and not to be commemorated without acknowledgment of the divine benignity to us, that (as *Pliny rightly notes) nothing is more fruitful than wheat. If Pliny, a heathen, could make this fertility of wheat argumentative of the bounty of God to man, making such plentiful provision for him of that which is of most pleasant taste and wholesome nourishment, surely it ought not to be passed over by us Christians without notice-taking and thanksgiving."

Nor should this gift of Providence be received with less gratitude, because it is to be sought with much labour, and to be acquired with unwearyed industry: on the contrary, we should be the more thankful for every blessing, in proportion to the pains which were necessary towards the attainment of it: for every object becomes more valuable to the possessor, when labour has been the price of acquisition; and it gratifies the mind with the most satisfactory pleasure, to reflect that the blessing of God has prospered our labour. Indeed, the goodness of God is manifested in this very appointment, that industry should be a law of our nature, should be a condition indispensable for the supply of our necessities; for, in consequence of this dispensation, the health of the body is invigorated, the powers of the mind are called forth into action,† various arts are cultivated, and social happiness exceedingly improved.

Wherever the human species is found to subsist entirely by any other means, and in no degree by the fruits of the earth, there the state of mankind is comparatively wretched; ‡ for their manners are savage, their minds indolent, their inventions few, their intercourse with each other limited; but no sooner is the art of raising a proportion of sustenance from the fruits of the earth introduced and established among a people, than their condition becomes more happy, because more productive of those enjoyments which are suited to the nature of man. The chief spring of those enjoyments is the exercise of industry: God hath appointed that to be the source, whence a considerable share of our happiness should be derived. And thus it is, that every man may be very instrumental to his own comfort: for though God alone is the author and giver of all good things, yet he dispenses not his favours without some condition to be performed on our part: he requires the concurrence of man's industry as a recommendation to his divine benignity; but when man hath performed all, that his powers will enable him to execute, then heaven will be gracious, and by infinite means of Providence will so direct the course of affairs, that success shall be the reward of our painful endeavours. It is God, "that visiteth the earth and blesseth it;"† "that prepareth their corn,"—"that crowneth the year with his goodness;" yet he does this not for the indolent, but for the industrious: for "He that tilleth his land, shall be satisfied with bread,"‡ and "the thoughts of the diligent tend only to plenteousness;"§ but "the sluggard, who will not plough by reason of the cold, shall beg in harvest, and have nothing;"|| "an idle soul shall suffer hunger;"¶ "he that loveth pleasure shall be a poor man."

That man is endowed with discernment capable of distinguishing the different seasons; that he can ascertain when it is proper to begin the different works necessary towards preparing for his sustenance; that he hath ingenuity to discover arts by which to make ready his food, and to render it more salubrious than it would be if taken without preparation, should also excite our gratitude; for in the language of Isaiah, "His God doth instruct him to discretion, and doth teach him."* Had man been only led like other living creatures to the food best suited to his nature, even that had been a proof of divine Providence; but when to this instinct are added faculties, which no brute creature possesses, and knowledge of arts, which by no brute creatures are attainable, the paternal goodness of God towards his creature man is abundantly heightened, and signally displayed. It is therefore man's duty to testify his sense of gratitude to his gracious Creator, by every possible act of thanksgiving, piety, and virtue, which can become a servant of God most truly sensible of the manifold blessings conferred upon him.

We, who live in the glorious light of revelation, can never be at a loss to know what acts God, for Christ's sake, will deem acceptable in his sight.

By Christ, "let us offer the sacrifice of praise to God continually, that is, the fruit of our lips, giving thanks in his name."† Not to praise God, and not to give him thanks, is in effect either to deny or to dissemble that God is our preserver.

By Christ, let us present our bodies, a "living sacrifice, holy, acceptable unto God, which is our reasonable service."‡ The thoughts of our souls, the strength of our bodies, the desires of our hearts, must be all consecrated to him, and directed in obedience to his supreme will: it is our spiritual and rational service thus to devote to Almighty God those powers which from him we have received; received for nobler purposes than merely to indulge in sensual pleasures, and to live unmindful of the God that made us.

"To do good and to communicate, forget not;" for with such sacrifices God is well pleased.§ Charity and beneficence to all persons in distress, are duties particularly inculcated by the Gospel; and a reward is promised to acts of kindness, which, in obedience to God's commands, are done to the indigent and unfortunate. Those; who in a more especial manner have cause to thank God that "he crowneth the year with his goodness," those to whom their fruits have yielded abundant increase, should remember the charge given by St. Paul, "that they do good, that they be rich in good works, ready to distribute, willing to communicate, laying up in store for themselves a good foundation against the time to come, that they may lay hold of eternal life."* Thus should the wealthy shew their gratitude, and not adopt that thoughtless security of the worldly-minded person, whom our Saviour represents as saying within himself, "Soul, thou hast much goods laid up for many years; take thine ease, eat, drink, and be merry."† This is the language of presumptuous self-sufficiency, the conduct of inconsiderate folly; for should the voice of God say unto the rich man, "this night thy soul shall be required of thee, then whose shall those things be, that thou hast provided?"‡ should death snatch him suddenly from the world, then will his impiety towards God, and his inhumanity towards his fellow-creatures, be among the sins which will merit the divine displeasure. §

The necessity of observing these and all other Christian precepts, arises not only from their own real intrinsic excellence and reasonableness, but also from the prospect of a future state, which our Saviour has described in a parable allusive to our present subject, and which he thus explains: "He that soweth the good seed is the son of man: the field is the world: the good seed are the children of the kingdom; but the tares are the children of the wicked one: the enemy that sowed them is the devil: the harvest is the end of the world: and the reapers are the angels. As therefore the tares are gathered and burnt in the fire, so shall it be in the end of this world.

The son of man shall send forth his angels, and they shall gather out of his kingdom all things that offend, and them which do iniquity; and shall cast them into a furnace of fire, where shall be wailing and gnashing of teeth. Then shall the righteous shine forth as the sun, in the kingdom of their father."* That "with honest and good hearts, when we have heard the word of God, we may keep it, and bring forth fruit with patience;"† that with a love of integrity, a reverence for Christ's religion, a resolution to follow it amidst all the difficulties and all the trials which must attend a state of probation; that our spiritual harvest of faith and good works may render us the objects of God's favour, should be our first and most earnest prayer: but when we have sought "the kingdom of God and his righteousness,"‡ when we have supplicated the Almighty for divine grace to assist our spiritual wants, we may then innocently and properly offer our petitions to the author and giver of all good things, "That our sons may grow up as the young plants, and that our daughters may be as the polished corners of the temple; that our gainers may be full and plentiful with all manner of store: that our sheep may bring forth thousands and ten thousands in our streets: that our oxen may be strong to labour: that there be no decay; no leading into captivity, and no complaining in our streets. Happy are the people that are in such a case; yea, blessed are the people who have the Lord for their God."§

SERMO CLVHI.

By GEO. ISAAC HUNTINGFORD, D.D.

Bishop of Gloucester.

God the original Author of all Blessings enjoyed by Man.

2 Cor. x. 17.

He that glorieth, let him glory in the Lord!

By continual intercourse with objects of sense, and familiar habit of receiving the manifold blessings of life through the intervention of second causes, we frequently neglect to carry back our thoughts to that original Author of all existence, by whose law the works of creation were ordained and constituted; and we ascribe to powers, which are but God's instruments, that tribute of praise which in greater part should be assigned to God himself! The economy of Divine Providence, by the agency of second causes, is indeed wonderful, and abundantly displays the wisdom and goodness of that Almighty Being, by whose appointment it was established: it is however requisite, that we should not acquiesce in barely extolling the means by which blessings are imparted to mankind; it is the part of humility, and the business of piety, to look with gratitude towards the Author of those means, and to refer all bodily, local, temporal, mental, and spiritual advantages ultimately to God, as the primary and principal source from whence they all flow.

In contemplating man, we are naturally led to consider him in the first place as a creature endowed with singular properties in the constitution of his frame. In every part* of him appears visibly the hand of a Creator, who, with exquisite arrangement, has admirably disposed the several members of the body in a manner best calculated to serve each its respective ends. By due exertion, every organ and every limb of the body acquires insensibly additional perfection; inasmuch that in men habituated, either through necessity or choice, rather to active than sedentary employments, are seen instances of agility and strength, which are almost incredible. Yet in the possession of these properties, what has man to boast? Only, that in this, as in other circumstances, he is† gifted by God with powers designed first for self-preservation, and then for the benefit of his species. Commend him over so much for the laborious practice by which he has attained uncommon use of his bodily faculties; admire him, as you please, for the firmness of his constitution, or the proportions of his stature; yet, after all, whence does he receive it, that he is made capable of extraordinary efforts, and that he appears superior in external form? The cheek of the languid, the couch of the infirm, the bed of the sick, will often remind us of a duty, which in the vigour of health we are apt to forget: if reason and religion are not heard, the harbingers of death at least will admonish us that, as first of all from God we derived ability to attain any corporeal advantages, so consequently on God we must depend for the longer or shorter continuance of them. Without his will, we could not have begun; without his will, we cannot preserve our existence; where then is there room for boasting in outward excellencies? That they are ornamental, that they are beneficial to the possessor of them, is unquestionable; but equally unquestionable it is, that the possessor of them is indebted for them originally to his Maker: if therefore in health and strength he be disposed to glory, let him glory also in the Lord as in the Giver of them.

The regions of the world are widely extended and infinitely diversified. In different climates are found varieties, not only in productions of inanimate nature, but in the human species. Countries‡ there are, where men appear in a condition worse than that of brute beasts. Without garments to cover, or huts to shelter them, they endure the severities of inclement seasons; and totally ignorant of all arts, they subsist on food precarious and scanty.

Removed but a small distance from the barbarism of these, are others who are clad in the skins* of sea-monsters, who support life by the most nauseous aliment, who shiver under hovels rudely constructed, and who themselves seem so conscious of their own misery, that they occupy their thoughts with little else than reflexion on their want and wretchedness.

Rising above them, in other parts of the globe, are men, who do indeed exhibit proofs of ingenuity in the cultivation of useful arts, and who enjoy many comforts of social intercourse; yet still retaining the savage ferocity of unsubdued passion, they satiate their revenge by exercising the most horrid cruelties on the victims of their fury, and complete the scene of inhuman triumph by feasts of the foulest and most abominable nature.

But leaving regions still barbarous, let us come to nations that profess themselves civilized. Of them, are many within our knowledge that experience not the inestimable blessings we enjoy; they have neither the same freedom, nor the same security, nor the same reciprocal helps, nor the same general sense of rectitude, nor the same lights of reason, nor the same truths of religion, imparted to them, which are diffused universally through the land we inhabit. In the comparison of our own with innumerable other nations, we surely have inducements irresistibly strong for loving with deep attachment, and for extolling with honest pride, the country in which we are born, protected, and cherished.

But let us ask, by whose appointment has it so befallen us, that this should be the place of our nativity? The choice of situation, in which we would act our part on the globe, was clearly not given to us, nor were the fathers that begat us enabled to fix on the spot where they would be born. God alone could ordain for our ancestors, could ordain for us, that in this particular quarter of the world we should appear to fulfil the several purposes for which we are created. To God therefore should our thanks be given, that our existence had its origin amidst numberless local advantages; and when our hearts swell with a natural, and surely pardonable, exultation in the name of our country, let them also be warmed with gratitude towards the Lord, by whose destination we belong to this country.

For the due preservation of that order, without which the chief ends of human society could not be answered; (since without order, neither property nor person could be secure, as neither political, nor moral, nor religious advantages could be derived from the lawless assemblage of ungoverned multitudes;) for the due preservation of that order, it is the divine appointment, evidently manifested in the constitution and history of man through all ages, that in every kingdom, not absolutely barbarian, there should be† inequality of condition. That there should be high and low, rich and poor, in the same society, is a decree of the Almighty fixed and uniform, as that there should be young and old; disparity of circumstances is established by God's will on grounds as immovable, and on reasons as wise, as disparity of age. To repine under an arrangement which never can be altered so long as there subsists the same relation between causes and effects which is now ordained; to murmur that we cannot all have the same opulence, or power, or dignity, were as folly as culpable, and a dissatisfaction as unreasonable, as it would be to complain that the heavens did not always shed upon us the genial influence of warm suns and serene skies. Our wisdom and duty is to acquiesce in the general law of distinct ranks, in which man is formed to experience the greatest degree of happiness.

But submission of this kind to an universal appointment, by no means precludes the fair, just, and honest endeavours of individuals, to amend the condition, and rise from the rank in which they are born. Industry in our calling, whatever it may be, is another law of our nature forcibly binding as resignation. Both are to be taken together: the talents which are given us must be diligently exerted; but the effect of such exertion must be left to the disposal of that over-ruling power which nothing human can possibly controul. If in the course of our labours we meet with prosperity, we have abundant cause to be thankful; thankful to friends, who have given us support, but more thankful to God, by whom those friends were raised up for us. Yet the language of the world is after another mode. We are loud in commending our own application; we estimate our services at a high value; we talk of our foresight, our conjectures, our calculations; we exult in what we term a lucky chance, a fortunate accident.

Humility and piety forbid self-arrangement, and direct the thinking mind to something higher than an issue merely fortuitous. They impel us indeed to omit no single circumstance, by which the duty of our station may be zealously and conscientiously discharged; but then, in every happy event, they prompt us to recollect, that from God came the powers which have enabled us to conceive prudent measures, from God came the success in which our enterprises have terminated; when therefore we would glory in our temporal concerns, we should glory in the Lord by whose Providence both the means and the end have been dispensed to us!

That which entitles man to distinguished superiority over the brute creation, is the faculty of reason. In the use of powers merely animal, man is confessedly inferior to many beasts of the field. But God, in having given him a mind capable of reason, has imparted that which is the foundation of man's dominion over creatures irrational, that which is the spring of all his necessary, useful, and ornamental arts, that which improves, adorns, and exalts his nature, above every species inhabiting this globe*, that which discovers to him the existence of an Almighty Being, who alone formed the universe, that which points out to him the duties of gratitude and obedience towards the father of all men, and maker of all things!

The degrees in which the faculty of reason shows itself either more strongly or faintly, depend on an infinite variety of causes not at our own command. Difference in the proportion of those abilities which we call natural, and are altogether the immediate gifts of God, difference in education, difference in practice, difference in country, difference in climate; all these circumstances influence the mind with varieties of force; and produce varieties of effect in the actual exertion and general application of the reasoning faculty. But these differences can no more be avoided by man, than difference of soil, position, and produce, can be avoided by the earth. The mind of every man, indeed, commonly speaking, has by nature a capacity for improving its reasoning faculty; but whether that capacity shall receive proper aids, or to what extent it shall be carried if duly assisted, no one in the first instance can for himself choose. In the lowest state of degraded nature, man scarcely appears to have begun exerting his capacity; in a condition raised but little above the lowest, he is still found indolent, stupid, and insensible; in situations somewhat superior to these, his capacity extends to no wider limits than to the art of providing subsistence, and of defending himself against dangers. In countries civilised the means of instruction, the opportunities of mental exercise, leisure for invention, observation, and reflection, neither are nor can be given to all alike. And even if these advantages could be distributed in equal proportions, yet ardour of genius, strength of imagination, quickness of apprehension, and depth of penetration, could by no art of man be alike communicated. God is the first Creator of our mind, and on his will depends the disposal of us to situations where the capacity of the mind shall attain greater or less perfection in its faculty of reason. Does any possess extraordinary abilities?

* See Xenophon's Memorabilia, lib. i. c. 4. § 13.

He is gifted by God. Is any educated in useful learning? It is God who provides for him either parents or benefactors, by whose beneficence he is so instructed. Is any furnished with means of cultivating his mental powers more advantageously than others? The train of events which may have led to such opportunities, was directed by the counsel and permission of God. Are the country and climate where any is born, better* suited than others for exertions of the mind? It was God's appointment that in a region thus favourable he should happily exist. The previous circumstances which chiefly conduce to difference in the faculty of reason, being thus under God's direction, and gracious dispensations of his Providence, to his goodness should the first praise be ascribed, by those who have been enabled to improve their mind, and instead of that vanity which too usually tarnishes the beauty of superior attainments, should be adopted a humble sense of gratitude to the God who "giveth man understanding;" and an acknowledgment that in the divine blessing is the original cause, from which, to one man rather than another, are imparted greater measures of mental endowment.

That man should be religious, proceeds as much from the constitution of his nature, as that he should be social or imitative. Observation on man in present and past ages proves that he, and he alone of the beings in this world, is formed to practise religious duties. For however ignorant of religious principles the most barbarous savages may be, and however indifferent to religious service the presumptuous and conceited, the careless and dissipated in civilized nations may appear, yet these constitute but a comparatively small part of mankind; and, it would be equally false to conclude, either from the ignorance of the one, or the indifference of the other, against the general tendency of mankind to religion, as it would be to conclude that, because savages are wild, therefore men are not born for society; and because thoughtless persons never reflect, therefore men are not born to follow reason. Arguing from experience founded on facts, we are convinced, beyond possibility of doubt, that God intended man to be a religious creature. Much of man's happiness depends on his cultivation of religious principles, and observance of religious duties; and this happiness will be greater or less, in proportion as the system of religion, which we may have embraced, is more or less pure. With respect to ourselves, we have a system calculated in every part of it to promote private and social happiness, by enforcing all that we can think or call virtue. Christianity sets forth to us, that there is an Almighty God, who will recompense every one in a future state, according to the goodness he has exercised in this life: that there is an Eternal Son, who intercedes for the return of God's favour to such as are sincerely penitent for transgressions: that there is a sanctifying spirit, who, by his influence on the soul, assists every one that devoutly and earnestly prays for help. We are encouraged in the first instance never to swerve from our duty, by consideration that the recompense will be proportioned to our degrees of perfection: we are then prevented from abandoning ourselves to despair after the commission of sin, by promise of pardon upon unfeigned repentance and actual relinquishing of wicked practices: and we are lastly assured, that divine aid will strengthen our natural weakness in the hour of temptation to do wrong, if we will but lift up our souls in earnest supplication to heaven! Nothing is here omitted, that can be done for the inducement of rational agents to live in the habits of virtue and piety. The rewards are distant, that man may act with a more free choice in determining on the line of conduct he will pursue. Pardon is given to repentance, that man may not, after he has done wrong, think it then unavailable to amend his life. Assistance spiritual is imparted to the suppliant, that his endeavours to be virtuous may be carried into effect. In essence so pure, in rites so plain, christianity bespeaks its divine origin, and exceeds every system of religion that has hitherto appeared in the known world.

Under this system we are living; but by whose appointment? How comes it that we, like our pagan ancestors, are not sacrificing unto idols? Whence is it, that our children, like those of the Ammonites, do not pass through the fire to Moloch? From what cause does it ultimately proceed, that through a succession of ages the light of the gospel hath shined upon this nation, hath dispelled the darkness of gross superstition, hath banished all rites of horrid cruelty, hath established a mode of worship more spiritual than ceremonial? The dispensation of Providence, which ordained that Christianity should be preached here, neither we nor our ancestors devised: from the counsel, the mercy, and blessing of the Almighty it originated, that we should be called to a knowledge of the true God, and of his Christ, whom he sent to reform and redeem us. When therefore we recollect, as we often should recollect, the excellence of our religion, so infinitely superior to all others; when we glory, as with reason we may do, in being a people to whom are communicated divine truths, which from many regions of the globe are yet concealed; we should glory in the Lord, through whose peculiar favour the gospel was imparted to our forefathers, and by them has been delivered down to us. And thus much for advantages of a spiritual nature in a general view.

How far individually through his Christian course each man receives the aid of divine grace, every one, by comparing his own thoughts and actions with the precepts of the gospel, must judge for himself. That God gives ability, and that man has a great work to perform, are truths equally certain: but to what extent the divine grace operates, and in what degree the endeavours of man must be exerted, no one can determine for another, and perhaps few for themselves. From analogy of what is manifest in the natural world, where on different persons different bodily advantages are evidently bestowed; and from the language of Scripture also, which plainly intimates that the Holy Spirit will add grace to some dispositions, but will forsake others; we may infer that there exists a difference in spiritual, no less than in corporeal endowments. Has any man a clearer conception of gospel evidences, a firmer faith in the gospel promises, a conscience more alive to the calls of religion, a more earnest solicitude to obey God, and a manner of thinking and acting more conformable with the dictates of temperance, justice, and piety; has any man these qualities in a measure beyond others? then he may be assured that the divine assistance has been communicated to him. Whether by the agency of second causes, or whether by direct influence on the soul, such assistance is communicated, still it is from the Lord that he derives such blessing, and his glory should be not in his own merits, but in that help which cometh from the Lord.

And now, upon a review of what has been said, it appears, that as man is to himself the original cause neither of the strength or health which he enjoys, nor of his being born in any particular place or country, nor of the circumstances which have concurred with his own labours to promote success, nor of the powers with which his mind is endowed, nor of his being enlightened by Christianity, nor of his ability to live conformably with the gospel; it follows, that in every stage of his life he is dependent on the Supreme disposer, director, and controller of all things.

The duties arising from this state of dependence are, gratitude towards the giver of the blessings which at present we enjoy, and prayer for such a continuance of divine favour, as may seem to God's unerring wisdom best calculated for our general happiness.

It is farther evident, that the method of God's Providence towards man is, commonly speaking, to impart capacity for improving his condition. Thus in the faculties of his body and mind, and in advantages temporal and spiritual, man, among a civilised people, by due exertion of the capacity allotted him, and proper employment of the means offered him, is enabled by God to raise his nature from a fallen and degraded to a renovated and comparatively dignified state.

The duties arising from this dispensation are, thanksgiving to God proportionable to the abilities and opportunities with which each person is furnished, and diligence in making the utmost improvement possible of the several talents with which he is entrusted. God is a moral governor, and will do right: "Unto whomsoever much is given, of him shall much be required*."

Lastly, it is evident, that as man is formed for the exercise of reason, the invention of arts, the comforts of society, the observance of moral duties, the knowledge, practice, and rewards of religious service, he has abundant reason on these accounts to glory in his pre-eminence above the brute creation, conscious to himself that his species is peculiarly favoured by the goodness of his Creator: yet at the same time he has greater reason for referring the ultimate glory to the Lord, since by Him, and through Him, are either given or denied, either continued or withdrawn, all the faculties which are the ornaments of our nature.

SERMON CLIX.

Bishop of Gloucester.

On the different Sentiments which are entertained at different Periods of our Age.

1 COR. xiii. 11.

When I was a Child, I spake as a Child, I understood as a Child, I thought as a Child; but when I became a Man, I put away childish Things.

THE immediate design of the Apostle in the use of these expressions, was by an apt similitude forcibly to represent, that whatever might be his knowledge of the Christian dispensation during the present confined state of his intellectual faculties, yet, comparatively speaking, it was but little better than mere ignorance, when contrasted with that more clear and more perfect understanding of Divine truths, which would enlighten his mind when its powers were more enlarged in a future life, the concerns of which would be altogether spiritual. But the words may be taken by us in a literal as well as a figurative sense; and we may first apply them to the purpose of remarking the different* conceptions of the same objects, which men of serious reflection entertain at different periods of their age.

The law, which regulates and pervades this system of the universe, to which we belong, is that nothing connected with it should be at once† perfect. Accordingly we see that mature improvement is the result of progressive‡ advances, carried on from beginnings commonly slight and inconsiderable, and pursued to the utmost extent of refinement, which the condition of things now existing, and the peculiar qualities of the object to be improved, are capable of admitting. In the works of Divine Creation, as in those of human art, the force of this law is equally observable. Whether we look to the inanimate or animate parts of the globe, we shall find this decree operating with uniform influence§. Before we can gather the full ear of corn, we must patiently wait to see first the tender blade, and then the more firm stalk*. Before we can pluck the fruit of a tree, the tender plant must be converted into a robust trunk. For every species of animal existence, whether in the air, the earth, or the waters, a similar progression from the imbecility of first production to the comparative strength of full growth, is universally ordained. The earth itself performs its revolutions, not so as that every part should at once have broad noon; but that dawn of light, and morn should precede the mid-day. Let these illustrations be now applied to man. As in his body†, so in his intellect, he arrives at maturity by successive progress. In his youth, the senses, the memory, the imagination, are the characteristic faculties. At the earliest period of manhood, reflection on what the senses have imparted, the memory retained, and the imagination conceived, begins to operate. Habits of reflection lead on to judgment; and judgment, as the effect which ultimately proceeds from the due exercise of abilities antecedently acquired, directs man to form his opinions on subjects important to his happiness: such are, pleasurable amusements; condition of life; the actions of all persons with whom he is more immediately connected; the civil polity, by which his person, his freedom, and his property are to be secured; and the truths of that religion which claims observance, as being the revelation of God's will to man. Whatever has reference to either of these concerns, most commonly engages, and indeed most justly demands his attention.

In his conceptions then of the manner in which his leisure hours may be spent agreeably; of condition in life; of conduct in individuals; of civil institutions; and of Christian doctrines; it is probable he will experience considerable changes through the progress of his age: and this, not from any instability of mind; but from having taken a more enlarged view of all subjects that have occurred to his thoughts; from more thorough acquaintance with all circumstances; from more extensive information, deeper reflection, greater strength for conclusive reasoning, and firmer grounds for solid judgment*.

In nothing does the opinion of mature age more widely differ from that of youth, than with respect to the pursuits of pleasurable amusement. In the ardour of early days, the mind seeks with avidity every object that is new, every scene that is animating, every engagement that can call into action the bodily powers: and whatever is not recommended by novelty, whatever requires repose, or demands the application of intellect, appears then to be dull, insipid, and uninteresting. But follow the same mind to that time of life, when the habits either of professional learning, or of active employment, operate with the strongest force. To the man of letters disengaged from weightier concerns, either the works of imagination, or sober reflection, or social converse, amidst the calm serenity of undisturbed quiet, afford the most exquisite delight†: and the man of business

* In the first period of life, children are not capable of distinguishing right from wrong in human conduct; neither are they capable of abstract reasoning in matters of science. Their judgment of moral conduct, as well as their judgment of truth, advances by insensible degrees, like the corn and the grass.

We may observe a similar progress in the faculties of the mind: for there is a wonderful analogy among all the works of God, from the least even to the greatest.

finds his greatest relief in rural retirement and domestic comfort. To each of them his own simple method of recreation is much more satisfactory, than many of the modes by which intervals of leisure are often filled up, at the expence of inconvenient trouble and perhaps injured health to those, whom the strength and sprightliness of youth have forsaken.

The conceptions of young minds are generally erroneous, in mistaking the causes from which the happiness of external condition arises. Captivated by the parade, and beguiled by the case of opulence, they conclude these to be the sources of felicity; and therefore annex ideas of supreme enjoyment to the high rank in which opulence abounds. And judging only from the labour and frugality incident to other classes, they form an opinion, that even the middle order of society must be less happy than the higher. But a more true estimate of wealth and situation leads us to more just conclusions. High rank hath indeed the means of unspeakable happiness; for it hath power to do good, superfluity to relieve the distressed, opportunity for enjoying rational pleasures, and what is of no small value, ability to be independent. If however to the possessor of these means, there be wanting a mind capable of applying them to purposes, that will promote the ends for which affluence should serve, purposes from which alone can arise mental satisfaction; in that case rank and its glittering appendages add nothing to human happiness. Much less does exemption from useful employment tend to that effect. Weariness and disgust not unfrequently obtrude themselves on him, who wants occupation * either of body or mind. On the contrary, a cheerful and contented disposition is usually found in those, who divide their time between rest and labour. Commonly speaking then, it is not so much from the condition itself, as from the right use of it that happiness arises to high rank. And upon a general view of the middle, compared with higher ranks, perhaps it may be truly said, that where in the middle rank there is competency the fruit of industry, and where the heart is right to God and man, pure from evil intention towards any person existing, erect above mean and abject thoughts, and ready to perform kind offices on all occasions; in that case, there is little, if any disparity with respect to real satisfaction, on the side of exalted station.

Of actions palpably vicious and dishonest, a mind not corrupt will uniformly retain the same opinion. Whatever in itself is morally bad, must stand condemned by us at every age of our life, if our passions have not grossly perverted our reason, and if we ourselves are not depraved. It is not then of cases notoriously wicked that we are now speaking: of them there can be in us no diversity of sentiment. But the common occurrences of every day present to our observation an infinitude of actions, which, if taken abstractedly and without reference to any other circumstances, are of a nature indifferent; and the rectitude, or impropriety of them, depends entirely on various considerations to be regarded in the person who acts. The occasion, in its full extent, to which he must suit his measures; the principles from which his purpose originated; the views with which he adopted this or that manner of forwarding his design; the means with which he was furnished for executing it; the difficulties with which he had to contend in his progress; the particular obligations of duty which either his station, or age, or profession, might require of him; and perhaps many other minute points, which, however immaterial they might appear to cursory observers, may nevertheless be of great moment to the party immediately concerned; all these particulars must be taken into the account as the probable grounds on which his conduct was directed, before we can pronounce the common actions of any one near us to be either praise-worthy or blameable*. But in the season of ardour and inexperience, we are prejudiced by first views; and alike impatient and incapable of making inquiry into the intrinsic merits or demerits of what we perceive done, both in affairs of moment and in common behaviour we often censure what deserves commendation, and as often applaud what should rather be reprehended. Thus, eager to pursue our own inclinations, and incompetent to estimate the blessings of education, we are not much disposed† to regard with affection those who either check our vicious tendencies, or who enforce diligence in the acquisition of learning: the greater portion of our favour is bestowed on others, who suffer us to persist in follies, without admonition, and to misapply our time and talents, without reproof. Discerning not the bounds, which separate liberality from profusion, to the squanderings of the prodigal we give the name of generosity, and deem the bounties of the prudent no marks of beneficence. Alive to resentment, and hasty for revenge, we annex the idea of heroism to implacability, and impute forgiveness of injuries to want of spirit. If we can bring ourselves to somewhat like reconciliation, yet as we are neither habituated to the governing of our anger, nor enlarged in our knowledge and views of things, we suffer trifles to renew our animosity‡, and think the same irritability laudable in others. Little conversant with affairs of the world, and as yet untaught that every end requires corresponding means conducive to it; that such means it is not always in our power to command; that the same object wears not to all persons alike the same appearance; that on many occasions the prejudices, the tempers, the humours of others must be consulted, and suitable opportunities for making impressions on their minds be attentively observed and seasonably embraced; untaught in this complication of human concerns, which usually retards dispatch, and frequently creates invincible impediment to the accomplishing of our wishes; through self-confidence and sanguine hope we are assured success would have attended us, where persons more judicious have either abandoned the undertaking, or have experienced an unfavourable event. In the love of truth being ourselves ingenuous, but in our manner of shewing it often intemperate, the rude and uncivil we call open and sincere, and mistake disgusting sourness for plain honesty. Though we are prone to treat with ridicule the foibles of others, yet we are provoked by retaliation, as if it were an insult; for, through want of self-inspection we are ignorant of ourselves, and we forget that he who retorts was not the aggressor.

Such then being some of the misconceptions, under which with regard to the actions of other men we frequently labour in the days of our youth, let us now consider the effect which advancing years very commonly produce on our judgment.

* Ἦταν πρῶτον δυο τυχῆ λαβας; "Audi alteram partem;" "There are two-sides to every question;" are proverbial sayings, replete with good sense, and founded on accurate observation and practical knowledge of human concerns. Hen. 1 Epist. iii. 33.

Observing that mordinate indulgence of appetite is destructive to health, to understanding, to reputation; and finding that proficiency in no art or science can be attained but by efforts of industrious application, we recall to our memories, and respect as our best friends, those who curbed our passions, when they required the strongest check; and who impelled us to assiduity in cultivating our abilities. Circumscribed as many are by the limits of mediocrity in temporal possessions, and unavoidably obliged as all are to adapt their expences to the measure of their property, we are sensible that frugality is the foundation of generosity; and that frequently the giver of a small donation is more truly liberal, than he who without thought and without inconvenience more largely contributes. From having felt the iniquitude of mind and disorder of the reasoning faculties, which anger has occasioned in our own bosoms; from having noticed the extravagant and absurd acts, by which persons resentful degrade themselves in the estimation of the more moderate; from having found it a work infinitely more difficult, and therefore more manly to govern, rather than obey the impetuosity of our temper; from having discovered that a disposition unknowing how to relent is odious in a society of civilized manners, and suitable to none but a savage barbarian; from a sense too, that we ourselves often need forgiveness, but that pardon we cannot expect, if none we grant; from all these considerations we love the person, who with patience will endure provocations, and on easy terms will consent to reconciliation. When obstacles in the way of some desirable end have frequently impeded the career, in which we fancied we could proceed without difficulty or hindrance; and when we have been taught that others, no less than ourselves, are tenacious of some preconceived opinions, influenced by some habitual disposition, and fluctuating in their inclination; we are then convinced that however excellent and adviseable a measure might be in itself, yet frequently it is not practicable, and therefore must be relinquished, from a cause which neither wisdom nor zeal can control, the necessity of the case. If we have learnt it not from reflection creditable to our understanding, we shall at least have been made to know it from the resentment we have provoked, that truth and frankness, if they mean to be useful, must in their application be discreet, and in their language delicate. Self-knowledge will at last have taught us, that we need not look beyond ourselves to find instances of folly: and that unless we would bring on ourselves and hear with unconcern, reproach from others, we must forbear taking the unwarrantable liberty of ridiculing them. And thus having been ourselves placed under a greater variety of circumstances, and having attended to the modes of acting which in a diversity of cases we have been compelled by those circumstances to adopt; having moreover learnt that men in general, constituted as they are of passions the same in kind, though different in degree, do in similar situations act nearly on similar principles; we are commonly disposed to judge with candour and to pronounce condemnation on no man, till we have heard the reasons of his conduct fully explained, and the grounds of such reasons impartially disclosed*.

As thus we change our sentiments on the actions of individuals, we correct them no less on concerns of civil policy. For, we apply the same candour in judging of public as of private measures; and conceive that were the motives for such measures understood, the authors of them would be justified. In our earlier years we are totally unacquainted with the "secret lets and difficulties, which in public proceedings are intrumerable and inevitable:”* but when observation of facts hath made us sensible, how arduous a task it is to secure obedience to the laws, in a system which combines different and opposite principles, and which, though it supports order, yet subjects every individual to the least restraint that can possibly be laid on him consistently with the ends and purposes of civil society; when experience hath taught us this knowledge, we do not hastily and for slight imperfections “go about to persuade the multitude, that they are not so well governed as they ought to be.”†

Let us now consider the influence of mature age on some opinions of a religious nature.

At that period when they first begin to think of religion, many, forming their judgment from the simplicity of Christian Elements, are led to conceive, that for the understanding of the Sacred Writings nothing more is necessary, than the knowledge of words in the Hebrew and Greek tongues. They have it yet to discover, that if they would learn to interpret the whole body of Scripture, by which Christian elements are introduced, established, and illustrated, they must become acquainted with particulars, various in kind, and wide in comprehension. The idiomatic phraseology of the languages in which the Scriptures are written; the object of types and application of antitypes; the views and completion of prophecies; the scope and connexion of the Old and New Testament; the manners, customs, opinions, times, and places, to which allusion is respectively made in the several passages to be explained; all these circumstances demand consideration, before a complete and faithful exposition can be given: added to which must be a readiness in comparing texts that are to be collated, and ability in thence drawing a just conclusion. He who is content with hastily and superficially perusing the words only of Scripture, will long remain ignorant of the many qualifications requisite for the forming of a biblical scholar, and must be incompetent to the work of interpretation. But when the mind hath begun to investigate the sense of Scripture, it then perceives its inability to make any effectual progress without continual reference to those rules of criticism*, which are suitable to the style and genius of holy writ, and without the concurrent aid of philology in all its branches. Experience of this nature creates in us reluctance either to propose, or adopt novel opinions concerning first principles in religion; and renders us properly cautious, how we reject interpretations given by men, who were known to have devoted their time and talents for many successive years, to the sole employment of examining and illustrating the Scriptures.

Again; to the study of the Scriptures others come, bringing with them indeed serious attention; but through that intellectual presumption, which attends inexperience, they bring also a disposition to adopt no doctrine, which is not perfectly within the comprehension of their own reason. Long reflection however teaches us that Revelation professes to communicate more than reason could have made known to us; and that God and his ways, which are the subjects of Revelation, are far above the capacity of man. Man is finite, God infinite in understanding. Man sees but some few years; the sight of God extends through eternity. Man can argue only on human principles; God may have counsels and motives for acting, not indeed irreconcilable, but impenetrable to human wisdom. Man is limited in all his powers; but God can do all things which imply not contradiction. Man can give but little account of his own nature†; the nature of divine essence he is utterly incapable of comprehending. From not having observed that the compass of reason cannot be enlarged beyond a certain point; and from not having considered the ineffable disparity between God and man, between things divine and human; many at their first application to the study of the gospel have received the doctrines of atonement and of the Trinity, with degrees of doubt, because they could not understand how divine justice could be satisfied with the death of an innocent person; or how the same essence could be so communicated, as that the Godhead of the Father, of the Son, and of the Holy Spirit, should be but One. Patient investigation, however, at length teaches them, that it is not required of them to understand how these things can be. God reveals the facts, and therefore they cannot but be true. And repeated experience that we believe most firmly many other facts, for which however we cannot account, convinces us that it is entirely consistent with reason to believe the gospel doctrines, though by man inexplicable. Thus; that the world exists, we have ocular demonstration; and that God created it, we can prove to moral certainty; but how his Almighty word could call into existence things which before had no being; why He formed the world after the manner we now behold it, or why He formed it at all: these are questions which cannot be explained, nor indeed are ever asked by sound reasoners. With respect to the doctrines of atonement and the Trinity, the case is similar. That these doctrines exist in the gospel, we are persuaded by the interpretation of many passages to that effect. We believe that He, who delivered those doctrines, spake what in his superior wisdom He knew to be true; the doctrines themselves, therefore, we admit on that account; but how or why the death of Christ is thus efficacious; or how the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit, are united in one Godhead, are questions we do not pretend or think it necessary to solve, because Revelation hath not explained them, nor hath God required of us such knowledge.*

It is one part of wisdom to be sensible of our ignorance; and one mark of courage not to fear confessing that of some things we are ignorant. In the pride of youth, we neither feel that our understanding is limited; nor, if we did feel it, would jealousy, lest our abilities should be depreciated, permit us to acknowledge any imperfection of that nature, even though it be unavoidable. When, however, our researches have often been obstructed by utter impossibility to unfold primary causes, and when we have learnt to think it more pusillanimous to pretend having powers which man cannot possess, than freely to own that with many particulars of an abstruse kind we are unacquainted; we hesitate not to reply, "we do not know," when the reasons which made the death of Christ a condition of mercy towards man, and when the essential nature of Deity are asked of us. To God's infinite wisdom and unerring word we refer all such difficulties: under conviction of the one and sanction of the other, we resign our former prejudices; and believe the doctrines revealed unto mankind assuredly for no other purpose, than to increase their happiness by improving their morals and their religious knowledge.

Having thus far noticed and endeavoured to account for the different conceptions, which many persons have entertained at different periods of their age, we may now briefly remark on the figurative sense in the words of the apostle; by which he would intimate the increase of knowledge which will enlighten our souls, when we are raised to a life immortal. That such increase will probably ensue, we have reason to expect from analogy. For, not only are men more intelligent than children, but generations of men become wiser as they advance in succession. Hence we find, that of the objections†, which the disputers of old brought forward, as irreconcilable with the divine attributes,

* See Bp. CONYBEARE'S Sermon on Mysteries, in vol. iii. EXHIBITION THEOLOGICUM.

† "Had the epicurean atheists of old, or the forementioned modern astronomer, duly examined these things, they would not have so rashly pronounced concerning the faultiness of the Creation; they would have seen on the foregoing principles, that what upon their hypothesis is so irregular and uncertain, is in reality most uniform and determinate: and that all their complaints are founded upon their ignorance of the true system of the world." See "Enquiry into the Cause and Origin of Evil," by Dr. JOHN CLARKE, p. 125, ed. 1720. See also Dr. BENTLEY'S "Confutation of Atheism," Sermon 8. s. 10.

many proceeded entirely from ignorance of facts, which have since been discovered by physical inquiries; and of the evils, which in past centuries the superstices made to the Scriptures, many were founded in want* of that critical and historical knowledge, which has been since more widely diffused through the whole body of Christians.

Moreover, from the manner in which God by gradual prophecies, at first obscure, then somewhat more plain, and finally distinct, revealed the coming of the Messiah; and from the order in which Christianity, the better dispensation, succeeded the Jewish economy, which was but a preparatory introduction to a more excellent covenant; from these methods of proceeding in the divine administration we might conclude, that degrees of improved knowledge in truths respecting the nature of God and the means appointed for man's redemption will hereafter be communicated in that state of existence to which we are progressively approaching.

To the same conclusion are also led, by consideration of the comparative difference which necessarily subsists between a state imperfect and perfect. Our present condition is imperfect, and to it are adapted all our faculties. The mind now perceives through organs, which even in their utmost vigour are but limited in their powers; and which by various accidents lose the force even of those limited powers. Our future condition will be perfect; in that we shall probably be endued with more clear perception through the means of bodily organs, proportionably improved; and as the powers of perception, so also those of our understanding, may be infinitely more enlarged.

Such grounds for hoping this will be the case, we have even from analogy. But there is still a foundation on which we may more firmly rely; it is the declaration of St. Paul, assuring us that hereafter we shall discern spiritual things with the utmost clearness, or, to use his own emphatical language, "face to face." And a greater than St. Paul hath given us encouragement, to prepare our souls by the cultivating of right affections: even Christ himself hath solemnly pronounced, "Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God†."

The reflections to be made on what has been said are briefly these:

Petulant contradiction, vain arrogance, and bold assumption create disgust in every season of life: but more particularly when predominant in that age which, from unavoidable inexperience, is most subject to error, and which therefore should be docile and open to conviction.

The degree of our misconception will probably be less, and the time of its duration proportionably shorter, accordingly as greater care to guard us from false opinions has been bestowed on us in the course of our education. Of what vast importance then is it, that elementary principles of the purest kind should be assiduously† inculcated! And how unspeakably valuable is that education which teaches to youthful days nothing that manhood must labour to unlearn!

However the censorious may be inclined through malevolence to attribute a change of sentiments to improper motives, yet, in the estimation of candid judges habituated to reflection, it sullies no man's honour to abandon a mistaken and adopt a right principle; it degrades no man's understanding to acknowledge he has thought erroneously, but that after mature inquiry he has altered § his opinions : for very little do they answer the purpose of increasing age, who become not usefully wiser, as they grow older.

If after long experience and better information we have been so happy as to correct our judgment, yet let us not thence forget there was a time when, to our sorrow, we ourselves were differently persuaded; nor let us be so uncandid as to make no allowance for the errors of persons still deceived, errors in which ourselves perhaps were once involved*.

Neither with respect to the injudicious sentiments and imprudent words of those, who have afterwards perceived and lamented their folly, let our memory be retentive to so malignant a purpose, as to treasure up the language of their former indiscretion for a ground of obloquy† and an occasion of ridicule. "Reproach not a man that turneth from sin‡," says the son of Sirach, prudently and humanely. But if even sins forsaken should no longer be recollected, surely errors that have been amended should be buried in oblivion. Ill indeed does it become man to reproach his fellow-creature with past misconceptions: for whatever may be our progress in thinking rightly on many subjects, still ignorance of others without number is inseparable from human nature through the whole of this life.

It remains for our existence in a future state, that our ignorance should be gradually removed: and among other blessings reserved for the just and good, it is probably one, that there should be extended to them a continual progression* in attainments spiritual and intellectual. This is a recompence which every one who loves God and virtue, sanctity and knowledge, will labour to obtain: and "Blessed are they which hunger and thirst after righteousness, for they shall be filled‡."

Whatsoever thou takest in hand, remember the end, and thou shalt never do amiss.

IN the exercise either of liberal or mechanic arts, it is usual with those who practise them to form in their minds some plan of the work intended, before they begin to execute; and to contemplate in imagination‡ the effect which will be produced by the particular mode of proceeding they mean to adopt. It were to be wished that all men would thus deliberate on concerns of a moral nature; and that before they begin any single act, more particularly before they enter on a course of actions, they would seriously ask themselves in what it must terminate.

The season indeed for making this inquiry, is not the hour in which the passions are imperious. With such violence do they agitate the mind, that they impel it to overlook all consequences, and by any means to accomplish the object of its wishes, regardless of what may thence ensue. Intervals of calm and sober repose are the proper periods for meditation: in them we may recollect, from example and precept; what different ends most usually follow either a right or wrong line of conduct, and we may previously fix in our hearts some determined resolutions, which may be helpful to us when we come to struggle with temptations.

And herein the great advantage of the Sabbath, and the utility of discourses framed for instruction, obviously appear. By affording rest from worldly employments, the Sabbath gives leisure for self-examination; for reflecting at pauses not far distant on our past actions; for comparing our manners with the rules prescribed by the gospel; for marking the particulars in which we have deviated from the laws of morality and religion; and for proposing amendment of what has been done amiss, in the future progress of our lives. And to these means of moral improvement most highly conducive must be discourses, which teach the ignorant to know their duty; which to the well-informed recall truths they had before learned; which awaken all to a sense of right, and animate them to persevere in habits of temperance, justice, and piety, by consideration of that end which awaits us all, the state of future rewards and punishment proportioned to our good or evil actions done in this life present.

Whenever then our mind is undisturbed by passions, and especially on those more solemn days; the ordinances of which are designed and calculated to encourage reflection, we shall do well to strengthen our love of virtue by promising ourselves of the evil consequences which proceed from vice. On the present occasion be this our employment; on which let us now enter.

The first duty of man is to the God that made him. By reason we are led to know there is a God; by gratitude we are bound to thank Him; by love to adore Him; by fear to obey Him; by self-regard, as we value the continuance of divine favour, we are prompted to offer unto him our prayers. And they that on their hearts have thus engrafted a sense of pious and moral obligation towards God, have laid the deepest and firmest foundation† of right conduct on all occasions in which moral good or evil is concerned. But pass from them to others, who live as though there were no God in the world. If they are in the higher or middle rank of society, they indulge, without regard to conscience or even decency, the inclinations which lead them to some favourite vices. Insensible alike to the infamy which they stamp on their own character, and to the injury done, perhaps irreparably, to those who are corrupted by them, they ruin innocence in other families; and into their own houses by bad example introduce immoral practices, the effects of which are calamitous to their children or domestics. Thus instead of laying a foundation for esteem and happiness to their posterity and dependents, by directing them in the ways of prudence and piety, they entail the discredit and miseries which arise from debauched courses. In this manner act many of those, who being in affluent or competent circumstances presume to erect themselves as superior to the duties and restraints of religion.

If in a lower condition of life we look

* Many of the arguments used by Socrates, partly with Aristodemus, and partly with Euthydemus, on these important subjects, deserve the serious attention of the learned reader. The discoveries even of natural religion are such in many respects, as to leave men of no religion absolutely without excuse.

Xenophon's Memorabilia, l. i. c. 4. and l. iv. c. 3.

† Striking is the reflection, with which Xenophon concludes the account given of the dialogue holden by Socrates with Aristodemus, on the existence and providence of the Gods.

"In my opinion, conversation of this kind influenced those, who had intercourse with him, to avoid actions impious, unjust, and base, not only when they were in the sight of men, but even when they were alone: for they would be persuaded, that not a single thing they did could escape the notice of the Gods."

Xen. Mem. l. i. c. iv. 19.

among persons, who habituate themselves to neglect religious ordinances, we shall find they have commonly all the vices of the more wealthy, without adequate means by which to gratify their depraved inclinations. Idleness leads them to drunkenness and profligacy; drunkenness and profligacy bring them to want; want urges them to dishonesty; and dishonesty is punished by a premature and ignominious death. Such then being the fruits of irreligion in every station of life, it becomes those who would consult their own greater happiness, and who wish either to procure the regard or promote the benefit of society, to cultivate a disposition for rational piety, and declare to the world their faith in God, by assembling themselves in a public manner for the purpose of divine worship.

Next to God, parents claim our duties;* and among these duties, obedience is not the least. The discharge of filial obedience has seldom caused repentance; but the neglect of it has frequently been productive of sorrow. The years of youth must necessarily be years of ignorance and inexperience: maxims of discretion cannot yet have been collected, and knowledge of life cannot yet have been learned.† In these, however, as in other respects, whatever is defective in their sons and daughters, parents are able and anxious to supply: and happy are they who avail themselves of such faithful and affectionate guides. But often there predominate in young minds an impatience of control, a contempt of advice, a perverseness of will, which hurries them into the very follies they are cautioned to avoid. Mark, however, the end of petulance, presumption, and obstinacy. To fill that station, for which the parent has long endeavoured to prepare him, as the son neither applies his attention, nor conforms his inclination, so he acquires no ability. Those means of support and improvement, to furnish which perhaps the parent hath often denied himself many innocent pleasures and desirable comforts, are thrown away on pursuits either of senseless extravagance or of wanton profligacy. And when that period arrives, in which the man is to take his part in the active duties of social life, he becomes contemptible, because he has neither knowledge, nor industry, nor prudence to recommend him. Such is the usual fruit of disobedience to parents.

The divine precept, which in express terms commands obedience to parents, does also by implication enjoin that similar duty be paid towards persons, who by the protection they afford us, and the authority they bear over us, stand in the place of parents: such as magistrates, who are our civil parents. Religion and law are in their nature inseparably united. Their principles are the same, their object is the same; they mutually co-operate to make men good, that they may thence make them happy; and thus both show their origin to be from God, the fountain of all goodness and happiness. Therefore, generally speaking, the best and most judicious of men are the firmest supporters of religion and law; and none but bad or mistaken persons will encourage disobedience to the dictates of either. The civil magistrate is the representative and minister of law. His province is to secure the peaceable enjoyment of the most invaluable blessings to every member of society. So long then as he confines himself within the limits of that power, with which the community has entrusted him, disobedience to the civil magistrate is an offence against public good, which deserves and receives condign punishment inflicted by vindictive justice. And as the safety of every person is more or less endangered by the outrages which are committed in defiance of the magistrate, who is the interpreter and enforcer of the law; so in duty to himself and society at large, every person is bound to exert himself in bringing to justice the violators of law, and the disobedient to lawful governors. Observe then, as every individual is by so many spectators, who are all deeply interested to restrain illegal conduct, let no man presume to disobey the magistrate, in hopes of impunity.

Cic. de Sen. t. vi.

‡ Monitoribus asper. Hor.

From parents and magistrates, our duties extend to the whole compass of social life; differing in kind, according to the relations we bear to the several members, with whom we are connected. But there is one rule of universal application: it is, that we injure no one, neither in his own person, nor in the person of her who should be dearest to him; and is most closely united with him; nor in his property; nor in his character: and in proportion as this general law is violated by us, we are in danger of bringing on ourselves consequences more or less serious and fatal.

Into extremes of wickedness few are seen to plunge themselves at once: there is usually a progression from small beginnings to the last act of depravity. These beginnings originate from improper indulgence given to our passions at an early period of our age. Let us then briefly examine this source of misconduct; trace the degrees by which the heart proceeds from slight to gross offences; and when we have viewed the enormity to which trivial faults may ultimately lead, let even trivial faults be avoided by us to the utmost of our power.

With a view to our preservation there is implanted in us a disposition to resent injuries: and as the love of life is strong in our nature, this tendency to resentment equally prevails. So long as the influence of this propensity confines itself merely to the repelling of what may be hurtful to us, the propensity itself, being directed to the end for which it was intended, has nothing in it blameworthy. But if we suffer ourselves to be irritated on slight occasions, and by causes of provocation rather imaginary than real, then we are culpable in misapplying our passion of anger; and through such misapplication we first inevitably excite uneasiness to ourselves, and then probably create unhappiness to the objects of our displeasure: and long continued habits of indulging resentment without control have often terminated in a crime of the deepest dye, even in murder itself. If then we are either proud or selfish, or hasty in our disposition, let us begin early to learn, and never cease to practise with vigilance over ourselves, that most necessary, but most difficult art, the art of governing our temper. If this be not acquired and exercised, we shall continually be in danger either of exposing ourselves to ridicule by acting absurdly, or of losing esteem by speaking rudely, or of incurring contempt by offering violence; it may too happen, in a fatal and unguarded moment of intemperate fury, that we may perpetrate a deed, the penalty of which must be publicly and ignominious death.

There are passions, in the restraint of which our chastity is concerned; and not our chastity only, but with it also are connected our health, our abilities, our fortune, our character: The impure sins of darkness have a natural tendency to debilitate the body, to enfeeble the mind, to slacken industry, to banish attention in the prudent management of temporal affairs; and to create indifference for the esteem of society. When appetite hath once gotten the mastery over reason, its cravings are insatiable, and will be gratified at the expense of constitution, talents, possessions, fame, honour, religion. Be therefore the first and earliest powers of our reason exerted in resisting temptations which would lead to impurities; and be it the subject of our daily prayer, that God by his grace would enable us to avoid committing those sins, the fruits of which are ruinous; and the wages destructive.

If it were possible to realise the visionary plan of making all property equal, there could not happen to human society a greater misfortune than the adopting of such a measure. For if to property, and the objects connected with it, were prescribed a limit which might not be exceeded, that ardour with which in the present state of competition and inequality either professional or commercial arts are pursued, would be extinguished in those who are now industrious; and as for persons already disposed to idleness, if they were exempted from the necessity of working for their subsistence, in want of better employment, (since employment of some kind man will find to amuse himself), they would have recourse to the most vicious practices; whence the grossest corruption of manners and principles would soon become general. Such depravity would create universal confusion, and thence must result the dire calamities of civil discord. On the other hand, let there be holden out encouragement to the increasing of property by fair and honest means, there will then be promoted ingenuity in discovering arts and application in learning them; activity in acquiring wealth, and frugality in expending it; temperance, the effect of frugality; subordination arising from the arrangement of different persons into different classes, and from the distribution and gradation of labour in each class; law that will regulate our dealings one with another; and religion that will enforce the dictates of law by the most solemn sanctions. Such are the blessings derived from the free power of augmenting property. But in vain were this power either given or exercised, if property, when acquired, were not secure: for in that case, all the evils of equalisation would ensue, with the additional grievance that the honest and industrious would be spoiled and plundered by the villainous and dissipated. In wisdom therefore, and with the truest sense of regard for the real interests of every individual in social life, divine and human laws unite in securing property, by deeming it sacred, and by annexing penalties of the severest nature to violations of the amendment which proclaims "Thou shalt not steal." The principal on which these penalties are inflicted, is not regard to the intrinsic value of the property stolen, but it is consideration of the horrid train of enormities which would be introduced, if thefts were allowed to pass with impunity. To prevent such enormities, the strongest check is laid on that which is the source of many other crimes, the sin of stealing.

Although extremities of punishment and infamy await only deeds notoriously iniquitous, yet to every act of fraudulent design is affixed disgrace, because such act is contrary to justice, because it tends to destroy mutual confidence, and because, if suffered to proceed without public disapprobation, it might subvert that foundation of civilised society, security of property. He therefore that wishes to be esteemed as a man of upright integrity, must not only abhor such acts of injustice as will call for the vengeance of criminal law, but he must detest the little arts of deceiving, the cunning tricks of over-reaching, the subtle contrivances of secret thieving. From deceiving, over-reaching, and thieving begins the career of improbity; and though persons who are guilty of these offences, may not, perhaps, venture quite so far as the utmost transgression of justice, yet it seldom happens but that sooner or later they are detected in some transaction, the baseness of which renders them contemptible.

Whatever may be their situations, yet most persons are affected by loss of character*. Some are injured in their business; some are bereft of peace in their minds; some are even deprived of life by the virulence of calumny. The "bearing of false witness" therefore, when it hurts any one in his employment is indirect robbery: when it causes vexation, it is malicious cruelty: when it shortens existence, it is absolute murder. And indeed, although the crime of vilifying another not unfrequently arises from wanton levity, which thinks it witty to sport with reputation, yet the sin of bearing false witness very often proceeds from direct intention to do injury, and is often committed for the purpose of gratifying either desire, or envy, or revenge: from which source whenever it springs, it hath in one case all the guilt of adultery, in another of stealing, in another of assassination. On no pretence should encouragement be given to evil speaking. He that loves to indulge his petulance or vanity by traducing character, should be shunned* as a man that would disturb society: and he that with base design brings a false accusation against the innocent, deserves that punishment, which, if the guilt were proved, the accused person would have undergone.†

Experience proves, that although the greater part of mankind do not proceed to extremities of sin, yet all are disposed to one or other of those vices, which, if pursued, would lead to such extremities. Now as no man, who addict himself to a favourite vice, can prescribe to himself bounds which he is assured he shall not be tempted to transgress, so it will be prudent in those, who foreknow the wretchedness they should endure if they should be carried on to sins of the highest enormity, to secure their happiness by resisting vices of inferior guilt, the tendency of which is ultimately towards destruction. This will be avoiding the very entrance on a wrong course. But what is the practice of the inconsiderate? The natural propensity they have to vice they increase by intemperance, and stimulate by drunkenness. He that through drunkenness hath lost his reason, is prepared for the committing of every sin, to which either his own prevailing inclination may direct, or the seducing words of debauched companions may entice him. The evils indeed of excess in drinking are so many and so serious, that to caution the unthinking against contracting habits of indulgence in this vice, will be much to our present purpose. And this cannot be done more effectually, than by shewing the progress of the vice itself, and the gradation from inconveniences to losses, and from losses to miseries, by which it works the ruin of its votaries.

When the fervour of youth is so far abated, that weariness of application either in mind or body cannot be relieved by simple sustenance, recourse to means of support, more nutritive is confessedly innocent. And no reasonable person will deny, that in proper places, and on suitable occasions, the rules of strict temperance may be enlarged, and something more than what absolute necessity requires, may be granted to social festivity. Thus far all is well: let us only be moderate, and there is nothing hitherto culpable: in either of these cases, we do but use our liberty to that purpose which reason allows, and which religion does not forbid. But this liberty, like many other powers, when entrusted to the inexperienced and thoughtless, becomes to them an occasion of much mischief, through the misapplication with which it is perverted. Does nature require additional nourishment? That, which prudently applied would have been salutary, by imprudent excess they make injurious to their health. Are seasons of relaxation allowable? The enlivening conversation of festive hilarity is succeeded either by the ridiculous incoherence, or noisy clamour, or humiliating insensibility of drunkenness. Proceeding thus, perhaps for some few years, they at length anticipate the wants of nature, and neglecting at frequent intervals their necessary occupation, they mispend hours and days in drowning their intellect, and in reducing themselves either to the stupidity of idiots, or the phrenzy of madmen. Thus grows the habit. And now for its consequences.

If the person, addicted to excessive drinking be designed for a learned profession, the vice he is pursuing will assuredly tend to disqualify him for intellectual attainments. For through the physical operations of repeated drunkenness, the finest mental abilities, whether strong sense, or retentive memory, or quick imagination, will gradually be impaired: and it is too often seen, that many, who when young were admired for their uncommon capacity, have at an early stage of manhood, been lamented by those who loved, and insulted by those who envied them, as men who had bestowed the brightest talents, had become burthensome to themselves, disgraceful to their society, and contemptible to the world; and this sacrifice of all their nobler faculties they had made to the miserable gratifications of a low vice!

In the line of commerce or agriculture, if he, who by his situation should be the chief director, habituates himself to drunkenness, either his ingenuity in planning becomes gradually dull, or his calculations of loss and gain are irregular; till at length he finds himself sunk into disrepute, and fallen into decayed circumstances. Degraded and distressed, he has then only to lament ~~the~~ past folly with unavailing sorrow, a sorrow that can restore him neither his forfeited credit nor his squandered opulence.

If drunkenness be the vice of one in humble condition, it soon reduces him to want and wretchedness. For as the drunkard hath neither industry to undertake, nor capacity to execute any work assigned him, he is discarded by those who in exchange for his labour would have given him subsistence; and then for his daily food he has no other means of supply than either the precarious earnings of disgraceful beggary, or the more infamous wages of dishonest theft.

Such are some of the inconveniences, losses and miseries by which drunkenness ruins those who are addicted to it, in matters merely of worldly concern. But added to these calamities, are other evils of a momentous nature. That body which God hath given him, endued with health, strength, and other powers fitted for the purposes of active life, the drunkard, by his intemperance, makes disfigured and decrepit at that period of his age when, had he lived in sobriety, he had been firm and robust. That soul which God hath imparted to him, furnished with marvellous faculties and intended for improvement in spiritual perfection, by his habitual excess he hath either stupified,* or rendered the seat of impurity and depravity.

But after some few years (for the whole term of man's life extends but to few years) it cometh the end of all their actions to the drunkard, to the bearer of false witness, to the stealer, to the adulterer, to him that disobeyeth his parents, to the despiser of religion, and blasphemer against God. To this end should our view be directed. For surely as there is a God and a future state, the issue will not be the same to him that hath rightly employed, and to him that hath misused his talents; to him that hath endeavoured to lead a virtuous life, and to him that hath persisted in a course of wickedness. Even in this state of existence, the fruits of virtue and vice are, generally speaking, different as to mental satisfaction; but however with respect to this or other circumstances our actions may terminate here, yet this is not the only state for which man was designed. There will be another state; in which it is both reasonable to conclude, and scriptural to affirm, that those who have done good will be happy, and those who have done evil will be miserable. If this final result of our present conduct were duly remembered, we should have the strongest inducement most cautiously and conscientiously to avoid not only actual sin, but even whatever in its remote consequences may lead to sin.

Causes which make Men dislike Truth.

GAL. iv. 16.

Am I therefore become your enemy, because I tell you the truth?

AMONG other ill effects of inordinate propensity and vicious inclination, there is this most unhappy and prejudicial consequence; at the very time in which we have the greatest need of salutary admonition, we are least disposed either to seek or adopt it. When we have thrown off the restraints of reason and religion, and yielded ourselves to the dominion of passion and appetite, our will becomes averse from every thing that has the appearance of contradiction to its desires, and our understanding no longer retains the same solicity and clearness of distinction in discerning the difference of right and wrong, of good and evil, with which it before discovered the true line of moral rectitude.

Are we too much influenced by the selfish passions? Whether our excessive attention to private interest betray us into insatiable covetousness or unbounded ambition, the disapprobation of advice will in either case be equally strong. Any suggestions, designing to correct the fraudulent arts or mean practices of covetousness, would be imputed either to an affectation of tender conscience, or to a prodigal disregard of pecuniary advantage: and any cautions, tending to retard the progress of immoderate ambition, would be ascribed to rigid austerity and shallow knowledge of the world.

Do the vindictive passions predominate? Anger impels the mind to some act of violence, with a degree of impetuosity that overlooks all intermediate considerations, and forces it with precipitation to exhaust its fury on the object of its resentment. Revenge works with more slow, but more malignant determination: it cherishes the wound that rankles in the bosom; aggravates the causes of suspicion and hatred; broods over dark and insidious thoughts; occupies itself with conceiving means of destruction to the persons offending; and desists not from its horrid purpose, till its desire of retaliating be fully gratified. Thus anger is more hasty, and revenge more sullen than to obey dictates, which would teach self-government; and he that would wish to promote reconciliation, would but incur displeasure, and be deemed impertinent.

Are we deluded by the deceitfulness

of greater sin? This involves the mind in a degree of darkness, which cannot admit the light of truth. If the fairest paintings have no beauty for the blind, nor the sweetest harmony have charms for the deaf, so neither can moral and religious truths have any persuasive influence on him who has been long accustomed to hear, see, imagine, and practice nothing but what is vicious. His passions are so inflamed by corrupt gratification, that they totally exclude the cooler judgment of reason: his appetites so incessantly demand immoderate indulgence, that they leave him no space for reflection, no opportunity for the exercise of sober thought, no leisure for listening to the voice of conscience: should words of moral and religious concern chance to strike his ear, yet from being long habituated to view all things, not immediately conducive to sensual pleasure, through the false representation of perverted judgment, he will not approve, he cannot understand the simple language of unaffected and dispassionate advice.

There is moreover a hardness of heart, which is gradually increased by repeated acts of grosser sin. In the beginnings of vice, the pangs of conscience will frequently and forcibly agitate the offender: but as in the body the external limbs become less delicate when inured to hardship, so in the soul, the internal senses become less susceptible of remorse, when addicted to continual violation of sobriety and purity. In natural and moral cases, the effect of habit is the same: conscience by degrees will grow obdurate, till at length the offender be given up to a mind so void of feeling,* as to be morally dead in sin.

As such are the effects arising from an undue prevalence of the selfish or vindictive passions, and from the deceitfulness of grosser sin, we may conclude, that from one or other of these causes, it generally proceeds; that although the truth be spoken with the purest intentions, and for the very best and most important services, yet it is frequently either received with indifference, or rejected with displeasure; and those who deliver it, are hated as enemies, and hence become objects marked out for vengeance. And upon examination of facts recorded in history, we shall actually find that men, wise and exemplarily, inspired prophets, holy apostles, and even our divine Lord himself, were treated with insult and afflicted by persecution, because they admonished persons notoriously corrupted and enslaved by one or other of those inordinate propensities and vicious appetites.

It shall now be our employment to confirm this assertion, by selecting some instances from sacred history; on which, whilst we expatiate, perhaps we may not only prove that the covetous, the ambitious, the resentful, the grossly sensual, are enemies to truth, but we may also suggest some remarks which will lead to improvement.

The cities of the plain exhibit man in the most abandoned state of abominable depravity. 'To Lot, who with deep abhorrence condemned their vile practices, the inhabitants exclaimed, "this one fellow came in to sojourn, and he will needs be a judge."* Censure, to minds thus immersed in the foulest sins, could not be heard without extreme indignation. Blindness and destruction ensued from their wickedness, and to this moment their name is stamped with the blackest characters of indelible infamy.

The confinement of Joseph, whence was it occasioned? Like a man of integrity, he refused to insult his master's honour; like a man of piety, he feared to violate the laws of God. "How (says he) can I do this great wickedness, and sin against God?"† A rebuke thus serious, from one of rank inferior, provoked the tempter to malicious revenge. The consequence of his sanctity was a false charge, which doubtless his accuser hoped would procure his death. Imprisonment is adjudged; and thence began the prosperity of Joseph. Thus, what human iniquity had designed to be a punishment, the goodness of God converted into a blessing; an example this, which enforces and illustrates that most admirable, salutary and comprehensive precept, "keep innocency, and take heed unto the thing that is right; for that shall bring a man peace at the last."‡

When he, that was afterwards the leader of the Israelites, began to inquire into the condition of the people, with whom by descent he was connected, he beheld "two men of the Hebrews striving with each other."§ Oppressed as they were, by servitude and cruelty, they should have been prompted, by every consideration of mutual interest and general concern, to have cultivated peace and strengthened attachment amongst themselves. When through violent anger, a disposition to unanimity had been interrupted, it was an act of benevolence to admonish the contending parties of their imprudence, in aggravating by private dissension the miseries already inflicted on them in their state of bondage. Hoping to reconcile the Hebrews that were at variance, Moses said to him that did the wrong, "wherefore smitest thou thy brother?"|| Why dost thou offer violence to one of thy own nation and kindred? He who is the aggressor in any deed of injustice, is commonly less placable than he who suffers: he usually persists in hatred to the person injured, and resents any interposition which would allay his animosity. Such was the conduct of the culpable Hebrew, In return for the kindness designed by his admonisher, he replies, "Who made thee a prince and a judge over us; intendest thou to kill me, as thou killedst the Egyptian?"§ He was not content with a retort of scorn and insolence, but ungratefully meant to reproach the friend of his countrymen, for having avenged an insulted Hebrew, at the peril of his own life. So incapable of discerning the good purpose, for which those who regard us give their advice, and so unthankful for the exertions made by them in our behalf, are we rendered by anger.

"Flee to thy place,"|| exclaims Balak to Balaam, smiting his hands with wrath and vexation. And yet what was the offence, by which Balaam had incurred this displeasure? His inclination was corrupt enough for the executing of any purpose enjoined him: but there was a superior power of conscience and a divine prohibition, which forbade his devoting the Israelites to destruction. Workers of iniquity require instruments prepared for all, even the most desperate practices: those who are yet influenced by conscience and religion, are not fit servants for men, who, through means the most opposite to moral sense and to reverence for God, would sacrifice all regard for human and divine commands, in order to obtain the object of their wishes. Balaam had in one respect violated his conscience by going to Balak: but he was not so determined to oppose all restraints of duty, as to attempt execrating the Israelites in defiance of God! So far at least he deserves commendation, as he would not proceed to extreme evil for the wages of corruption. But Balak conceived a man who would thus speak the truth, an enemy to his interest; he therefore withholds from Balaam all the honours intended as a reward for unrighteous services, and dismisses him with resentment.

The Levitical law had forbidden the Israelites so to alienate their land, as to sell it past recovery. Ahab wished to purchase the vineyard of Naboth, but the possessor refused to part with the "inheritance of his fathers."* He feared to disobey the ordinance of God, however he might have been recompensed for such transgression. What Ahab could not acquire by purchase, he gained by the most oppressive iniquity. Witnesses were suborned to charge Naboth with blasphemy, and through their perjury, the innocent man was condemned and stoned to death. No objection now remained in the way of Ahab; he took possession of the vineyard, since Naboth was no more. † Elijah, the prophet, was sent to reprove Ahab; the guilty violator of justice no sooner beheld this pious man advancing, than he exclaimed, "Hast thou found me, O mine enemy?" ‡ Thus quickly does conscience take the alarm, confront the perpetrator of an atrocious action, and dread the presence of one who will reprove it. † Elijah did but execute the duties of his office in rebuking the impieties of Ahab; but that alone was sufficient cause for making him odious to a man wicked and iniquitous as Ahab was.

A continuance of God's favour, and the consequence of it, national prosperity, were promised to the Jews on the express condition that they should obey the divine commands in all respects, but more particularly in rejecting idolatry. Such, however, was their propensity to adopt the superstitions of the people, whom they had conquered, that the temple of God was sometimes polluted by the introduction of idols. Against a sin thus repugnant to their own law, and in itself thus insulting to the majesty of the Supreme Being, the prophets ceased not to warn their countrymen. But what return did they experience for their zeal in the cause of God, and for their anxiety to avert destruction from their cities? "They were stoned, they were sawn asunder, they were tempted, they were slain with the sword, they wandered about in sheep-skins and goat-skins, being destitute, afflicted, tormented; they wandered in deserts and in mountains, and in dens and caves of the earth."* Thus does St. Paul describe the sufferings of those who in succession were raised up to admonish the Jews; and thus does he confirm the solemn confession in which the Levites bewail before God, "our fathers were disobedient, and rebelled against thee, and cast thy law behind their backs, and slew thy prophets, which testified against them to turn them to thee." †

When the Jews were restored from their captivity in Babylon, they did, indeed, desist from idolatry, but in other instances they continued equally obstinate against advice, and equally ungrateful to those who spake the truth, as their fathers had been. In proof of this, let their conduct towards our Divine Lord be considered.

At the time in which our Saviour dwelt on earth, the Pharisees were the leading persons among the Jews. They were characterised by their pretensions to superior strictness in the observing of ritual ordinances. But with all their pretensions, as they were notoriously covetous and spiritually proud; as they perverted the law of God by traditions favourable to their own rapacity and arrogance; as their worship was more ostentatious and affected, than real and sincere; they were neither moral nor religious in the manner required by the law and the prophets. It was indeed incumbent on them to discharge punctually the ceremonial parts of the Mosaic institution; but the same institution demanded of them much more than this outward service. The whole heart purified from vice, and the soul humbly devoted to the love and fear of God, are in their sacred writings continually pointed out as the most acceptable sacrifices which could be offered to the Almighty. But from reformation of morals, and from principles of vital piety, as the Pharisees had deviated themselves, so also they misled the people; teaching them to rest satisfied with external forms, but inculcating nothing of inward goodness. It therefore became him, whose gracious purpose was the redemption of mankind from the practice and guilt of sin, to reprove the vices of those who, by their authority and example, had corrupted moral virtue; and who, whilst they burdened religious worship with numerous observances, had excluded that simple and rational service of a devout mind which should always accompany forms, and without which, all forms are but shew and hypocrisy. But this work of reformation was the chief cause which offended the Pharisees. Christ was a light that shone amidst darkness, "but the darkness comprehended it not;" i. e. did not admit, did not receive it in its full influence. Sin had blinded the eyes of their mind, that they could not discern "the beauty of holiness," nor admire the excellency of gospel precepts: "they loved darkness rather than light, because their deeds were evil."* That their faults should be exposed, their opinions contradicted, their errors corrected, their authority diminished, were occasions of resentment never to be forgiven, till vengeance could be satiated by the death of him whose life and doctrine repatched their iniquity. Enslaved as they were by the influence of malign passions, they had not moral liberty to extend their minds in judging of our Lord's claim to divine mission from the works he wrought: nor could they be disposed to acknowledge him, whom they hated and persecuted, as the Messiah that was promised by their Scriptures, and whose coming was foreseen and most assuredly believed by Abraham the founder of the Jewish nation. When therefore Jesus tells them that "God was his Father,"† that "they had not the love of God in them,"‡ that "if they believed in Moses, they would have believed in him & also," the Jews "sought to kill him."§ They were meditating how to execute their unjust purpose, when Jesus again asserts his divine origin, ¶ enforces the necessity of believing on him for the obtaining of salvation, asserts that those only are truly free, who, through faith in him, emancipate themselves from the dominion of corrupt appetites; and assurcth the Jews, that as they persisted in sin they were the servants of sin, †† however they might conceive themselves free in descent from Abraham their progenitor. These declarations were founded in truth; and on that very account exasperated minds incapable of embracing or loving truth. Our Lord, "who knew what was in man,"‡‡ and who on all occasions "perceived the wickedness"§§ of his persecutors, tells them plainly the ground of their determined malice: "Ye seek to kill me, a man that hath told you the truth."|| "Because I tell you the truth, ye believe me not."¶¶ Which of you convinceth me of sin? and if I say the truth, why do ye not believe me?"

This obstinacy of the Jews, in resisting all the means of grace vouchsafed to them by God through his prophets and divine Son, at length terminated in such a dispersion of their people, as was never known in the records of history; and to this day they are living witnesses attesting the truth of our Lord's predictions, and teaching the world that rejecting the Gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ, through vicious principles, depraved habits, and concerted prejudices, can be no trivial offence in the sight of that God, who can will nothing but in the most perfect wisdom, and for the most beneficent end, and who therefore could not have sent into the world his eternal Son as a divine instructor and powerful redeemer, but for purposes most important in themselves, and salutary in their consequences. But as God hath sent so exalted a person, and through him has claimed our attention, if there be any reverence due to the commands of God, it is due to the Gospel containing those commands; and all disregard of the Gospel, when clearly revealed, must appear sinful as being a dishonour to God.

The disciples of our Lord were taught by him to expect, that in the work of their ministry they should experience the most severe affliction. "If," says he, "they have persecuted me, they will also persecute you."* "They shall lay their hands on you, and persecute you, delivering you up to the synagogues, and into prisons, being brought before kings and rulers for my name's sake,"† "Ye shall be betrayed both by parents, and brethren, and kinsfolk, and friends; and some of you shall they cause to be put to death,"‡ "Yea the time cometh, that whosoever killeth you, will think that he doth God service."§ These predictions of our Lord were literally accomplished in the personal sufferings endured by his disciples. St. Peter and St. John being brought before the Jewish council, were condemned first to imprisonment, and then to stripes. || St. James, by the

the command of Herod, was killed with the sword.¶ St. Stephen, by the furious zealots, was cast out of the city and stoned.⋈ St. Paul, thus, describes the evils he had sustained. ¶ Of the Jews five times received I forty stripes, save one; thrice was I beaten with rods, once was I stoned.⋉ And whence all this came to the Apostles? They had given to the Jews no other offence, than that they had faithfully executed the important commission which their Lord had entrusted to them, by endeavouring to convince both Jews and Gentiles that Jesus was the Christ the Son of God; that salvation was to be obtained not by ritual observances, but by repentance for sins past, and faith in Christ; and that it behoved all persons to abandon their former wickedness, and thenceforth discharge conscientiously the several duties incumbent on them, the duties of temperance in themselves, of integrity towards their fellow-creatures, of sanctity towards God; since by his own resurrection Christ had demonstrated, that from their graves he would raise up, all that are dead, and that then shall follow a retribution of happiness or misery, dispensed to every one according to the good or bad use which he may have made of the moral powers, spiritual advantages, and heavenly graces bestowed on him by God in this life. These were truths, not acceptable to the Jews; nay more, not acceptable to many through the world; at large either in former or present days. Those who love the worst part, that is, the sins of the world, its irregular affections, its vicious habits, its sensual pleasures, its inordinate desires, its corrupt practices, its gross iniquities, are not much disposed to admire or adopt the precepts either of moral virtue or Christian religion. We have seen in sacred history, we see it daily before our eyes, that in proportion as the heart is inclined to vice, it becomes less desirous of knowing, and less fit for admitting the dictates of reason, and the doctrines of revelation. But no one in his sober senses and sound intellect can pretend to justify the following of his vicious propensities and excluding of serious thought; the very attempt to defend such proceeding would be contradictory to the higher faculties with which he is endowed by heaven. Conscience and reason bid us resist evil tendencies, and urge us to regard the admonitions of those whom experience has enabled, and situation authorised, to speak the truth and give wholesome counsel. If in these their suggestions, conscience, and reason direct us properly, as unquestionably they do, then all insinuations that would confirm the mind in habits of excess, and entirely divert it from seasonable reflection, are to be considered as illusive fallacies repugnant to right thinking, and founded on the misrepresentation of passions and appetites not duly controlled. But if loose indulgence of passions and appetites be the chief obstacle which impedes the force of reason and conscience, then, as moral agents and rational beings, we are bound to keep our passions and appetites in their just balance, and under proper restraint. When we have effected this arduous task, we shall have conscience and reason assisting our minds, and making them open to the conviction* of truth; truth itself we shall no longer dislike; we shall neither lay aside with neglect the word of exhortation written in past ages; nor shall we turn away with aversion from the advice of those, who in the line of their duty, in becoming terms, and on suitable occasions, deliver candidly and impartially what the nature of the case may require either in moral or religious concerns. No one is so wise as never to need counsel: nor so constantly attentive to what is strictly right, as never to require that he should be reminded of it. The most prudent are subject to indiscretions; the most regular fall into inadvertencies. But from such frailties we are soon recovered if the heart be incorrupt: our hearts therefore, let us guard with all diligence, supplicating the Almighty, that "by his holy inspiration we may think those things that be good, and by his merciful guiding may perform the same."

False Philosophy considered.

COL. II. 8.

Beware lest any Man spoil you through Philosophy.

ON men of ingenuous, but inexperienced minds, there is nothing so imposing as a specious name. To such persons, under the disguise of an assumed appellation, vices recommend themselves with so much success, as to deceive the unwary into a confident opinion* that their conduct is proper, although to judicious observers it appears palpably wrong. And this delusion continues to beguile them, till some unhappy consequence begins to create in them suspicions of error, and at length convinces them that they have been too long mistaken. In private life; some are brought into great distress, from having acted under an idea that inattention to pecuniary concerns was a mark of generosity. Others fall into vicious practices, because easy compliance with every proposal of a companion appears to them a proof of good temper. Others commit irregularities, through a persuasion that to despise the uniformity of rules is an indication of high spirit: Others violate the decencies of politeness, conceiving disregard to forms a sign of superior ability. Then again in public life; many do in reality serve the cause of licentiousness, whilst with the purest intentions they mean only to extend liberty: and many give encouragement to indifference for all religion, whilst they imagine themselves to be promoting only liberality of sentiment. Now in the one case, admirable are generosity, good temper, high spirit, and superior ability; but surely no man in his right senses can say it is admirable, either to bring on himself indigence through imprudent neglect of his property; or to become depraved through weakness in yielding to solicitations; or to injure society by bad example; or to insult established usages of behaviour by an affected impertinence. So in the other case, liberty is precious as life itself; and liberality in thinking and judging is part of Christian charity, than which nothing is more lovely: but surely no man of mature judgment can wish genuine liberty to be converted into a cloak for every species of enormity; nor liberality of sentiment be made the occasion of propagating direct atheism. Yet in these points of view are to be seen many measures, which upright but misguided men frequently pursue, merely because they do not fully apprehend the tendencies of their actions.

Persons, therefore, who want experience, should be extremely cautious how they depart from those principles, which have been received generally, because founded on solid reason; and how they deviate from those customs which have obtained long, because in their effect they have proved good. Thus circumspect should all persons be, who cannot yet have acquired much practical knowledge of the world; lest instead of becoming, what they anxiously wish to become, more beneficial to mankind than those who have preceded them, they should actually, though inadvertently, be instrumental towards occasioning some of the worst evils that can befall human society.

The present generation hath been injured by nothing, so much as by the imposing name of philosophy. Philosophy, when it is employed in promoting good morals, in cultivating liberal arts, in strengthening social union, in contemplating the works of creation, and thus leading man to acknowledge and adore the Supreme Being, is a noble science: it is noble because true; and true, because consistent and corresponding with the nature of man, and with the relations he bears to his fellow-creatures and to his Maker! But that which assumes the name of philosophy, and under this mask debauches morals, dissuades from mental improvement, disunites society, discerns not the wisdom of God either in the earth or the heavens, and discourages men from paying the tribute of gratitude to their universal Father; such a system of doctrines is detestable, because false; and false, because contrary to the nature of man, and his several relations to society and God. Real philosophy we should cherish and love: it is the friend of man, being the source of wisdom, the origin of many comforts, and the handmaid of religion. That, which comes under its borrowed name; which puts on a semblance of what in fact it is not; and which if we are compelled to call philosophy, we must, if we would speak properly, term false philosophy; that is the evil against which we are to guard: and that the credulous and innocent may not be betrayed by the deceits, the forgeries, and enchantments of this visored impostor*, let us now enumerate some leading points in which this philosophy is false.

1. It is false, in asserting that man in society retains all his natural rights. In exchange for the more certain subsistence, the more secure protection, the greater degree of assistance in times of sickness, or need, or casualty; in exchange for the delights of friendly intercourse, and the improvements of civilization; in exchange for these blessings which man enjoys in society; he relinquishes the savage liberty of roaming at large for prey, of exercising horrid vengeance on the person who has offended him, and of following without controul his ferocious and brutal passions, to the annoyance, disgrace, and destruction of his species.

2. It is false, in maintaining that all men are equal. In every point of view

* Hence with thy brew'd enchantments, foul deceiver;
Hast thou betray'd my credulous innocence
With visor'd falsehood, and base forgery?
MILTON'S COMUS, 696.

there is among men remarkable and unavoidable inequality. For neither have all men the same stature, nor the same agility, nor the same strength, nor the same sagacity; which are qualities chiefly valued by the barbarian; nor have all the same genius, nor the same industry, nor the same prudence; which are endowments excellent in civil society. From the disparity with which these bodily and mental faculties are distributed, through the natural operation of cause and effect men necessarily fall into inequality of condition, independently of all political distinctions. If moreover we consider man as intended for civil society, by such constitution of his nature he is designed for a state of inequality. For the very existence of society to any great extent, depends on order. But order requires that some should direct, and others be directed; which implies the subordination of inferiors to superiors.

3. It is false, in its presumptive and arrogant opinion that man is perfect. Whence originate the various enormities that disgrace human nature, and whence the necessity for establishing any laws to restrain vicious propensities, if man be perfect? The history of every society which has been known to institute such laws, is in direct contradiction to all ideas of human perfection, and too evidently demonstrates that man is imperfect. For all laws would be unnecessary if men were perfect; the necessity for them arises from our imperfection. Will it be said, that laws are the source of human depravity? That some laws may tend to corrupt man, will readily be allowed: but that all laws have such an effect, must positively be denied. The laws, for instance, which forbid me to murder, or steal, or commit adultery, or bear false witness, can never lead me to immorality. To affirm then, that because some laws may have a bad influence on morals, therefore all laws do thus operate, is to affirm what is false in fact; and it is moreover to argue from a particular instance to a general conclusion; which is false in reasoning.

Besides, to assert that laws, abstractedly and universally considered, are the source of human depravity, is to call that the cause, which in reality is but the effect; it is to speak as though laws had made men, and not men laws. Whereas the contrary is the truth; and if men have made laws against murder, theft, adultery, and other vices, they were compelled to make these provisions, by the experience they derived from observation of the human character, and by conviction that their fellow-creatures had actually committed such crimes.

4. It is false, in expecting that any human institution can be perfect. Can the body be sound, the limbs of which are unsound? or the waters sweet, the fountains of which are bitter? So neither can institutions framed by imperfect men be in all parts perfect. Every work of man must more or less bear signs of that imperfection, which is inseparable from the nature of its author.

5. It is false, in proposing to endanger an entire system, upon the whole beneficial, for the sake of improving a part, objectionable perhaps, but not injurious. Granting there may, and will be imperfections in all human institutions, yet where the good preponderates, the evil is not so to be regarded, as that the former shall be hazarded for the chance of removing the latter. In the body natural, to hurt the vitals in order to heal the extremities, would be an act either of ignorance or of desperation. If in society there exist usages of acknowledged defect when considered abstractedly, but which from being counterbalanced by other circumstances are not prejudicial, and which cannot be changed without very material detriment to society itself; then to sacrifice the welfare of the community at large to considerations of partial advantage, would be repugnant to every principle of common prudence.

6. It is false, in conceiving that because the use of any thing is good, therefore the abuse of it must be also good. Freedom of action is good; but if that freedom be extended to subversion of all laws, in its excess it is not good. Freedom of speech is also good; but if it be carried beyond the bounds of decency, to slander and blasphemy, in its injurious and impious perversion it is not good.

7. It is false, in supposing that the operation of the same principle should always proceed in the same direction. That man should enjoy civil and religious liberty is a virtuous principle, which should actuate the mind of every honest and religious person: and the maintenance of this principle will never support either despotism or persecution, because both are inconsistent with it. But neither, on the other hand, will he approve of endeavours, which under the sanction of civil liberty would contend for exemption from lawful authority; or which under the pretence of religious liberty would introduce atheism. For, in his conception, civil liberty is somewhat very different from the rejecting of all legal restraint whatever; and religious liberty somewhat very different from atheism, which has nothing to do with religion. Consistency with his principle, would require him to dissent, not only on the one hand from measures that were arbitrary, but also on the other from such as were licentious; both being equally dangerous to real liberty. His principle would continue the same; and the application of it would be with the same views; but the direction would vary as the case varies. The expert mariner throws his ballast on that side of the vessel, which wants its due proportion of burthen. The mechanic applies the weight to that side of the scale, where the equipoise is failing. The judicious commander supports that part of the army, which appears the weakest. The object of each, in his respective way, will be the same, and they will all act on the common principle of doing their best, as the nature of the case may happen to demand.

8. It is false, in denying the difference of things. By what means man obtains a general sense of right and wrong; whether from the constitution of his nature, as some conceive, or from education, as others maintain, it is needless to dispute: the fact is, that in civil society every one has that general sense*.

* Who can doubt, whether mankind have been universally persuaded that there is a right and a wrong in human conduct? Some things, which in certain circumstances they ought to

And even the very persons, who are most busy in confounding good and evil, do nevertheless shew, when their interest is concerned, that they clearly discriminate the one from the other. For, the most dishonest will rather trust their persons and property to a man of known integrity, than to one of suspicious character: the reason is, they rely on the virtue of the former, but mistrust the fidelity of the latter. And this persuasion of placing confidence in the just, but of withholding it from the unjust, operates universally throughout mankind, and plainly proves that in the common concerns of life, the difference of right and wrong not only may be distinguished, but actually is discerned; and applied as a direction for proper conduct in the prudent management of temporal affairs.

This power of discriminating between right and wrong, between good and evil, may however be proved by an instance of a kind more generous, than that of regard to self-interest. Whence is it, that on reviewing the lives of men who for ages past have ceased to exist, as their history proceeds, our minds imperceptibly annex to their actions either approbation or censure unpremeditated and spontaneous? We admire the just and humane, like Titus: we abhor the oppressive and cruel, like Domitian. The unerring judgment we thus pass is the effect of a distinguishing principle in man's nature; a principle which, however dormant or perverted it may be in a savage people, hath nevertheless been always prompt in perceiving and right in deciding, amongst men living in that state, where alone the human faculties and qualities can be seen in perfection, the state of civilization.

But if we have within us a principle thus capable of discriminating between do, and other things which they ought not to do? The universality of these opinions, and of many others that might be named, is sufficiently evident, from the whole tenour of men's conduct, as far as our acquaintance reaches; and from the records of history, in all ages and nations, that are transmitted to us.

Dr. Reid on the Intellectual Powers of Man, Essay I. c. ii. p. 44, ed. 1785.

good and evil, and if that principle doth so discriminate, then that there should be some things good and some evil, and that there should be a difference between them, is a necessary consequence.

Another argument to the same purpose arises from considering that indignation*, which persons who in general perhaps are not very solicitous respecting their character, do nevertheless shew when charged with crimes of which they are innocent. And this anger is not the consequence of cool reflection; and therefore cannot be said to be the effect of fear lest punishment should ensue: it is the instantaneous and involuntary impulse of the mind, which is exasperated at the idea of having been thought guilty in a base act, andresents the injustice of a suspicion not merited. Here indeed is a double proof of power to discern right and wrong: for the person thus accused, by his being irritated at a false charge, immediately discovers that he distinguishes moral evil from moral good; and by his feeling pain under an accusation not deserved, he manifests how perfectly he understands whether he is treated justly or unjustly by others.

There is then a difference in things; and commonly speaking, it is clear to the apprehension of all men.

9. It is false, in teaching to do evil that good may come of it; or in other words, that the end sanctifies the means. In this country it will scarcely be denied,

* An Illustration of this remark occurs in vol. ii. b. 1. c. 10. "Voyages to the South Sea," published by Hawkesworth in 1773.—Tubourai Tamaike, an Otahitean, had been falsely suspected of stealing a knife, which in reality had been taken care of by Mr. Banks's servant. When the innocence of the Otahitean appeared, he expressed the emotions of his mind in his looks and gestures, and "with a countenance that severely reproached Mr. Banks with his suspicions."

On this incident it is observed, "These people have a knowledge of right and wrong from the mere dictates of natural conscience; and involuntarily condemn themselves, when they do that to others, which they would condemn others for doing to them. That Tubourai Tamaike felt the force of moral obligation, is certain; for the imputation of an action which he considered as indifferent, would not, when it appeared to be groundless, have moved him with such excess of passion."

that every one who lives in society has a claim on that society for justice and protection. But if it be an allowed maxim, that men may do evil† for the production of some good, then it will not be improbable (because the case has happened) that some persons under the delusion of this principle may, with a view to some imaginary good, not only refuse you justice, but proceed to treat you with the grossest injustice; may first plunder your property, and then deprive you of life, though on your part no offence hath been committed against either law or equity. Where then would be that security of rights, which from society you are encouraged to expect, and warranted in demanding?

Again; the basis of civil society is mutual confidence. But what man of common prudence will commit either his property or his person to the care of another, who holds himself at liberty to betray his trust and even destroy his friend, provided he doth but intend to appropriate the spoils to some good purpose?

Thus then this principle goes to the dissolution of all society; and if so, must be rejected as not compatible or reconcilable with that state, for which man is intended, and in which, when duly constituted, he finds the greater portion of happiness.

But in vindication of this perverse paradox, the public good of society has been pretended. It would however be difficult, nay even impossible to shew, that it can be for the public good of society to defeat the very cause, and counteract the very ends for which all society is instituted; both which evils this paradox completely works, by banishing confidence, and by violating at pleasure, the rights of the society existing.

But its advocate then pleads the good of posterity. Whose posterity? By the sudden death of those, whom this maxim may have taken off, he has done his utmost that they shall have no posterity: and by holding out an example to his own posterity, that they may do evil to produce good, he has taught them to rob and destroy each other, as he has robbed and destroyed the men of his own generation. For, what was once in itself lawful, must always be lawful: if robbery and assassination be lawful to the maintainer of this principle, they will be lawful to his children. And thus by precedent he establishes a maxim which, pursued to its consequences, would tend to the utter extinction of all society.

† A right to do wrong, or to commit injustice, is an abuse of language, and a contradiction in terms.

Seen then in these points of view, the paradox of doing evil that good may come of it, is of all others the most mischievous* that ever entered the mind of man.

Sophistry may puzzle plain sense; and violence may compel the oppressed to submit: but in common apprehension, honesty and fact, this is the truth; that if men choose to continue members of society, they are bound to acquiesce in those first principles, on which alone society can be so formed as to answer the ends of its institution. These principles are; 1st. That no man is allowed knowingly and wilfully to do wrong unto another; 2d. That every thing is wrong which is unjust; 3d. That every thing is unjust, which will produce more harm than benefit to the person affected. Where such principles are established, we have grounds of confidence on which we may securely rest; but should the other maxim prevail, on whom or on what could we depend?

10. It is false, in asserting that men are not required to be just in public life, as they are in private.

Society cannot exist to any useful purpose without mutual confidence, nor mutual confidence without the uniform prevalence of truth and justice. Therefore, though in intercourse with the world there may arise many cases, in which it may be difficult to ascertain precisely on which side truth and justice should lead us to determine, yet from ~~integrity and~~ ^{endeavouring} to follow the spirit of these principles, no man is in any case exempt; and for this reason, viz. because no man, living in society, can in any case be exempt from discharging a social duty to which he is competent, and a social duty it is, incumbent on every person alike, whether he be retired, or whether he concern himself with public affairs, to do his utmost for the conservation of society; which end can be attained only by adhering to truth and justice, since they are the foundations of confidence, that basis of civil union.

The same reasoning, which applies to the individual in society, applies also to the society itself with respect to alliance. Where there is no confidence between one nation and another, there can be no alliance; and where truth and justice are wantonly violated, there can be no confidence. Therefore nations, if they wish and profess to make alliance, and of course political administrators of such nations, are bound to observe such conduct towards their allies, as to the party with whom they have contracted alliance, may be serviceable to the ends for which the alliance was contracted, and may be perfectly consistent with equity and good faith†. National safety, national duty, and national character, require this conduct.

11. It is false, in conceiving that experiments may be made in morals, as in physics.

Natural and moral philosophy work not on the same subjects: the one is employed on matter: the other on mind. The effects of experiment on matter may be infinite as the particles of matter, and therefore incalculable. but the effects of experiment in moral principles applied to the human mind are comparatively few, and therefore can be ascertained. Such effects are few, because human nature

* "No end can justify the sacrifice of a principle, nor was a crime ever necessary in the course of human affairs." Roscoe's Life of Lorenzo. vol. ii. p. 307. ed. 1795.

See PLUTARCH. Themistocles, p. 263. vol. i. Bryan's edition.

is universally constituted of the same passions: and those effects can easily be ascertained, because every kind of principle, both consistent and inconsistent with man's nature, hath been already and long since tried, and the consequences are recorded. And it is impossible now to conceive any moral principle, the effect of which might not be foreseen; because, nothing new in morals can be devised; and as for the operation of principles already known (which indeed are all that can be discovered) it has always been found that men influenced by similar principles and placed in similar situations act nearly in the same manner; and that certain moral causes will produce certain corresponding moral effects. The attempt therefore to introduce new moral principles in a highly polished and civilized people, is extravagant and wild, because vain and fruitless.

But the extravagance and wildness of the attempt are among the slightest causes that render it objectionable. If the business terminated only in folly, there were in it little danger to be apprehended. It leads however to most fatal consequences: for, it encourages men to act in contradiction to those relations, which they bear to society. Does it not, for instance, contradict such relations to assert, that every one has a right to all he can obtain by strength or power, in contempt of law? Yet this doctrine has been more than once propagated, and (what is still worse) has been made a principle of action the force of which has been carried into immediate effect.

12. It is false, in teaching men to obey the impulse of passion, rather than the dictates of reason. It is clearly man's duty to follow, by virtuous means, that which shall ultimately terminate in the greatest natural and moral good. The two springs of human action are reason and passion. Now any one passion unrestrained by reason, will in the end produce injury. Thus, hope may lead to credulity, which in matters of business may occasion ruin: fear may unnerve a man against impending danger: anger may precipitate him into madness: desire may plunge him into sensual vices. Reason is the faculty by which these and all passions are restrained from running into excess. But if so, it is the power which ought to direct man's conduct, because it will prevent him from incurring those evils into which the passions might plunge him: and because reason itself can lead to no evils, so long as it retains its essential nature, that of judging rightly. If once we begin to judge not rightly, we are then proceeding, not according to the dictates of reason, but the delusions of error.

13. It is false, in asserting that man is merely material. Man thinks: matter does not * think. Man has self-will and self-motion: matter has neither. Man therefore must be constituted of something very different and distinct from matter, and that is what we call mind. Should it in reply be said, God may, if he chooses, make matter capable of thinking, of willing, and of moving; the answer is, first, that to overlook what God has done, and argue from what he may do, is to reject † experi-

We have every reason to believe, that in the case of such an experiment made, we shall suppose, with a colony of children transplanted from the nursery, and left to form a society apart, untaught, and undisciplined, we should only have the same things repeated, which, in so many different parts of the earth, have been transacted already. ence for speculation, and substitute theory for facts, which is a vicious mode of reasoning: and in the next place, it is to introduce confusion of terms; for if matter were made capable of thinking, willing, and moving, it would be no longer matter, it would be something very different from it, because it would have properties which no combination or division of matter was ever known * to produce. If the essential properties of any thing be altered, it becomes in its nature new; and so the case would be with respect to matter.

14. It is false, in supposing that nothing is to be admitted as true, which is not capable of mathematical demonstration. It is contrary to the condition of man to require mathematical demonstration in all cases, † before we assent to the truth of them. For, the concerns of life could not be carried on if we did not rely on the word ‡ of each other for facts done at present: and we must remain in total ignorance of circumstances past, if we did not admit the evidence of historical testimony. But neither the assertions of men living, nor the evidence of historical testimony, amount to mathematical demonstration, although, when the persons speaking or writing cannot reasonably be suspected of falsehood, their statements do amount to moral certainty. With reliance, however, on this certainty, though short of demonstration, we daily act, and on every principle of reason are justified §

When a thing is capable of good proof in any kind, men ought to rest satisfied in the best evidence for it, which that kind of things will

15. It is false, in opposing speculative objections to positive facts.

In natural religion, it is a fact that God hath given us life, and various means of enjoying life. This is a proof of God's goodness. It is a fact also, that he hath made the sun, moon, stars, earth, and waters, and fitted them for many useful purposes. These prove the wisdom * and the power of God. All objections then which can possibly be raised, taken from imperfections, imaginary or real, in the works of creation, can never disprove that God is benevolent, wise, and powerful. The utmost avail of such objections can only be a supposition that he might have been more † benevolent, and have shewn greater marks of wisdom and power. But who can undertake to demonstrate such a presumptuous supposition, when he cannot know thoroughly even this our own system, which is but one part of the universe? On the other hand, reason can produce many arguments, which should convince us all is for the best, ‡ bear, and beyond which better could not be expected, supposing it were true.

¶ 'Tis sufficient that matters of faith and religion be propounded in such a way, as to render them highly credible, so as an honest and teachable man may willingly and safely assent to them, and according to the rules of prudence be justified in so doing.

† The objection only shews, if it shew any thing, that we can conceive a constitution of things, in which greater benevolence would have appeared; a conclusion with which we have at present no concern.

The arguments by which we prove the Divine benevolence to a certain degree, are not overturned by objecting, that a greater degree is conceivable. I am now arguing on the very unreasonable supposition, that human conception is the measure of Divine power.

according to the present constitution of the world, and the present state of existence.

Again: In revealed religion, that Christ rose from the dead, is a fact attested more strongly than any other fact recorded in ancient history. All objections, then, which can possibly be made against his doctrines, can never disprove this fact; and on this it is we rest our faith.

16. It is false, in dissembling the difficulties which attend infidelity.

In natural religion, it is much more difficult to believe, that the world, formed as it is with design and governed with regularity, should be made and preserved by chance, i. e. by nothing, than it is to believe that it was made and governed by an intelligent Being, competent to the effecting of so stupendous a work.

In revealed religion, it is much more difficult to believe, that Christianity arose from no certain ground, than it is to believe that Christ really and actually existed. For to what adequate cause but such existence can it be ascribed, that his life is recorded by four histories, for the country and æra of which we have strong presumptive proof from their style * and correspondence with the circumstances of their time; and for the writers of which, we have testimonies † from the age immediately subsequent to them: to what other cause can it be ascribed that his doctrines should be the subject of many epistles, which by striking coincidences ‡ of time and place, and minute particulars, bear singular chaacters of authenticity; and that passages should be cited from those histories and epistles, and allusions made to them by many authors, who are known to have written at the distance of at least sixteen hundred years from the present date: to what other cause can it be ascribed, that in a vast empire idolatry should have yielded to the establishment of his religion; that many nations have made his principles the basis of their legislation; that for seventeen centuries there has been a succession of men professing themselves his disciples, and that at this day, in several countries, civilized and enlightened, is observed a solemn ceremony, in commemoration of his death: to what other cause can all these effects be ascribed, but to the sole cause which is adequate to account for them, viz. the real and actual existence of Christ? Surely it is beyond comparison more difficult to believe that those notorious and extraordinary facts should rest on no other foundation but fiction, than it is to believe that Christ lived, died, and rose again, in the manner related of him by the evangelists and apostles.

17. It is false, in confounding remote consequences with primary qualities. Thus, the religious wars which have been carried on by Christians, it charges on Christianity. Now it is incontrovertible, that the language of Christianity, as found in the Gospels, speaks nothing but peace; and that the spirit of Christianity is so benevolent as to forbid all unjust aggression, and to allow resistance and repulsion of injury so far only as in self-protection may be prudent and necessary. If then the professors of Christianity have used violence where no danger threatened them, or have propagated their principles of faith by means of cruelty and persecution, the criminality of such proceedings must be imputed, not to Christianity itself, but to the professors of it; who were influenced either by mistaken judgment, or misguided zeal, or ambition, or pride, or avarice, or some other malignant passion, which imposed itself on them under the name and appearance of conscience. To charge on Christianity, which in itself is good, either the errors or the vices of the persons who do indeed embrace, but who also pervert or disobey it, is so palpable an instance of arguing from abuse, as no just reasoning can possibly admit. And equally unfair is it to blame Christianity for the consequences that ensue from the corruption of its doctrines and the neglect of its positive precepts, as it were to blame jurisprudence, because many have been ruined by legal chicanery; or medicine, because the deaths of many have been hastened by empiricism; or literature, because men who have turned their abilities to the vilest of purposes, have written against every thing that is praise-worthy and sacred before God and man; or commerce, because the supplies which it administers to our wants are employed to pamper the appetite of luxury, and to swell the riot of excess. If either Christianity, or jurisprudence, or medicine, or literature, or commerce, has been made a pretended ground for the introduction of evil, such pretence has been in open contradiction to what was first intended in the cultivation of them; and the mischief is chargeable, not on them, which in themselves are good, and which in their original tendencies lead to good; but either on the folly or the wickedness of men, who have perverted the nature of these blessings, and have directed them to improper ends.* Surely the clearness of the fountain is not affected, because its stream at a remote distance is discoloured by the soil over which it flows: nor is the light of the sun therefore not bright, because on earth we may behold it through some dark body interposed between our eye and the source of effulgence.

But farther; it is disingenuous in suppressing this fact, viz. that for the thousands who may have suffered in wars termed holy, millions have lived in more undisturbed enjoyment of their property, in safer protection of their persons, in stricter purity of morals, in more uniform practice of private and domestic virtues, of social and public duties, under the benign and vital influence of Christianity, than under any other system of religion, or avowal of irreligion, that can be named. In no country not Christian, are there so many instances of good effects resulting from any other cause whatever, as are found to arise in nations that are Christian, from the impressions made directly and indirectly by Christianity, operating as it does on our laws, our sentiments, our manners, and our habits. Say then, shall we relinquish the religion of the Gospel, and instead of it adopt either the loose indifference of scepticism, or the pitiable uncertainties of deism, or the unbounded sensuality of Mahometanism, or the degrading idolatries of those who worship Brama, or Foï; or shall we rush precipitately into that atheism which at once throws off all restraint on the passions, disregards all maxims of equity, dissolves all the ties of social connexion, steels the heart against the fine feelings of humanity, sheds human blood without a pang of remorse, and makes man to man a creature more savage than any beast of the forest is to one of its own species? But these are the persuasions on religious subjects which prevail in the nations most important on the face of the earth: say then, shall we in exchange for any one of these, or for any of the cruel and absurd rites in the islands of the Southern * Ocean, resign the rational, sober, mild, and merciful doctrines of Evangelical Christianity? That so dire infatuation may never possess our minds, let us earnestly endeavour, as we value the dignity and happiness of human nature.

18. It is false, in excluding Divine Providence from the government † of the world.

It is the first property of matter to be inactive. The planets are material, but do nevertheless perform their periodical revolutions. There must then have been originally some power, independent * of the planets themselves, which communicated to them their primary motion; and that power is the effect of Divine Providence.

Again; man hath no power to command that the earth shall produce, and the seasons mature, the various fruits on which he subsists. But there is a power independent of man, independent of the earth and seasons, which, through means of the earth and seasons, doth furnish him with abundance of all supplies that either necessity may crave or luxury desire. The exercise of that power is a manifestation of providence in him by whom it is exercised.

The life of man depends so much on the perfect state of many minute parts in the human frame, that it might be shortened by obstructions in several vesicles. These obstructions and other injuries it is not in the power of man to avert; but there is a power independent of man, which doth avert them. This then is a demonstration of a particular providence over each individual.

Again; though in the common affairs of the world there is such a degree of correspondence † between the means and the end, as to justify and encourage us in adopting certain measures for the accomplishing of certain purposes, yet on various occasions we find effects in no way answering to visible causes. The wisdom of man is baffled; his counsels are frustrated; his efforts prove abortive: and yet, so far as human prudence could judge, the designs were calculated for ensuring success in the enterprize undertaken. But there is a power, that overrules all human endeavours; that often produces a consequence diametrically opposite to what was expected; that is particularly discernible in its benign operations to * educe good from what seemed to threaten evil: all which exertions of power are farther demonstrations of providence applied by some being; who is far above all that man can behold or comprehend.

Of a superintending providence these are evidences direct, which no subtleties of dispute can possibly overthrow, so far as the facts themselves extend. Instances of cases that may appear to contradict, could not invalidate facts which positively prove the exercise of providence. The utmost which such instances could do, would be to furnish a specious argument for supposing only that the operations of providence might be more wide: they never could shew its operations to be altogether non-existent, so far as facts prove them actually to exist. But is man then so acquainted with the whole system of divine administration, that he cannot possibly labour under any misconceptions, when he passes censure on parts of it? Can he undertake to demonstrate that what in one respect may have the appearance of casuality, cannot possibly in many other respects have all the marks of final design? Yet, until man can prove that any arrangement in the dispensations of God to this world, is either in itself nugatory, or in all its relations inadequate and improper for the purpose it is to serve, he is not better qualified to pronounce this or that event repugnant to ideas of Providence, than a child is enabled to pronounce this or that action of his parent repugnant to discretion.

19. It is false, in conceiving it no part of man's duty to make open profession † that he believes there is a God.

Not to profess that we believe there is † Established laws of nature are necessary for enabling intelligent creatures to conduct their affairs with wisdom and prudence, and prosecute their ends by proper means; but still it may be fit, that some particular events should not be fixed by general laws, but be directed by particular acts of the Divine government, that so his reasonable creatures may have sufficient inducement to supplicate his aid, his protection and direction, and to depend upon Him for the success of their honest designs.

a God, is in effect either to deny or to dissemble that God is our Creator and Preserver. But reason can prove such denial contrary to fact; and such dissimulation is irreconcilable with the gratitude, which enforces thankfulness from the creature to his Creator; with the reverence which an Almighty Being can claim * from one who is dependent on Him; and with that love which should prompt every mind of right dispositions, openly and incessantly to extol him to whom it is indebted for so many blessings. Add to this, that he who doth not himself profess to believe there is a God, influences others, so far as his example has any weight, to act in the same manner: and thus he is instrumental towards what we have already proved contradictory to right reason, the exclusion of God and his providence from the government of the universe.

20. It is false, in discouraging religious worship. For, by so doing, it acts in contradiction to that gratitude, which, on a principle of moral obligation, is due from man who receives, to God, who confers so many and so great benefits; and inconsistently with that prudence which directs all who desire a continuance of blessings, to supplicate the giver of them for such continuance. Then again, it is in opposition both to the nature of man, who is made capable of religious sentiments indisputably † for religious purposes; and in opposition also to the general consent of mankind, the history of which through all ages, in situations where the mental faculties have been duly improved, shows men to have always agreed in the propriety of observing some religious usages, however different may have been their opinions as to the particular modes of worship they would adopt. Add to this, that neglect of religion tends to impair the most energetic of all motives to the practice of private virtue; by weakening which, and by diminishing private-virtue, it leads ultimately to the corruption of public morals; from which corruption proceeds decay of public good, so far as that term implies order, industry, valour, honour, and genuine freedom; qualities which are productive of the greatest glory and of the highest happiness to any nation.

21. It is false, in denying the soul's immortality. For, first it takes for granted what never can be proved, that man is altogether material; which is an arbitrary assumption. Secondly, the assumption itself is false; because it is known that man has properties of thinking, willing, and moving, which belong not to matter, and therefore man must be constituted of something very different from matter. Thirdly, it is presuming on more than the doctrine of chances would allow; for, as we do exist in this state, it is at least an even chance that we may exist in another. Fourthly, it contradicts the apprehensions of the human mind, which on the commission of a crime against morality, anticipates the rendering of an account to an invisible being. Fifthly, it is repugnant to the general expectation of mankind. Whether that expectation be the result of tradition, or of reason, or of some peculiar principle in the constitution of man, is nothing to the purpose; the fact is, expectation of a future state has universally and through all ages prevailed. Sixthly, it is prejudicial to the interests of mankind, as it tends to exterminate a doctrine of the greatest moral utility, the doctrine of future retribution. Seventhly, it is irreconcilable with the moral attributes of the Deity; for it takes away that, which if allowed, at once removes * † Indisputably; for it is an allowed axiom that Nature, & c. God, does nothing in vain. Dicunt utique philosophi, Natura nihil agit frustra.

NEWTONI principia, L. 3. Reg. 1. Philosoph.

* Allow only the present life to be connected with a better, and every objection to Divine benevolence ceases of course. Is it not then more reasonable to admit and maintain this connexion, than to oppose our visionary difficulties (founded, for the most part, on the narrowness of our views, and the obscurity of our conceptions) to those innumerable marks of wisdom

all objections to the wisdom and goodness of God in the dispensations of his providence, objections raised on the supposed or real existence of partial evil. Thus much even natural religion could answer: but Revelation speaks more confidently, and says, assuredly there shall be a resurrection of the just and the unjust.

Between the revelation which asserts, and the philosophy which denies the soul's immortality, there is this striking difference: the former rests all its doctrines on the truth of certain facts; the latter can proceed only on conjecture: of course, the one is as much more deserving of credit than the other, as experimental knowledge is a more sure guide than speculative theory.

22. It is false, in disclaiming divine assistance to the human mind.

The strength of his body, and the faculties of his mind, man derives originally from God. Whether he receives them immediately from his Maker, or through the intervention of second causes, the case is the same in effect, for he must in either case alike refer it ultimately to God. The talents then, which in vague and indistinct language we call natural endowments, are the gift of God; and they are bestowed in degrees which differ* exceedingly, not only in different persons, but at different times in the same person. This diversity proceeds very frequently not from any concurrence of the human will, nor from the apparent operation of any physical cause: it results from the energy of some power which man can neither see explain, nor command; that power which we term Divine.

The essence of divine power is to work and goodness, which shine forth through the whole creation?

Dr. BALGUY'S Divine Benevolence, p. 102.

* It ought likewise to be observed, that as active power in man, and in every created being, is the gift of God, it depends entirely on his pleasure for its existence, its degree, and its continuance, and therefore can do nothing which He does not see fit to permit.

Dr. RYAN on the "Active Powers of Man."

*all things not implying a contradiction, As it confers ability to the mind in one degree, it may confer the same to degrees infinite; it may increase and strengthen the moral faculties in any measure whatever; for being omnipotent in its nature, it can experience no other restraint than what to the Supreme Being, in whom it resides, may seem expedient. Thus then it is evident, that if it be the will of God to grant divine assistance to the human mind, he certainly hath the power to grant such aid.

That he should have the will, may be conceived from his attributes: for, being himself both just and holy, he cannot but will that his rational creatures should be just and holy; and being also good and benevolent, he cannot but be inclined, through his goodness and benevolence, to help those who would be just and holy, but who, if left to the mere strength of their own resolution, cannot, through their infirmity, execute the virtuous and pious designs, which in truth and sincerity their minds purpose.

That God then hath the power to assist the human mind, is incontrovertible: and that he should have the will, may from his attributes fairly be concluded. It remains to be considered, whether he actually doth assist the human mind? And here we have much stronger reasons for affirming, than for denying the question. For in affirming it, we are justified by having proved that God certainly is able, and most probably is willing to grant assistance; and we moreover have on our part this circumstance, viz. that no reasoning of man can possibly ever disprove our assertion, when we maintain that God does assist us. On the other hand those, who disclaim Divine assistance, argue in contradiction to what God certainly can and probably does effect, and set up their own bare assertion as sufficient to prove, that God does not assist the human mind.

But what man is competent to decide † ——— Contradiction, which to God himself impossible is held, as argument Of weakness, not of power.

MILTON'S Par. L. x. 799.

thus peremptorily that God does not assist our minds? What finite being can take upon himself to declare all the ways and operations of a Being Infinite?

The disclaiming then of Divine assistance being contrary to the nature of man, who receives all his faculties from God; and irreconcilable with the attributes which dispose God to love holiness and to help those who desire to be holy; as moreover it proceeds on an assumption, which neither argument nor fact can ever support to such an extent as to prove that divine assistance is not communicated to man; the position is to be given up as not founded on any reasoning admissible in sound philosophy.

23. It is false, in teaching men to think it a matter of indifference, whether they hold right or wrong opinions.

Having received from his Maker, for good purposes, a mind as well as a body, man is equally bound to make a proper use of both: and he is alike culpable, whether he knowingly and wilfully contracts intellectual or bodily vices. But wrong opinions are intellectual* vices: and so far as our will is concerned, either in neglecting † to search for truth, or in disqualifying the mind for perceiving it, or in resisting the force of it when perceived; so far our wrong opinions are chargeable on us as crimes, because they proceed from an abuse of those powers, which were intended to help us in forming a right judgment, and which would have led us to just conclusions, unless through our own fault.

It may farther be remarked, that as opinions are commonly the principles of action, and it cannot be matter of indifference whether men act right or wrong; so neither can it be indifferent whether their opinions be right or wrong; for, as they think, so in general they act. It is therefore of great consequence that we form right opinions.

What opinions are right, we may now easily collect, from the observations which have been made on those that are erroneous. We will briefly state them.

Man, living in society, is subject to restraints; but in return, is entitled to protection of his property, his freedom, and his person. To this protection all who have not, by transgressing the laws, forfeited the benefit of them, have an equal claim: but equality of condition in rank and fortune cannot possibly exist.

The passions of some men would prompt them to violate the rights of others, were they not restricted by laws: hence laws are requisite. But perfection in those laws cannot practically be found, to that degree which speculatively might be wished. Nor ought it to be expected; because, the framers of them are themselves imperfect; and as such, can neither make provisions for all the cases that may possibly require legislative consideration; nor can they foresee all the various ways, in which the provisions they do make may possibly operate. Particular laws relating to particular circumstances and individual persons, may be readily amended as occasion makes it necessary: but with respect to a complicated system, that embraces a large community, and where consequences of great moment would proceed from alteration, sufficient it is if laws upon the whole are as good as circumstances will admit. When such they are, a change of them is not capriciously and precipitately to be attempted; more especially if in the attempt we hazard the losing of what is confessedly good, and have reason to fear the adopting of what eventually may prove extremely pernicious.

Of those privileges, which we claim under the law, the perversion is criminal; and concern for the general welfare requires the checking of such perversion; lest those who observe the laws should ultimately be deprived of their privileges; which would be the case, not only if the

* The neglect of keeping our minds in such an equal frame, the not applying of our thoughts to consider of such matters of moment, as do highly concern a man to be rightly informed in, must needs be a vice.

Bp. WILKINS'S Principles, &c. l. 1. §. 6.

† The man, who neglects the means of improvement in the knowledge of his duty, may do very bad things, while he follows the light of his mind. And though he be not culpable for acting according to his judgment, he may be very culpable for not using the means of having his judgment better informed.

Dr. RAUND the "Active Powers of Man," Ess. 3. c. viii. p. 236. ed. 1788.

governing power should exceed the due measure of authority; but equally so, if there should prevail an intemperate misapplication of liberty to bad purposes.

The end of law is justice. The idea of justice arises from a presumption that something is in itself right and something wrong. No circumstances can warrant the intentional commission of wrong; because the observing of right is our duty both in private and public life. The truth of these sentiments is proved by the salutary influence of them in the history of mankind through all ages: they are not therefore to be abandoned for speculative extravagances, destructive to man; nor is man allowed to sacrifice the dictates of reason to the violence of passion.

There is in man an active an intelligent principle, distinct from matter, and unlike to it, which we call mind. By this we are led to conclude, from the works of creation, that there must be a God; and from the historical evidence of facts, that Christianity must be true. In reasoning on the nature and the works of God, and in examining circumstances related in the Gospels, however incompetent we may find our understanding to resolve questions, which may arise to our thoughts; yet such incompetency cannot destroy, cannot weaken the positive certainty of facts; those facts on which we rest our faith, and by conviction of which we embrace a religion, in itself most excellent, though by its professors corrupted, or misapplied, the religion of the Gospel.

The reasoning of our minds discerns the Providence of God; whom openly to acknowledge and to adore, is a duty of moral obligation, a duty of prudence, a duty consonant with the nature of man, and corresponding with the universal practice of mankind.

The views of man are not to be confined to the present state of existence only; that he hath a soul destined for immortality, both natural and moral arguments tend strongly to demonstrate, and revelation expressly declares. To prepare himself for happiness in a state of immortality, by discharging the duties assigned him here, is the great business of man's life: in which important work, his endeavours to be just and holy will be forwarded by divine assistance, if he will supplicate the Almighty for spiritual aid.

This is a summary of right opinions, resulting from a view of those doctrines which would render us unfit for society, disaffected to our country, regardless of moral virtue, and careless about religion.

It might have been conceived, that philosophy, so prejudicial as well as false, would every where have been holden in the detestation it deserves, did not experience unhappily shew, that it hath influence much too extensive. For the reception it hath found, is to be assigned this cause, viz. that it immediately and in the most flattering manner applies to the appetites, which it indulges without restraint; whereas detection of its fallacies, and the cultivation of true philosophy require controul of sensual affections and vigorous exercise of reason. But then on the other hand it is to be remembered, that in the very circumstance of applying itself to the lower faculties of human nature, and indeed commonly to the most ignorant part of mankind, it betrays a consciousness of its own inferiority to that wisdom, which claims the attention of intellect and thought. Grovelling* therefore as it is, let it be rejected with high disdain by every mind, that feels a commendable pride in being endued with powers not merely brutal, but rational. And those who have not yet perceived by reflection the faculties of their own mind, nor have attained to a due sense of the capacity for improvement with which they are born; such persons will do well, to trust the experience of others, until their own judgment is mature; they will

* The terms, in which Ep. Wilkins speaks of the Epicurean philosophy, are strictly and literally applicable to the false philosophy of the present age:

"It doth debase the understanding of man, and all the principles in him that are sublime and generous, extinguishing the very seeds of honour, and piety, and virtue, affording no room for actions or endeavours that are truly great and noble; being altogether unworthy of the nature of man, and doth reduce us to the condition of beasts."

Principles of Natural Religion,

do well, to rely on the veracity of the serious and inquisitive, who after patient research assure them of a truth, that all the paradoxes of false philosophy are but snares of sophistry, calculated to seduce them from maxims of approved excellence, and from principles which have been known and seen to be most salutary, in their tendency to ensure the safety, advance the dignity, and promote the rational happiness of man!

Unless there be allowed some first principles, some fundamental axioms, to which we may refer as standards of truth, there can be no rule either in moral or mathematical science, by which to determine whether an argument be just, or false. In denying therefore all these first principles, in which mankind have universally agreed, false philosophy shews its folly. For folly it is to oppose reason: and nothing surely can be more in opposition to reason, than to undermine the very groundwork of all reasoning.

In points of discussion not recondite, an enlarged mind very soon discerns the intermediate connexion between the subject and the conclusion; it requires not therefore every minute consequence to be distinctly marked in the series of argumentation; nor does it interrupt the course of reasoning by starting futile and frivolous objections. False philosophy discovers its littleness, in not having comprehension capable of reaching from the question to the proof through the leading and more prominent steps of the argument: it calls for a multiplicity of deductions; demands that propositions of the simplest kind should be proved with precision unnecessarily scrupulous; raises difficulties, where sound sense would immediately and unerringly decide; and cavils if in the course of argument a single inference be left to be drawn by common understanding, and not absolutely stated in express terms.

By this folly and littleness in what he would correct, the advocate of truth is compelled to establish maxims, which to the plainest apprehension might appear incontrovertible; and forced to produce demonstration for the justness of positions, which by a mind unsophisticated, might have been supposed admissible on their own self-evidence.

These remarks are here subjoined, to satisfy the reader, that of the arguments and proofs used in this discourse, in defence of the better cause, none are superfluous. Such indeed some of them might well have been considered, were it not become a practice, in morals and philosophy alike vicious, either positively to deny or captiously to dispute the validity of opinions, in their nature indubitable, as that there is light at noon-day. But this sceptical hesitation about known truths is equally far from indicating strength of mind, as that deficiency, which nauseates ordinary sustenance, is contrary to the symptom of a firm constitution.

Bishop of Gloucester.

On the Preaching of Our Lord.

ST. MATTHEW, 13. 17.

From that time Jesus began to preach.

THOUGH on the work of reformation in the conduct of mankind, our Lord was indeed continually so intent, that he suffered not even common occurrences to pass unnoticed,* but raised from them instructions for spiritual improvement; yet we often find him also discoursing not in a general way, but with a more direct view to some particular points, either of doctrine or information, which he designed at each period to communicate. His manner of preaching at these seasons varies with the occasion: sometimes it is didactic; sometimes parabolic; sometimes prophetic. On these several modes of his preaching let us now make some remarks.

When Christ by his miracles† had given sufficient proof that he was endued with more than human power, he proceeded on his ministry with encouraging men to cultivate affections of piety; and with enlarging the sense to which interpreters had confined and limited the Mosaic precepts.‡ On those, who through repentance were contrite, and afflicted for their sins; on the meek, the holy, the merciful, the pure, the patient; on those, who would not relinquish their virtue and faith through any fears of temporal evil; on all such he pronounced a blessing.¶ To exemplary conduct and vital principles of real goodness he exhorts his disciples; bidding them not to acquiesce in the bare observance of the letter, but rather to obey the spirit of the law; and enjoining them to shew the sincerity of their faith in him, by restraining anger, and forgiving injuries, by resisting irregular passions and abandoning secret sins, by avoiding all expressions that may derogate from the dignity and the sanctity of God's name; by extending liberality to all in distress, without distinction of sect, party, or country; and by bearing even towards enemies a degree of love, which should incline us to treat them with all the kindness that prudent regard for our own safety can possibly admit.

As the end and object of all religion is to turn man unto God, and under a sense of duty towards his Maker to influence his heart and correct his morals, that he may think and act as becomes a spiritual being sensible of his obligations towards God, duly estimating the rational powers conferred on him, and earnestly hoping to be blessed with divine approbation both in this and a future life; as this is the end and object of all religion, our Lord in his wisdom laid the foundation of Christianity in truths respecting God and moral goodness.

After longer intercourse with his disciples, he delivers to them parables; and for his adopting this method of preaching, may be assigned the following reasons.

Conversant as they were with the writings of the Old Testament, the Jews were acquainted with this manner of instruction, which had been used by prophets in former ages. The remonstrance of Jotham* with the men of Sichem, and the reproof of Nathan† to David, were both conveyed, the one by an apposite, the other by an interesting parable, which were well known to our Saviour's disciples. In speaking therefore to them after this manner, he addressed them in a style suited indeed to the genius of Orientals in general, but more particularly calculated to engage the attention of Jews who had been accustomed to hear from persons of prophetic character ‡ sayings of this nature.

The parables of our Lord were moreover all intended for illustration to those who came with dispositions to be taught, and who would employ some attention in properly applying them. But the degree of illustration is not always designed to be the same. In some it is meant the conclusion should be drawn with little difficulty: in others, the inference was purposely more obscure.†

The parables which most easily admit of interpretation are these:

The sower;‡ which represents the different dispositions of those who would hear the Gospel, and the different influence that would accordingly be produced by it on their minds and conduct. The tares,§ and the net cast into the sea;|| which intimate the mixture of good and bad men under the Gospel, as under all other dispensations; yet that, upon the whole, it is better the punishment of the wicked should be delayed to the consummation of all things, than that it should be speedily ¶ executed. The grain, and the leaven;  of which, the one signifies the growing extent of the Gospel from an inconsiderable beginning; the other, that change which silently and gradually it should produce in the hearts and actions of men. The hidden treasure, and pearl of great price; †† which teach us that the Gospel is of value so inestimable, that to the possession of it should be sacrificed all considerations. The unmerciful servant; ‡‡ whence we learn, that if we hope to receive forgiveness of our own sins from God, we must pardon the offences men have committed against us. The ten virgins; * which gives a lesson on the necessity of vigilance in the work of pious and moral conduct at all seasons, since we know not how soon we may die, and as we die, so shall we be judged. The different talents; † by which we are exhorted to make a proper use of the several gifts imparted to us by Providence, be they external or internal, bodily or mental. The good Samaritan; ‡ which inculcates charity as due to all men, however they may differ from us, either by national connexion, or in religious persuasion. The rich man enlarging his barns; § whose example shews the folly of such immoderate attachment to our possessions, as shall make us forget God and our latter end. The unjust steward; || which intimates to us, that we should make conducive to our salvation the various natural, moral, and spiritual gifts with which we are entrusted by God for his glory; and admonishes us also, that we should be equally attentive to religious concerns, as the most artful and iniquitous are intent on devising means by which to gain pecuniary advantages. The prodigal son; ¶ which encourages us to hope, that God will be merciful to us if we sincerely repent. The rich man and Lazarus;  teaching us the misery in which must terminate that careless indifference to religious concerns, so frequently found in a voluptuous life. The widow importuning the unjust judge; †† which enforces perseverance in prayer. The publican and pharisee; ††† in commendation of humility, and reproof of self-righteousness.

All these parables to a considerate mind would give illustration, if they were taken according to the design with which they were delivered; a design, §§ which meant not to preserve, between the similitude and subject, an exact correspondence of minute parts; but to mark between them such a resemblance in the general outline, as that the subject might be placed in a more striking light; and that the principal truth to be inculcated might be discerned without much labour of investigation. And for this purpose, as it was unnecessary in regard conformity in the several circumstances, so it was perfectly indifferent whether the story introduced were taken from real life, or were altogether fictitious; and whether the characters * were good or bad. The reflection, which was to be made on the whole, was the principal object: and if the parable taken together impresses on the mind that sentiment, which was the scope of it, the intent of teaching by that mode is fully answered.

The parables that could not be so readily explained, because alluding to events which at the time our Lord spake did not seem probable, and therefore were incomprehensible to the generality of his audience, were these:

The labourers in the vineyard; † intimating that to the spiritual blessings of Christ, ty the Gentiles should be admitted equally with the Jews, who had hitherto been the sole worshippers of the true God. The husbandmen who slew the heir, ‡ and seized on the vineyard; signifying the insults which the Jews had offered to a succession of former prophets; the death which they were now meditating against our Lord himself; and the divine vengeance which awaited them for this last act of iniquity. marriage of the king's son;* predicting that the Jews should be rejected, and the Gentiles invited to the Christian dispensation: but though among the Gentiles many would be called to the knowledge of the Gospel by the preaching of its ministers, yet, comparatively speaking, few would so prepare themselves by holiness of life as to be objects of divine approbation.† The fig-tree fruitless for three years;‡ which implies, that Christ had in vain looked for repentance and reformation among the Jews; their state therefore should be destroyed, and their nation scattered.

These parables could not be solved with equal facility as the others were expounded; because nothing but the accomplishment of extraordinary circumstances could throw on them light sufficient for the full apprehending of them. And our Lord purposely foretold those events with a degree of obscurity, that the indignation of the scribes and pharisees might not be raised to a degree of sudden madness, which should precipitate his death before his ministry was completed, and before the time appointed for the sacrifice of himself was duly arrived.

Thus then did our Lord speak in parables, of which those that inculcated evangelical duties were easy to be explained, but those that predicted the approaching change in the Jewish state, and the establishment of the Gospel dispensation, were less obvious to interpretation. And this manner of teaching he appears to have adopted, partly in imitation of former prophets, and partly with the view of making distinction§ between those who really wished to be informed, and others who were obstinately and wilfully determined not to be convinced. To the former, he purposed that his words should convey instruction upon that due exercise of their thoughts, which he knew they would bestow: to the latter,§ he meant that his parables should be as sounds only, since they would employ not the smallest consideration to investigate the sense. In this manner it happens in natural religion. God speaks to us by his works. He is understood by those who maturely reflect on them: but he is neither heard nor seen by others, who behold his works with indifference. It is neither the province, nor the nature, nor commonly speaking, in the power of religion to force conviction: it recommends itself to the understanding of every observing person; but if man will not observe, nor apply his understanding, it leaves him to pursue his own inattention, and to take the consequences of such irrational conduct. As a knowledge of God is not palpable to the thoughtless, so neither was a knowledge of the Gospel to be attained by men to whom it appeared unworthy of regard.* And thus did the Son of God act in perfect analogy with the wisdom of his Almighty Father; and the dispensations of nature and grace are both calculated for beings endued with reason. From the very frame of our constitution, bodily and mental, we are required to use that reason in searching after truth; but we are nevertheless free not to use our reason properly, if we love brutish stupidity rather than improvement of intellect; if we prefer darkness to light, and evil to good; if we would alienate ourselves from God for the sake of degrading vices that must sink us in the scale of rational creatures and must terminate in misery. Man hath liberty to choose either life or death but when he hath made his choice, if it be on the worse part, let him not reproach his Maker, who gave him reason, and created him free. Let God be justified, but man self-condemned for his own egregious folly.

ERASMUS, the exemplar and favourite writer of his biographer Dr. JORTIN, on our Lord's use of parables remarks thus:

"Sive id Christo visum est, quo prophetarum sermonem, cui Judæorum aures adsucverat, referret: sive hæc difficultate segnitiam nostram exercere voluit, ut postea gratior esset fructus, non sine negotio quesitus: sive hoc consilio sua mysteria profanis et impiis opera celataque esse voluit, at sic, ut interim piis scrutatoribus non intercluderetur adsequendi spes: sive genus hæc dictionis potissimum placuit, quod ut ad persuadendum cum primis efficax est, ita doctis pariter et indoctis expositum et familiare, maximeque secundum naturam."

The prophecies delivered by our Lord come next to be considered. When by his discourses and miracle he had evidently proved his divine mission, he begins to forewarn his disciples of the great events which were soon to befall him self, & of which some would in the first place so astonish them, as even to make them disbelieve his predictions to the title of Messiah, when others again should operate on their minds with such strong conviction, that to pursue, not to torment, not to neglect him, but to care for him, and to be with him, would be the only way to save themselves. The first intimation of his approaching end, suggested to his hearers. The bare mention of his sufferings was received with disapprobation, inasmuch that our Lord instantly passed to an earnest exhortation, by which to animate his disciples against renouncing their faith through fear of afflictions; and at a period not far distant, having exhibited himself in a glorified form, he again impresses on their minds the resurrection, as a circumstance to which they should look forward with peculiar attention, since it was to produce an effect entirely contrary to the doubts and apprehensions which would be raised in their hearts by his intermediate humiliation. We find our Lord a second time predicting the evils that awaited him, in terms similar to those before used, with the addition however of a circumstance more express and particular as to the manner in which the rulers should be enabled to apprehend him, "the son of man shall be betrayed into the hands of men."†

Endued as he was with power to discern the thoughts of men, he foresaw the treachery which Judas was meditating, but did not yet openly announce it to his disciples, that one amongst them's lives would be in imminent danger to his death. A third time he foretells what was to be accomplished in him; and is now more circumstantial than in the former prediction for not only the treachery, but the delinquent of him "to the Gentiles, to mock, and to scourge, and to crucify him," is here specified, after which it is added also, "and the third day he shall rise again." A fourth time he speaks of what was to follow, and limits the transaction to a period so near that it might be said he was already betrayed; ‡ he renews the same subject a fifth and last time, explicitly declaring that one of his own disciples even he who at that moment was eating with him, would be the person to betray him § and after the solemn institution of the sacred meal, which was to be continued to perpetual memory of his death he forewarns them of the apostasy with which they would desert him, but consoles them with a promise of returning to them again when he was risen ||.

In the manner of delivering these predictions, remarkable is the tenderness with which our Lord unfolded the particulars of his death by a gradual declaration of circumstances, circumstances which, if abruptly and unseasonably introduced all at the same time, would immediately have overwhelmed his disciples with perplexity and sorrow. By degrees therefore he habituates them to think of his sufferings, prepares them for what would ensue, by adding progressively some fact not mentioned before, and reserves the most bitter and aggravating consideration, that he should be betrayed by one of his own disciples, to the very season when that event was to take place.

On the subjects of these prophecies it is to be observed, that his foretelling cir-

cifixion, as the mode by which he should suffer, was a proof of his possessing divine prescience: for, as crucifixion was not a Jewish, but a Roman punishment, and he had committed no crime which should make him obnoxious to the Roman governor, so it seemed not probable* to human apprehension that by the Roman law he should be crucified, and not by the Jewish law stoned.

The limiting† of his resurrection to the third day, gave strong presumption, even before he rose, that his former assertions had been founded in truth; for had he spoken otherwise than according to truth, he would not have rested the whole veracity and validity of his mission on an event that was to happen within a space so very short; but would have built it on some fact, which the generation then present could never have seen. But as the case now stands, we are to remain in a state of suspense only three days, and then it shall be manifested by the resurrection of a person, whose side shall be pierced, whose body shall be buried, and who shall lie in the grave two nights and one whole day; by the resurrection of such a person, within so brief an interval as that of three days, it shall be manifested whether he did or did not speak truth. A more fair test of sincerity could not be proposed, nor could pretensions be placed on an issue more palpable: here could be no misapprehension, no mistake: the crucifixion was notorious, the wounds visible, the burial uncontroverted: on the question, whether our Lord did or did not rise from the dead, turns the principal argument either for or against the truth of Christianity. That he did rise, is a fact asserted by positive history, and confirmed by collateral evidence, strongly and authentically as any fact‡ whatever, in the records of any age or country that has ever existed.

That the Jews should be punished for their infidelity and wickedness, had been intimated by several prophetic parables: but towards the close of his ministry, our Lord speaks in more direct terms of the calamities which awaited their nation. Persecuted though he had been by the chief persons among them, and foreseeing as he did the aggravated cruelty with which they would soon destroy him, yet with compassion he softened the severity of his judgment; "he wept* over the city," the desolation of which he foretold; and bewailed† most pathetically the blindness and obstinacy which had darkened their understandings, and hardened their hearts against the evidences he had produced in support of his just claim to the title of Messiah! In the predictions concerning the fall of the temple and of Jerusalem, we are to observe not only the circumstantial manner in which events, at that time improbable,‡ are distinctly marked out; but the exact period, within which the accomplishment of these facts was expressly confined. The generation§ then existing was not to pass away; that is, forty years were not to elapse, before these predictions would be verified: and therefore it was not beyond the course of nature to imagine, that many of those who then heard him would be alive at the conclusion of the determinate era, and would have ocular demonstration how far his prophecies were, or were not fulfilled. In this case, therefore, as in that of the resurrection, our Lord rests his pretensions to veracity on a fact, the accomplishment of which was circumscribed within a given space of time; a fact too, so palpable in its nature, that it could not possibly admit of a doubt whether it did or did not happen: for the destruction of a city like Jerusalem must be an event so extraordinary, that the whole Roman empire must hear of its demolition. Here then is another presumption that our Lord spake truth, arising from a second instance of limitation assigned to the period in which his prediction was to be fulfilled; and that presumption is changed into positive proof, by the manner in which, within the prefixed period, his prophecies were not only fulfilled in a general way, but almost literally accomplished in every minute* and particular incident: and the evidence produced from the completion of prophecies respecting Jerusalem is so irrefragable, that its force can be evaded by nothing but the disingenuous shift of recurring to a supposition contradicted by histories, the date of which histories is ascertained with equal precision as the date of any ancient writings can possibly be ascertained. And there is wanting neither internal proof, nor current opinion from the earliest ages of Christianity, that three of the Gospels were written antecedently to the fall of Jerusalem.†

Having remarked thus much on the morals, the parables, and prophecies of Christ, we may draw a conclusion which will scarcely be controverted, viz. that they evince in him a degree of wisdom not commonly found among men. But let us now ask, "whence‡ had Christ this wisdom?" As it is a question of importance, and therefore deserves to be fairly discussed, with all humility and lowliness of mind let us proceed on an inquiry, the result of which will be a strong confirmation of our faith in Christ as the Saviour through whom we have redemption; and as the Lord whom we are bound to worship and obey.

Considering then, yet with profound reverence, the human nature of our Lord, we can discover but four possible ways by which his mind could be thus enlightened; and these are, either by the aid of instructors, or by the study of writings; or by superior understanding, or by divine communication.

The learning of the Jews was in general confined to the knowledge of the law, the prophets, the Hagiographa,* and traditions. Whatever instruction was imparted to Christ, must have proceeded either from his reputed parents,† or from the scribes who were teachers‡ in their schools and synagogues. From the one, it is probable he could hear nothing but the plain letter of the Scriptures; from the other, he would receive expositions corresponding with the tenets either of the pharisees,§ or sadducees, or essenes. But the refined interpretation of the moral law, which is the peculiar beauty of the sermon on the mount, as it far exceeds the simplicity in which his parents must have taught him, so it partakes not of any principle that characterises either of the sects which in his days prevailed. It encourages neither the loose|| morals of the sadducees, nor the formal and traditional observances of the pharisees, nor the excessive austerities of the essenes.¶ It is enlarged to the extent which the spirit of the law will fairly justify; it abrogates tradition and merely external service; it accommodates itself to every condition of social life. These peculiarities, which distinguish the Gospel morality from all the doctrines then adopted by the Jews, are evident proofs, that although our Lord undoubtedly heard the Scriptures both read and explained by others; * yet his mode of interpretation is so far his own, as not to be the effect of any instruction derived from teachers; because there were no teachers capable of giving him this interpretation. But were the case otherwise, and had he been instructed to a degree not common among the Jews of his age, still the aid of instructors could have extended no farther than to the communication of knowledge in the moral science; it could have availed him nothing in the conception of parables, and the prediction of future events. The aid of instructors therefore is totally inadequate to account for his wisdom.

That every part of the sacred writings was known by the mind of our Lord, is obvious from his frequent reference to passages in various parts of the Old Testament: and to some of these he most probably alluded in the former part of his sermon on the mount†. The Psalmist declares, "The Lord is high unto them that are of a broken heart, and saveth such as are of a contrite spirit‡:" our Lord pronounces a benediction§ on "the poor in spirit," and "on those that mourn." In Isaiah it is said, "To this man will I look, even to him that is poor and of a contrite spirit, and trembleth at my word||:" the promise of our Lord is, "Blessed are the meek." The psalmist asserts, that he only can serve God acceptably, who has "clean hands and a pure heart:  in our Saviour's words, "Blessed are the pure in heart."

When he had finished the beatitudes, he professedly enters on the moral laws of Moses. To remove the false interpretations by which the Scribes and Pharisees had obscured the beauty and perverted the excellence of the moral law, was a considerable† object of his mission.

The prohibition of murder in the sixth commandment, the Jews had limited merely to the literal interpretation. Our Lord extends it to the forbidding of such anger and malice, as may in their consequences lead to murder. And on this occasion he seems to have enlarged on these words of Moses; "Thou shalt not hate thy brother in thine heart; thou shalt not avenge, nor bear any grudge against the children of thy people; but thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself‡." Which last expression the teachers of the Law had so misinterpreted, as to make it imply that an enemy might be hated.§ Our Lord corrects this improper exposition: in doing which he may be conceived to have in his view, either the humane precept of Moses, which ordains, "If thou meet thine enemy's ox or his ass going astray, thou shalt surely bring it back to him again: if thou see the ass of him that hateth thee lying under his burthen, and wouldest forbear to help him, thou shalt surely help with him||." For if even the beast of an enemy were thus to be assisted, much more were his own person to be relieved from distress. Or our Lord may have adverted to this admonition of Solomon; "If thine enemy be hungry, give him bread to eat; and if he be thirsty, give him water to drink."¶

In that comprehensive summary of relative and social duty, "Whatsoever ye would that men should do unto you, do ye even so to them,"  it is not impossible

* His parents found him at an early age "in an apartment of the Temple, where the teachers of the law used to lecture upon it to the people; and where young persons in particular were examined, and had a liberty to ask what questions they thought proper, for their farther information."

that our Lord might have in his thoughts the instruction of Tobit, "Do that to no man, which thou hatest."* But on all these occasions, the words of our Lord are of greater force and wider extent than what immediately appear in the terms of the Old Testament. In his general rule of conduct, for instance, our Lord does not confine himself to a negative prohibition, but enjoins a positive duty.† Universal charity he inculcates in the emphatic words, "Love your enemies; bless them that curse you; do good to them that hate you; and pray for them that despitefully use and persecute you."‡ And to language of reproach that proceeds from malicious thoughts, he threatens the severity of future punishment.§ Well therefore may he be said to have made full the moral law, not only by restoring its original purity, but by adding to it an energy and latitude of meaning which before it did not possess." It was indeed at all times in itself "Holy, just and good:"|| but as the latter dispensation was always designed to be the more excellent covenant, it was reserved for Christ in his appointed time to dilate precepts which heretofore had been delivered with the brevity of elementary principles.

When we hear our Lord thus expounding and establishing morals, it is not enough to observe the comprehension with which he embraced all that was intrinsically virtuous in the law and the prophets; but it should farther be remarked, that although he did indeed make the Scriptures of the Old Testament the ground of his doctrine, yet by the manner in which he treats his subjects, the moral precepts of all who went before him assume a different and more striking appearance; insomuch that they come from him in a great degree new: new, not only to the audience in whose hearing they were explained, and to whom, from their being set forth without the veil of glosses, they really were new; but, comparatively speaking, they are new to us, who have the letter of Scripture with which to contrast our Lord's interpretation. Patience under injuries and charity unbounded, however they may be deduced from the commands and admonitions contained in the Old Testament, cannot yet be said to meet our view as prominent features in the law and the prophets: much less is restraint on the very first conceptions of inordinate propensity a leading character in those ancient writings. But forbearance, benevolence, and purity of intention, are the very life and essence of Christian morality, presenting themselves in every page, and interwoven in every letter of the Gospel.

Hence then it appears, that however Christ may have laid the foundation of his wisdom in Scripture-knowledge, yet the superstructure which he raised is the work of his own mind. For, in his manner of elucidating former precepts, and in making the exercise of kind affections and the repression of irregular thoughts so indispensably necessary, as that they should be distinguishing marks of sincerity in his disciples; in these very material and discriminating points our Lord derived his wisdom from no Jewish writings.

For the sake of argument, let us now conceive that our Lord might have been acquainted with the writings of Greece, and that he might have remarked in them some tenets confessedly excellent. That from those writings he should adopt any precepts corresponding with doctrines of morality already found in the Old Testament, would have been unnecessary; that supposition therefore is out of the question, because nugatory. But let us imagine he might have observed in them, two maxims which appear most similar to his own characteristics; these for instance; "whatever injury we may have sustained from another person, yet we ought not to do him an injury in return;"* and "it is equally criminal to intend,† as to commit a wicked action." Now as the first of these maxims, although we should grant (what however there is reason to doubt*) that it is designed to be of universal application, yet when it is compared with the Christian doctrine of forgiveness, it falls short in the principle on which it is founded: for it considers only the injustice of retaliation: it does not originate from a sense of benevolence due to all mankind, as being all brethren and equally the offspring of the same God; much less does it arise from conviction that every man has need of imploring divine mercy for himself, and therefore ought to exercise mercy towards his fellow-creatures. But these are the principles from which the Christian doctrine of forgiveness proceeds; principles, more wide in extent, and more powerful in energy than the philosophic motives: for the benevolence of charity is more enlarged, active, and humane in its operations; and the persuasion that giving pardon is an indispensable condition for receiving divine pardon, is more forcible in its effect than any abstract idea of justice can possibly be.

With respect to the other maxim, that also seems limited to injustice only, and not in the smallest degree applicable to the immorality of gratifying our irregular desires. Nor does it appear, that in the opinion of philosophers indulgence of sensuality, under certain restrictions, was deemed culpable. There was indeed a sect † which, like the essenes, discouraged wedlock: but that was an excess of austerity not corresponding with the condition of mankind, and therefore warrantable by no law divine or human, and consequently deserving no regard. We are to speak of those who allowed marriage, and prohibited adultery: they did not universally forbid acts of licentiousness ‡ which Christianity at all times condemns as contrary to good morals. But for the effectual prevention of such acts, our Lord lays a restraint; which is meant to operate uniformly and indispensably on the first thought that is impure; and bids us discard vicious propensities, though the labour of doing it be painful “as plucking out a right eye, or cutting off a right hand.”* This is to strike directly and constantly at the very root † of sensuality: it guards the heart from ever giving encouragement to irregular desires: and thus to a degree, not obviously apparent among the philosophers, who either preceded, or lived in the age of our Saviour, it prepares man for cultivating his nobler faculties, intellect and reason, and raises his mind to the high duties of morality and religion.

It cannot be affirmed as a matter of certainty, that the writings of philosophers, either antecedent to the æra of our Saviour, or contemporary with it, did not contain other moral precepts, which at first view might seem to have some correspondence with the distinguishing tenets of Gospel morality. Let the reverse be supposed; and let it be imagined that our Lord saw in them other precept ‡ resembling his own. Yet, if we are allowed to judge either from the entire works, or fragments, or accounts of Grecian authors now extant, we may conclude almost to a positive certainty on two very material points: they are, that no philosopher whatever laid the foundation of his morals in repentance for sins past on a

Did any similar passages of refined morality in the Greek writings, before the Christian æra, occur to recollection they should on no account be suppressed. For it is anxiously wished that the question should be fairly met. Besides; every demonstration of correspondence subsisting between natural and revealed religion in doctrines intrinsically good, is an additional proof of divine origin in Christianity: for it was one object of our Lord, to restore the original moral law to the pristine purity in which it was delivered by God to ADAM; and thus to shew that he was co-operating with God in the work of reformation he had undertaken.

principle of religion and of duty towards God; and that no one gave a promise of divine pardon to repentance of this nature, and proceeding from such a principle: on the contrary, there is much reason to suppose that the Greek philosophers had no idea of that repentance which springs from "Godly sorrow;" and as for any assurance of divine mercy upon such repentance, that no one could give. It must however be granted, that the beginning of moral instruction could commence from nothing so properly as from exhortations, that should induce men to be ashamed and sorry for their past offences against God and virtue: nor could any motive to repentance of this nature be so persuasive and cogent, as an absolute promise of pardon from Almighty God, which implies a prospect of happiness in a future state. Here then our Lord, as a teacher of morals, stands unparalleled and unrivalled by any philosopher. And as it before appeared that Christian morality excels philosophy in the extent to which it applies the two precepts which dissuade from doing injuries and from conceiving wicked purposes; so it is now manifest that the ground on which our Lord began the work of renovating manners was taken deeper, and was therefore more likely to influence future conduct, than any mode which philosophers adopted: it is evident also, that the argument on which he enforced reformation of morals was more prevalent, because more authoritative and more unmingled with doubt than any inducements which philosophers could presume to hold out as consequences that should most assuredly follow, upon amendment of life.

Forgiveness of injuries upon the principle of regarding all men as children of the same God, and on the persuasion that it is a condition of our obtaining pardon from God; repentance for sins past; and the promise of pardon upon such repentance; these doctrines, as they discriminate Christianity from philosophy, and exalt the one far above the other, so they could not be gathered from the writings of philosophers, even though it had been clear that Christ was conversant with such writings. But so far is that circumstance from being clear, that no supposition can be more improbable. For in the first place, the obscure condition in which he was born, would make it almost impossible that he should receive an education so totally different from that of other Jews in Palestine, as would have been the study of Greek philosophy added to that of the Scriptures. In the next place, the paucity of manuscripts was such as to make it highly improbable that many, if indeed any such, should come into the hands of one circumstanced as he was, in rank not high, in possessions not affluent. Then again it must be recollected, that the Jews in Palestine held the Gentiles in such contempt, that the circulation of their writings throughout Judea would not have been allowed. On these several accounts we may reasonably conclude, that the writings of the Greek* philosophers were totally unknown to Christ, and the very supposition that he might have studied them must be abandoned as quite repugnant to probability, and almost irreconcilable with possibility.

And after all; however he might have gained information from the study of writings sacred or profane with respect to morals, yet towards the invention of his parables, from neither could he have derived any other assistance than that he could have found in them merely the models for such compositions; he could not thence have been furnished with subjects and sentiments. The parables and allegories of the prophets and philosophers are many of them very finely imagined; but excepting the parable spoken by Nathan, there is nothing of the kind in all antiquity to be compared† with the simple,

* It were not only visionary, but quite unnecessary to conceive our Lord studying the writings of Roman authors; because their philosophic maxims were copied from the schools of Greek philosophy. Tully, who was the chief and best writer preceding the age of Christ, has nothing excellent which might not have been found in some of the Greek moralists, had their works come down to us entire.

yet affecting parables of the prodigal son, the good Samaritan, the rich man and Lazarus, the unmerciful servant.*

On the parables it is moreover to be observed, that imagination and adaptation of the similitude to the subject are not the only circumstances belonging to them: many of them are prophetic; which when we consider, we must ask, what writings could communicate to Christ the wisdom of prophecy, either as it appears more obscurely in his parables, or more directly in his open and unreserved predictions? To the imparting of such wisdom no writings are adequate. If as a moralist, and a teacher by parables he could have received but little aid from the study of sacred or profane authors, as a prophet he could derive from them absolutely no assistance whatever. Let us leave then the idea that his wisdom might have been the result of application to writings, and let us see what can be done by superior understanding.

In the history of mankind are recorded different eras, when the powers of the human mind have been displayed in a manner so signal, as to mark the periods, in which either some individual, or several contemporaries† of distinguished abilities, enlightened the age which gave them existence. Beams of genius, of invention, of knowledge, of art, of science, have suddenly burst out amidst the clouds of intellectual darkness, and have irradiated nations that for centuries had been obscured by a long night of gross ignorance. Reflection on this fact induces us to conceive, that the mind of man may be endowed with uncommon powers equal to the improvement of any and every system of art or science: and it must be allowed, that by the force of superior understanding.* Christ might have been enabled to teach his refined morals; as by creative imagination he might have invented those parables which are not prophetic. But when we have made this concession, it must on the other hand be granted, that with such penetration and fancy he must have been a most extraordinary person in his intellectual faculties; for it is not in the usual course of things, nor of daily occurrence, to meet with instances of such moral wisdom as appears in his precepts, or of such ingenious† composition as is manifested in his parables.

Nor under this head are extended parables the only subjects that claim our attention. We should not omit those shorter illustrations, by which our Lord's discourses are made engaging, lively, and impressive.

His Apostles, whose employment it would henceforth be to preach the gospel, he animates to rely on Divine Providence for reasonable supply of food and raiment: "Behold the fowls of the air; for they sow not, neither do they reap, nor gather into barns: yet your heavenly Father feedeth them." "Consider the lilies of the field, how they grow; they toil not, neither do they spin: and yet I say unto you, that even Solomon, in all his glory, was not arrayed like one of these‡." As a caution to his disciples against being deceived by false teachers, he suggests to them, "Ye shall know them by their fruits: do men gather grapes of thorns? or figs of thistles? Even so every good tree bringeth forth good fruit: but a corrupt tree

* But as it may not exceed the powers of the human mind, especially with the assistance of the Hebrew scriptures, to frame a rational system of religion and morality, the very superior excellence of what our Lord taught attests only a strong presumption, and not a decisive proof, that he was an ambassador of the Most High God.

bringeth forth evil fruit*." The distinction between one, who should hear his doctrine to the salutary purposes of faith and amendment, and another on whom his exhortations would produce no such permanent effect, is marked by likening the former "unto a wise man, who built his house upon a rock;" the latter, "unto a foolish man, who built his house upon the sand†." That the Jews had resorted to John the Baptist in full persuasion and acknowledgement of his prophetic character, is intimated by these questions: "What went ye out into the wilderness to see? a reed shaken with the wind? But what went ye out for to see? a man clothed in soft raiment‡?" That acts of mercy and compassion on all days and seasons may lawfully be exercised towards mankind, is to be inferred from these words: "What man shall there be among you, that shall have one sheep, and if it fall into a pit on the Sabbath-day, will he not lay hold on it, and lift it out§?" That the paternal love of God towards sinful man, moved him to reclaim from wickedness those that were gradually withdrawing themselves to a wider distance from Divine favour, we may hence infer; "If a man have an hundred sheep, and one of them be gone astray, doth he not leave the ninety and nine, and goeth into the mountain, and seeketh that which is gone astray||?" The semblance of holiness, which the Scribes and Pharisees ostentatiously assumed, whilst their hearts little corresponded with their external profession, made them "like unto whited sepulchres, which indeed appear beautiful outward, but are within full of dead men's bones, and of all uncleanness¶." Anxious solicitude and tender affection cannot be expressed in stronger terms than in this pathetic exclamation: "O Jerusalem, Jerusalem! thou that killest the prophets, and stonest them which are sent unto thee, how often would I have gathered thy children together, even as a hen gathereth her chickens under her wings, and ye would not!" The approaching end of Jerusalem might be collected from certain signs, as the annual change of the season from the appearance of a tree: "Learn the parable of the fig-tree: when its branch is yet tender, and putteth forth leaves, ye know that summer is nigh*." Perseverance is inculcated in this short aphorism: "No man having put his hand to the plough, and looking back, is fit for the kingdom of God†." The disproportion of preachers, compared with the number of hearers, is expressed by "the harvest truly is great, but the labourers are few‡." A pure heart is to our moral conduct, what perfect sight is to our natural frame. The one prompts to virtuous actions; the other guides our steps in proper directions. This truth is conveyed in a manner peculiarly beautiful: "The light of the body is the eye: therefore when thine eye is single, thy whole body also is full of light: but when thine eye is evil, thy body also is full of darkness. Take heed, therefore, that the light which is in thee be not darkness§." Exposed as they would be to violent persecution, the disciples, before they embraced the gospel, were required to consider the degree of fortitude with which they could encounter dangers and difficulties. They were in this, as in common concerns of life, to act with due deliberation and forecast: "Which of you intending to build a tower, sitteth not down first, and counteth the cost, whether he have sufficient to finish it?" "Or what king going to make war against another king, sitteth not down first, and consulteth whether he be able with ten thousand to meet him that cometh against him with twenty thousand||." Christianity is planted under Divine appointment, to the intent that all should produce fruits of virtue and holiness. To represent this purpose and effect of his religion, the expression of our Lord is, "I am the true vine, and my Father is the husbandman¶." In the exercise and establishing of real sanctity, there is a spiritual union of design and co-operation, originating in God, promoted by Christ, and influencing the hearts of all those who are devoted to the cause of Christian faith and Christian morals. This perfect concurrence of will and endeavour, our Lord intimates by saying of himself and his disciples, "I am the vine; ye are the branches*." Not the Jews only, but the whole race of mankind, were objects of Christ's compassion, and were to receive benefits† from his death and passion. His concern for the salvation of all men he describes, when he asserts of himself, "I am the good shepherd; the good shepherd giveth his life for the sheep." "Other sheep I have, which are not of this fold: them also I must bring, and they shall hear my voice; and there shall be one fold, and one shepherd‡."

On a review of these and other similar illustrations, which were not studied and occasional, but unpremeditated and frequent; apart from all religious considerations, taste and genius would demand it of any reader to confess honestly, that such instances of fertile invention and pertinent application§, so interwoven

§ The illustrations of our Lord are singularly proper, not only as they illumine the immediate subject, but because in general they are borrowed from circumstances with which the Jews were conversant. "Præcipua erat omnibus occupatio in colendis terris et curando pecore; agricolarum et pastorum ferè natio erat." "Itaque non mirum est si Hebræi scriptores multi sunt in deducendis metaphoris ex his potissimum artibus, in quibus ferè nutriti et educati sunt; si quæ animis oculisque eorum maximè obversarentur, ea derivarent in poesin." Bp. Lowth's Præl. 7. Change but the terms, and the words are applicable to the illustrations of our Lord, and the audience which heard them. "The discourses, sayings, and parables, even so late as in the gospels, are suited to such a people, and abound with allusions to husbandry, and to the objects with which men are most acquainted in a country life." See Dr. Jortin's Serm. IX. vol. v. p. 185, 186. ed. 1778. Concerning these, and other "Beauties which occur in our Lord's Discourses," see part. 1. ch. ii. sect. 5. of Archbishop Newcome's "Observations on our Lord's conduct;" in which work, whoever con-in familiar conversation as to make a principal and considerable part of it, must have proceeded from talents very seldom imparted to man.

* But if it be evident that he was so extraordinary in mental endowments, one consequence of great weight indisputably follows; it is this; a person of understanding so very superior to the generality of men, would never have exposed himself to persecution and death among his own countrymen, unless for the purpose of accomplishing some great end that should be adequate to the loss of every earthly comfort, and even of life itself. It could not be reconciled even with common prudence, much less with uncommon abilities, to suppose that Christ would endure the bitterest sufferings for no other object than a popularity which could have been but of short continuance, and which infallibly must have been forfeited immediately after his death, had his pretensions been unfounded, and his predictions not true. To have thus acted, would not have been the conduct of a mind guided by the plainest sense: surely then it could not have been the case with Christ, who is acknowledged to have been enlightened with superior wisdom. He, who was the * brightest ornament of philosophy, was zealous in a cause which he deemed of more importance than any concern in this world; namely, the introducing of good morals; and to this work he devoted his life. It is but fair then to allow, that Christ also must have had in view some cause, in which he was zealous, and which he thought more important than life, since to it he resigned himself as a voluntary sacrifice. If the one as is never disputed, died in testimony of morality, in candour it should be indisputable that the other also died in testimony of revealed truth. If credit for sincerity be given the one, by parity of reason the same credit cannot be withheld from the other. The word of Christ then must be true: and that word declares "He came to give his life a ransom * for many;" and "that the world † through him might be saved?"

All however that has been said on the capacity with which Christ might have been gifted as a mere man, can be applicable to him only as a teacher by moral precepts and parables not prophetic; it cannot apply to him when he prophesies either by parables, or by more direct predictions. No force of understanding, in mere man not endued with Divine prescience, can so penetrate futurity, as to mark out distinctly, clearly, and circumstantially, events, which at the time when the prophet is foretelling them do not appear likely to happen. But thus distinctly, clearly, and circumstantially did Christ mark out events not probable to human conjecture; viz. his own crucifixion, and the destruction of Jerusalem. We must therefore ascribe that fore-knowledge to a higher cause than human understanding; even to Divine communication ‡; since that confessedly is the sole cause competent to such an effect, and the only source from which revelation of transactions inscrutable by human sagacity can possibly be derived. Christ then was enlightened by Divine inspiration.

Now, though to us who have seen the accomplishment of his prophecies, inspiration does of itself afford a most convincing proof that Christ was sent from God; yet the argument thence arising is irrefragably strengthened by the additional consideration of his miracles. Miracles, wrought for salutary purposes, entitle the worker of them to our confidence in his veracity. For, beneficial miracles cannot be worked without Divine co-operation §: and a holy God cannot co-operate in the effecting of miracles *, to attest assertions not true. But the Scriptures declare, that for the relief of the distressed, and in confirmation of his veracity, Christ continually † performed astonishing miracles; and they affirm him to have been "approved of God, in the wonders, and signs, which God did by him ‡," and by which it was manifest that "God was with him §." When therefore Christ in express terms tells us, that "he came to give his life a ransom for many," and "that the world through him might be saved," we know from the nature of the Divine attributes that he spake truth: for had he not spoken truth, he had not been enabled to work the miracles which he evidently did perform.

But if inspiration and miracles evince the truth of Christ as to the object of his mission, he must be true in all other respects; for Divine confirmation, like the power of suspending the laws of nature, could be given to no one, who would speak contrary to truth in any instance whatever ||. True then is Christ when concerning himself he asserts, that "He had glory with the Father, before the world was ¶;" that "He came down from Heaven ;" and that "all power was given him in heaven and in earth ††."

That he made these declarations, we are assured by the same witnesses who heard his prophecies, and saw †† his miracles. That their testimony is to be received we have no doubt, because there could have existed no other judgment possible or conceivable for them to affirm these facts, if false; whereas there were many and weighty considerations, which might have influenced them either to deny or conceal the facts, though true. The witnesses then we believe credible; we admit therefore their record of our Lord's declarations; and on the ground of his own words by them recorded, we worship the Lord Jesus-Christ to the glory of God * the Father, who ordained the dispensation of which Christ is the dignified and divine conductor; a dispensation of mercy and benevolence in God the author, and in our Lord the finisher of our salvation.

From the remarks which have been offered to you, on the preaching of Christ; from the enquiries which have been made concerning the source of his wisdom; and from the consequences which arise in the investigation of that subject; result these conclusions.

1. As a moral instructor, Christ displayed a mind endued with very extraordinary and super-eminent powers.

2. As a prophet, he discovered the clearest indications of prescience far exceeding all human foresight.

3. As a worker of miracles, he gave ocular demonstration of his possessing Divine energy.

If we consider him in the first of these qualities; then, to imagine he would expose himself to a most painful death, for the sake of establishing an opinion not only untrue, but which in its falsehood, must be liable to detection within the space of three days, is in the highest degree improbable, according to all the knowledge we have of common prudence in human action.

But if we regard him with a view to his other properties; then, to suppose he should claim to himself Divine honour without just pretensions, and yet at the same time be signally marked out by the ALMIGHTY as a prophet and a worker of beneficial miracles, is impossible, according to whatever ideas we can form of God's attributes either from natural or revealed religion.

It remains, therefore, that we acknowledge and receive CHRIST, under the exalted characters, which upon the authority of his own works and words the Scriptures assign him. As such, we do acknowledge and receive him. And remembering continually, that in the humiliation with which he left the glory of his Father and became man; in the wisdom with which he taught; in the miracles which he performed; in all the persecutions he experienced and the agonies he endured; in his death on the cross; in his marvellous resurrection; in his glorious ascension; in his effusion of spiritual gifts; remembering that in all these stupendous circumstances, CHRIST was actuated by love for the human race, and regard for the honour of God; was zealous that man should be more happy and God more glorified; by admiration of wisdom, benevolence, and goodness; by the ties of gratitude; by the duties of reverence; by the obligations of positive command; by the prospect of forming more virtuous habits in this life; by the hopes of attaining rational and spiritual happiness in a future state; impelled by all these motives we obey and worship CHRIST, as the SON of GOD, the Redeemer of man, the Saviour of the world, the LORD of all.

To HIM, with the FATHER, and the HOLY SPIRIT, by us who in obedience to our LORD's command were baptized in their name and dedicated to their service, be ascribed all praise and glory, might, majesty, and dominion, now and ever! Amen.

further, viz. that he did many wonderful works in confirmation of them; because we have no other evidence for the truth of one than of the other." S. CHANDLER, p. 51. If we still proceed in the argument, we must admit that our Lord made concerning himself those declarations, which are ascribed to him; for we have the same evidence to prove that he made those declarations, as to prove that he wrought miracles, and that he lived in Judea. But the evidence in proof of all these points is so forcible and valid, that it is "the strongest evidence for the truth of facts that ever was, or can be given to the world."

The Education of the Poor recommended.

JOHN viii. 12.

"I am the Light of the World."

Let there be light, was the first command of the Lord God Almighty, in the noblest exertion of his omnipotence. The glorious emanation, bursting from its orient fountains, instantly obeyed; and all nature, fresh from the hand of her Author, glowed with the beauty of variegated colour. But this primordial light, lovely though its appearance, and stupendous its essence, is still, we know, but a body created, physical and material. Another light there is, and a greater and a holier, of which the solar beam, all pure and radiant as it streams from the day-star, is but the emblem and the harbinger.

For hear the voice of our Saviour. I AM THE LIGHT OF THE WORLD. In the vivid language of eastern metaphor, he styles himself the sun of the intellectual system, the luminary of the soul.

Light indeed is synonymous in Scripture with wisdom, knowledge, happiness, life; life spiritual, and life immortal: and darkness, in the same figurative language, implies ignorance, misery, and death; spiritual death, in the midst of animal life, and eternal death, when animal life is no more.

He indeed who made the sun, and commanded it thus to revolve for ever in its orbit, GOD HIMSELF, says the apostle, is LIGHT; and we are well assured, that the first adoration ever offered by man was to the sun; of all visible objects, the most strikingly illustrious, and most obviously beneficial. But as the sun is to the earth, so the visual faculties of animals, and to all things susceptible of its influence, such is Christ, such the spirit of the Holy One that inhabits eternity, to the soul of man; dispensing to it analogous benefits, producing on it analogous effects, dispelling its darkness, and vivifying, with genial warmth, all its latent energy.

On the day of redemption, indeed, the FIAT of God operated no less graciously and powerfully than when, in the morning of the creation, the sun, for the first time, went forth as a bridegroom out of his chamber, and rejoiced; as a giant, to run his course.

For when the sun of righteousness arose, with healing in his wings, and the feet of him that brought glad tidings, appeared so beautiful on the mountains, how did he announce his dignity? I am the light of the world. It is a description, truly sublime; beautiful in its imagery, and no less just than beautiful. Few are the words; but magnificent the style, and momentous the purport; such indeed as could proceed from the lips of him alone, the loftiness of whose nature enabled him to utter them with appropriate grace, and without the slightest semblance of vain glory.

That Christ is the sacred source of all spiritual illumination is thus plainly declared, and must be confessed by all his followers, with sentiments of wonder and gratitude. But the occasion, on which we are now assembled, requires that we view him as the world's great luminary in another sense; a sense most highly interesting to man, though in comparison, but secondary and subordinate. I mean that he is collaterally the copious source of the less perfect radiance, still, in a high degree luminous, which has flowed upon the world from the preservation of LEARNING in the dark ages; from the cultivation of science in times of barbarism; and from a partial attention to education, in some mode and measure, however confined and inadequate, amidst the shades of ignorance gross as universal.

For it is true (and the page of history will justify the assertion), that the learning, or the means of learning, which we now so amply possess, were preserved from total destruction, by circumstances peculiar to Christianity.

It is a curious but incontestable fact, that for ages after the sixth century, when all learning in Europe was enveloped in clouds, the Egyptian darkness was in some degree dispelled from church, and a dim religious light;

stantly preserved in the cloister. A pale tremulous flame, every where else extinguished, still glimmered through the aisles and faintly illumined the arches of the abbey. Feeble indeed were its rays, like those of a sepulchral lamp or a vapour in the charnel-house. It emitted a light scarcely more than darkness visible; yet still it preserved those scintillations, whose flame afterwards irradiated whole empires with its blaze. It quivered, like an expiring taper for a time, but at last kindled a torch which lighted up the avenues to education, and eventually became the light of the world in the diffusion of general knowledge, together with the peculiar radiance of revealed religion.

According to this view of the church and of ancient times, the highest learning and philosophy, even the Organon of our own Vegetius, the system of our own Newton, the epics of our own Milton, all the advancements in polite learning and recondite science, originating in the excited energies of the human mind, may be traced to the light, preserved, during the dark ages, in the church, and in the church only; a light which was derived from the sun of righteousness, the star in the east; that star, which beamed over Bethlehem, at once a symbol of wisdom and a guidance to the wise.

To this religious light, encreasing as it advanced in our hemisphere, we confessedly owe not only the universities of this land, but the free grammar-schools founded in the great city and in almost every provincial town; and lastly, the parochial charity-schools; those seminaries of humble, but useful learning, which we are at this hour assembled, under the same auspicious light, to maintain, augment, and improve. Whatever names of institutors or supporters may appear sculptured on their mural tablets, or on the frontispiece of their portals; their corner stone, is Christianity; their founder, Jesus Christ; their benefactors, Christians; and their charter, the Gospel. Thus has the torch of learning kindled at the altar, been handed down, from age to age, unquenched by the barbarians of the North, whose savage fury devoted in its march, whole libraries to the flames, and (if the church had not afforded an inviolable asylum), would have crushed with ruthless havoc, in one heap of ruin, all the remains of classical antiquity. The lustre indeed of learning, the elegance of the fine arts, the sublimity of science, had no charms in the eyes of vandal nations, and served but to upbraid them with the barbarity of their ignorance. Light was to them, as sunshine to the owl. Add to which, that they loved darkness, because their deeds were evil.

But the CHURCH secured the sacred deposit in her shrine, and saved the time-honoured rolls of wisdom, art, and science, under the veil of the temple. In the CHURCH, during times most auspicious to the progress of knowledge, some degree of education was always necessary to qualify the lowest functionaries round the altar, even the puerile attendants on the priests, for the regular performance of the ritual and liturgical service. Thus in ages most unfavourable to literary acquirements, there existed in the cathedral, the monastery, and the convent, petty schools for the instruction of young Acolytes (as they were called), instruction in reading always, and in writing often; those humble attainments which were necessary to the choral chaunt, and the responses of a prescribed formulary. Attached to religious houses was usually a repository of manuscripts, and an office termed the scriptorium, where copies of the best classics, as well as legends of the worst superstition, were not only transcribed laboriously, accurately, and sometimes most beautifully; but illuminated with the brightest colours and most delicate touches of the pencil; and it may be observed, by the way, that the practice of illuminating manuscripts, greatly promoted the fine art of painting, an art which had no inconsiderable influence in the advancement of intellectual proficiency, and the promotion of polite literature.

These conventual offices constituted a kind of eleemosynary schools, usually appendant to the church and to religious houses, and afforded a partial education; the education of young ecclesiastics, who in process of time carried the lamp, which they had lighted at the altar, into the busy walks of life, and among the circles of laic and civil society. Thus illumined in the sanctuary and the cloister, they unavoidably imparted some rays of holy light to all the labyrinths of many-coloured life. Ecclesiastics (because few others were qualified), exclusively presided over the department of education; as they continue to preside over it at this hour, by the voluntary choice and deference of the laity. The knowledge acquired in the professional study of theology, opened the avenues to general science; and the Christian religion became the nursing mother of learning as well as of virtue.

So justly and characteristically did the great luminary of Christendom predicate of himself I am the light of the world; and doubtless he who gave the light, evinced by the very act, his intention that it should be imparted by the receivers, as means and opportunity might occur, or be procured. Doubtless the gracious Being who said let there be light, has made it our bounden duty to co-operate with his benign intentions, in communicating whatever light we may enjoy to those of our fellow-creatures who still sit in darkness, benighted in the recesses of obscure and lowly life, where poverty hides her head in shame; and ignorance, all unconscious, too often reposes in a lethargic and deadly slumber.

It has pleased the father of lights (as our father in heaven is frequently styled), that man should exercise the virtue of charity in acting, on many occasions, to his fellow man, as a superior and tutelary being; but particularly, in dispensing the light of knowledge; a gift which enriches the receiver without diminution of the donor's share. It is, we may assuredly conclude, the high behest of our Creator, and the declared will of our Redeemer, that the spiritual and intellectual sun which rose at the creation, and broke forth, with added splendour at the redemption, should shine more and more until the perfect day, and in due time illuminate the universe. It was clearly the edict of Omnipotence, "Let there be light," spiritual as well as natural; and man contravene the command of power irresistible, acting under the impulse of mercy infinite? Greatly is it to be deplored, that some among the sons of men have exhibited signs of an audacity so presumptuous; have endeavoured to veil the eyes of the poor from the sight of things belonging to their peace; have contended, with all their ingenuity, to prevent the sun of righteousness from shining on the cottage of labour, and cheering, with its warmth, the chill abode of unprotected indigence.

And these are they who calumniate the institution, and oppose the encouragement of charity-schools; representing our efforts to diffuse knowledge among the poor by parochial, national; and eleemosynary education, as incompatible with political wisdom, and dangerous to the state.

It is scarcely worth while to discuss all the objections which the narrow views of cold-hearted, statistical writers have suggested against the charity schools of this benevolent country. The greatest stress is laid on two; which we may briefly consider, though at the hazard of abusing your patience. First, say they, the education of the poor encourages idleness by rendering them disinclined to labour; secondly, it disturbs the arrangements of society by confounding the ranks of regular subordination.

As to the first objection, that knowledge causes in the poor an aversion to labour, do the poor then, in their uninstructed state, labour from choice? Have they not already, with the feelings common to all mankind, an aversion to toil and trouble; and, if they could, would they not, like others, live a life of comparative ease? Is labour their favourite pastime, their dear delight, an exercise willingly taken for health and pleasure, like the rural sports of ranks more elevated? Is it joyous to spend the toilsome hours in the perpetual night of a mine? To turn the wheel in the manufactory from morning till evening without a prospect of cessation or variety? To bear on their shoulders the heavy burdens of merchandize? To sweat at the anvil or the plough? No, certainly; for man, when he feels no spur, stimulating him to action, is naturally inclined to bask in the sun.

and pass his hours either in the repose of indolence, or in some selected mode of pleasant activity. Be assured that hard and constant labour, the labour of a life, is always the effect of necessity alone, imperious, unrelenting necessity. The poor labour that they may eat, they labour that they may be clothed, they labour that they may be sheltered by a roof from the inclemency of the climate. Necessary are all the objects of their labour to their bare existence. Will the daily want of food, of raiment, or of shelter be removed, by an ability acquired in the charity schools, to read the Bible, or even to write their own names, and calculate their little earnings and expenditure? Labour they must, as they did before they learned their alphabet, and were qualified to spell out, on the repose of the sabbath, or at the close of the week-day, their Prayer-book, their Testament, their Catechism, or their Whole Duty of Man. Labour they must, as they did before, they had learned by heart their duty towards God, and their duty towards their neighbour; yes, they must labour still, or they have this alternative: they must even starve, be clothed in rags, and find not where to lay their heads. The alphabet affords no substitute for bread, or raiment, or a roof for shelter and repose. Nor will a book, however good, or however well they may know how to use it, supersede the labour of the loom, the plough, the spade, and the axe. With the highest improvement which these humble schools of charity can give them, they must, at the call of nature, and under the pressure of want, submit with patience to the iron hand of necessity. And the better they are taught the lessons of religion, the more cheerfully are they likely to submit. For the improvement of their reason, the melioration of their disposition, and their awakened sense of moral rectitude, will induce them to discharge with less reluctance than before, the severest duties incumbent on their allotted state. They will probably, when trained to habits of piety, labour more abundantly, because they will feel the solace of religious hope, mitigating the pain of toil, cheering the long hours of confinement, and sweetening the intervals of liberty and leisure.

Experience has indeed removed the first objection. For in the northern division of this island all the poor are, and have long been educated, in parochial schools, with a strict attention to morality and religion. And can the united kingdom exhibit examples more uniformly excellent than those of the natives of the north, either of sobriety, industry, or submission to authority? How rarely are they convicted at the tribunal, how rarely, as victims of the law, do they suffer death, or pain, or disgrace? All of them can read, and most of them do read from choice (reading furnishing them with one favourite mode of spending their days pleasantly), and all, at the same time, are able and willing to labour, as their fortunate employers can testify, with additional skill, contentment, and alacrity, in consequence of a virtuous and pious education. Their reason improved by early culture and their sober habits of thinking, cause them to be convinced of the necessity of their humble station, and to deem happiness perfectly compatible, as it certainly is, with honest, healthy, and industrious poverty. They feel indeed the evils of indigence; but bear them with pious and cheerful resignation to the will of that God, whom they have learned in infancy to adore. None, at the same time, are more eager to advance themselves in the ranks of life, and none do advance themselves more frequently by those virtues which recommend them to their superiors; the principles and habits of which were acquired at the places of parochial education.

And have we not in the example of the northern Britons, an incontestible proof of the utility, even in a political sense, of national or universal instruction? Have we not an attestation, under the seal of experience, that the exertions of the labourer, and the ingenuity of the mechanic are not impeded or diminished; but promoted by teaching them to read and write? And since the results of experience must ever supersede the most subtle speculations of theory, the first question, appears to be unanswerably decided.

Painful and invidious would it be, to compare the effects of neglected education among the poor natives of our sister island, a brave and generous race, furnished by nature with keen sensibility and ardent genius, but sometimes barbarized and brutalized, through the defect of early discipline. Who but must weep over these forlorn children of want, when, blinded by ignorance, and seduced by passion, they fall victims to the laws of their country; ever ready as they are, to stand foremost in her battles, and bleed in her defence. The contrast of this neighbouring island with the northern parts of our own, is striking; and the difference in the state of the common people is sufficient to repel every attack of that sophistry which insinuates, that to enlighten the lower classes, is to encourage idleness, with all its consequent vice and woe.

And with respect to the second objection, which asserts that to educate the poor is to disturb subordination; it is true indeed, that, before the discovery of that most important art, the art of printing, the highest orders of society, in this, and all other countries of Europe, were grossly illiterate. It is true that, to have taught the lower orders to read, at that inauspicious period, might, in the natural course of things, have had a tendency to revolution. In point of knowledge, the rich and great would have been inferior to the poor and lowly; and since knowledge is power, the CONE (to which a well arranged community has been compared), might have been inverted. But under the present circumstances of Europe, no such effect can result from instructing the poor universally. By the diffusion of knowledge, consequent on the typographical invention, the whole fabric of society has been elevated. Therefore the poor stand higher than they did before; but they still form the basis of the pyramid. The regular gradation to the apex is not, in the smallest degree, disturbed. The poor man is elevated positively, but not relatively; and so, in exact proportion, is the rich man. Both have risen together, lifted up with the whole frame. The base is not raised from its own proper and subordinate place; but the platform itself, the area, the united pile, is exalted above its antient level. The pedestal is not altered either by elongation or transposition. The Corinthian column still towers in all its beauty, majesty, and altitude. The Doric and Tuscan stand below, plain yet massy. The extreme ranks do not approximate. The rich and poor indeed, as God appointed, do occasionally meet together, for many wise purposes, yet in the arrangements of social order, they remain distant and distinct, at their just, natural, and appropriate interval. The fabric is still firm; its solidity increased by accessions to its magnificence; and the stability of the capital secured by added breadth and gravity at the foundation.

It seems indeed probable, that the more MINN there is in any free nation, the more intellect in the mass of the people, the stronger will be the whole social edifice, from the subterraneous cell, up to the cloud-capt dome; for instead of such materials as hay and stubble (to use the scriptural expressions), its beams will be of oak, its bars of iron, and its walls of marble. MINN is the basis of all permanent power; and woe to the potentate who expects lasting security from the tottering props of plebeian ignorance. He builds, like the fool, on the sand, who erects a dynasty on the superstition, the prejudices, or the passions of a populace grossly ignorant, and therefore easily misguided and urged to deeds of frenzy.

And so much for the second objection to charity schools, which originates in an idea that they weaken empire and endanger tranquillity by disturbing subordination. "Pride," it has been well observed, "is not founded on the improvement of the understanding, but on the weakness and defects of it. None are prouder, "than the most foolish of the animals around us; and, it is ignorance of what is better, which makes men suppose they are possessed of all excellence."

But why should I fatigue attention by enumerating, or confuting the cavils of minute philosophers and petty politicians, who pretend, and have asserted, that none of our charitable institutions are consistent with an enlightened policy? What is this policy? It is at best but a worldly policy, which in this instance, Christian wisdom repudiates with disdain. Even as a worldly policy I think it erroneous. And how, as they pretend, is it enlightened? Not surely by the light which flows from the great luminary of Christianity, from the sacred lamp at the altar; but by the false fire, the ignis fatuus of vanity; or, the factitious phosphor of atheistical philosophy; a philosophy, which idolizes matter, and falls down in adoration of nature in preference to its Author.

Let us beware also of that narrow system of modern times which would govern men in society on principles of mere calculation; which appreciates human life at a low rate, and is ready to sacrifice millions at the unhallowed shrines of avarice and ambition. Among the recent refinements of a godless wisdom is that which considers the Lord of the creation merely as a sensitive machine, with eyes, arms, hands, and fingers, formed to manufacture some commodity or luxury, saleable in the emporiums of commerce; merely as an animated engine, to be worked at the will of opulence and power, for pecuniary emolument: merely as a breathing mill, or animal automaton, which cannot stand still a moment, for the purposes of moral and religious discipline, without irreparable loss of time and unpardonable waste of wealth: a political delinquency, in the estimate of the modern sophist and statistical calculator, more culpable and heinous than any infringement of the decalogue.

Such policy, such a principle, such a philosophy has no credit, no weight, no influence on a Christian auditory; before whom, to mention is to condemn, to describe, is to explode and reject it. The wealth of nations in a Christian's estimate is the goodness, the probity, the virtuous industry, and useful knowledge, amongst individuals, high and low, rich and poor, who constitute the grand aggregate of a national community. The mind is the man; and doubtless the best bulwark of a country, is the noble spirit of a sound, virtuous, religious people, duly informed by a competent education, and effectually restrained from all injustice and enormity, by the fear of God, and a Christian conscience.

Truth and reason, under all existing circumstances, are great, and will endure, as well as prevail. These form the columns of society, and like a rock of adamant, will stand the violence of the waves, and defy the corrosions of time, and the shocks of casualty. But how can truth and reason exist in the mass of the people without knowledge? and how can knowledge become general and pervade the whole body without national education, furnished to the poor by eleemosynary bounty, as it is to the rich, by their own voluntary choice and personal assiduity?

Consistently with this conviction, and acting with the sound policy of the children of light, you have persevered, notwithstanding the plausibility of objections, in patronizing, improving, and augmenting your charity-schools. Consistently with your persuasion, as members of the church of England, you have been zealous that the national schools, as well as the parochial, should be conducted according to the principles, doctrines, and discipline of the established religion. Charity schools, whether parochial or national, you are aware, are the porch, and the vestibule, either to the church or the conventicle. You deem it of most momentous importance to the church, that the direct avenues to it should be made smooth and clean, and light and pleasant. If the entrances to the sanctuary of the establishment are neglected, or unilluminated, you are justly apprehensive, that the imbecility of youth may be seduced from the paths of peace and sober piety into the wilderness of fanatical error; and lost in labyrinths, where discordant guides, often differing no less from each other than from the church, might lead the poor wanderer through the thorns of perplexity to the whirlpools of madness and despair.

Consistently and kindly you hold out a lantern to the church, and let your light shine before the feet of the young pilgrim in his progress to the sanctuary; the seat of rational piety, the school of sound instruction; the standard of a light which illuminates without dazzling; the receptacle of a fire which warms without burning; the dispenser of a heat which cherishes the vital principle, without danger of a morbid calenture.

Sound religion, you well know, is equally removed from the extremes of a chilling rigor and an ardent fever. And happily our church, in addition to its advantages in disseminating a sound religion with a pure morality, is wisely adapted to the nature and genius of our civil constitution. It is highly favourable to public tranquillity. It is an impregnable rampart not only against infidelity, atheism, and fanaticism, but against sedition, tumult, and insubordination. It allows and favours freedom of discussion; while it preserves for the common good, an authority necessary to prevent confusion and all the evil works of anarchical misrule. It is built on the foundation of the Scriptures, the prophets, and the apostles; Jesus Christ being the head corner stone. Therefore we must love our church, therefore we must defend our church; and defend it with a zeal no less ardent, than that which we display for the constitution of the state; that free and wise system of our forefathers, which has rendered our island the pride and ornament of civil society. And how can we defend it more effectually than by educating our youth in its doctrines? Yet in the utmost ardour of affection for both church and state, the spirit of christianity demands that we support our own institutions with all the mildness of moderation, all the forbearance of philanthropy, without bitterness, without hypocrisy, speaking the truth in love, and maintaining our own conviction of rectitude with every indulgence that may consist with wisdom, to human error and fallibility.

With a natural attachment to the church, of which we are members, we come forward at this juncture, not only to support our old charity schools, but to augment their numbers and improve their plan; by adopting the newly discovered modes of facilitation, expedition, and economy, imported under happy auspices, from an eastern clime; that clime, from which light of every kind, natural, intellectual, and spiritual first beamed on mortal man, wandering and lost in the shades of ignorance. As churchmen, we cannot but favour a system which favours our own church; the church of our fathers, the church of our children and families, the church of our country; a great and glorious church, richly adorned with sanctity and learning, with temples most magnificent, with all appendages adequate to its use and ornament, and become even more venerable, and if possible, more hallowed, from the circumstances of long duration and high antiquity. As churchmen, we must patronize a system which instructs the youth of our nation in the catechism of our excellent liturgy, and which conducts them to that place of worship, where our own children were initiated by baptism, and which we ourselves, from choice and for conscience sake, frequent, as often as we assemble to pour forth our praises and thanksgivings to Almighty God, and to hear the words of sound, sober, and scriptural instruction.

In schools superintended by a church, which discourages the extravagance of enthusiasm, soberness of mind will be taught; and soberness of mind is essential to the permanency of all religious principle. Without it, religion becomes insanity; and its votaries, under the effects of a disordered imagination, too often, instead of a school and a church, require the discipline of the physician, and the manacles of an hospital.

It is to be hoped that the spirit of party will never interrupt these labours of love. Charity rejoices that good is done, and is not forward to depreciate the deed or the doer of it, from schismatical prejudice; and therefore the christian philanthrope will not oppose the national instruction of the church catechism. How indeed can we train up the youth of the nation better, than by teaching them, in the words of the catechism, "to love, honour, and succour their father and mother, to honour and obey the king, and all that are put in authority under him; to hurt nobody by word or deed: to be true and just in all their dealings, to keep their hands from picking and stealing, and their tongues from lying and slandering; to keep their body in soberness and chastity; not to covet or desire other men's goods, but to learn and labour to get their own living, and do their duty in that state of life, to which it shall please God to call them." Can we, I ask, teach them in any better manner than by words like these; founding all their moral virtues on the love of God, on obedience to Christ, and on reverence for law and order, human and divine.

To give the poor children this sort of education, to inspire them with the fear of God, and to afford them the means of learning every thing that is honest and of good report, you are now assembled; and for the promotion of your purpose, a purpose recommended by patriotism, by Christianity, by the example of our grand national institution, and indeed of the united kingdom, I stand this day the delegated petitioner of your bounty. But solicitation is superfluous. Your bounty has, I see, by the annual subscriptions flowed, and will continue to flow, with spontaneous exuberance. It would be a violation of the respect due to a congregation, avowedly assembled for the purpose of charitable contribution, to weary you with importunity, or prescribe to your munificence. You want not the impulse of argument and persuasion to extort the reluctant pittance of a cold, formal decency, the scanty dole of the parsimonious hand which grudges while it gives. The happy return of peace and plenty at this moment will probably cause a peculiar expansion of heart, and kindle a more than common glow of benevolence. Our country, amidst the wreck of nations around, has shone forth with undiminished lustre, as the land of liberty, the land of learning, sound philosophy, pure religion, and on this occasion I may add with peculiar triumph, the land of charity; of charity which no privations of long and severe adversity could impede or confine. Our country, in consequence of her steady adherence to religion, in faith and practice, lifts up her head among the nations, the pride and boast of humanity, the glory, the envy, the defence of Europe; nor can I for a moment fear, lest her lustre should be ever tarnished, on occasions like these, by an ill-timed parsimony. You will as patriots, no less than Christians (as far as such an occasion will allow), adorn the triumphs of her valour with the trophies of benevolence. You gave largely to foreigners in distress; but at the same time forgot not the child of poverty at your own doors, who was perishing through lack of knowledge, and on whom the light of the Gospel had scarcely emitted a ray, though all around him was illuminated. You saw the poor vagabond in the streets of the great city. The world knew him not. The world turned from him with disgust. But you recognized him as a brother. You remembered, that in the most forlorn outcast and abject, (squalid and deplorable though his exterior,) there is an immortal spirit, which we hope one day may be a partaker with ourselves in a state of glory, of consummate intelligence, of mutual kindness, of exalted felicity. Rough, forbidding, perhaps offensive is the guise of the ragged, famished, wanderer; yet is there a jewel within, a pearl of price, which, with your aid will be disengaged from its incrustation, and prepared to shine, in the light of Christ, with all its primeval brilliancy.

And even in this sublunary state, the effects of education in raising poor persons to great eminence and public utility, have been wonderful. The most illustrious characters in arts and arms have arisen, from the darkest, lowest, vale of obscurity. They have sprung with elastic force to extraordinary heights in consequence of native strength, called forth by early culture. Fenced from injury at first, they have risen and towered above their equals, by the hardihood acquired in a chill soil; and, like the oak of the forest, or the pine on the mountain, vegetated with luxuriancy in the bleakest exposure and the wildest solitude. Adversity has indeed been found often favourable to virtue. Many examples might be cited from the pages of biography. Our gracious Lord himself, we know, was despised and rejected of men—a man of sorrows, and acquainted with grief; and the luminary of the world had been at once, and for ever extinguished, if the pride and prejudice of man could have prevailed against the will of the Almighty. But the crown of thorns, which the insolence of authority bound round his bleeding brow, became a more splendid ornament than a diadem of jewels; the dove, a more triumphant standard than the Roman eagle; and the cross, lifted up on high, an ensign more glorious than the banner, crimsoned with gore, which waved in the wind, to emblazon a Caesar's victory. Humble as was the birth of the carpenter's son, mean as the manger that cradled him, dark and dismal as the hour of his crucifixion, he it was who ascended on high, and led captivity captive. He it was who became, what he styled himself, the light of the world, and dispensed those rays, which, under your charitable administration, may lighten the path of these little ones, not only to useful and creditable employments and stations in this world, but to a consummation of bliss in realms of light and glory; the light of God's countenance, and the glory of immortal life. And is good so great to be done by any deed of ours this day, and this hour, before we separate? How sweet must be the satisfaction, how serene and exquisite the joy of a well-disposed mind, to consider that the donation of a little superfluity, will contribute to a purpose so extensively, so sublimely, so divinely beneficial. How sleeps the kind-hearted man, lulled on his pillow with the soothing reflection, that he has not lost a day by losing an opportunity to do good to some poor unfortunate fellow-creature; but that he has humbly co-operated with his Lord and Saviour, in a work of love and mercy, and mitigated, in one instance, the sorrows of suffering humanity.

To a mind so disposed, it must be consolatory to reflect, that a grand effort, an effort unprecedented in the history of the world, is now made in our own distinguished country, to advance the happiness of the poor, and indeed to enlighten the understanding, and meliorate the morals of the human race. The poor have now the Gospel preached to them, by the instrumentality of the press, by the universal distribution of the Scriptures, and by national schools, in a manner, and to an extent, unparalleled at any previous period, since the light of the world first burst on chaos, in the morning of creation. The result of such labours of love, operating universally, must, at some future period, become stupendously beneficial. Christ declared himself the light of the world; and it has been reserved (in the unsearchable ways of Providence), for the age in which we exist to diffuse that light, in our own country, to the remotest corners and the darkest recesses, in which penury and ignorance lie helplessly enveloped. The era will be pronounced (when we take a view of the multiplied public charities around, and consider the vigorous efforts of lay and clergy combined), the jubilee of Christian benevolence. And shall any one here assembled not be emulous to take a part in this work, and unambitious to become an instrument in the hand of heaven, in communicating the light, which he himself perhaps has amply enjoyed from his labours, in consequence of more favourable opportunities, and the advantages afforded by competency, not only for a useful, but a liberal education.

Is there one among us who will avow that he wishes not to share in the generous contest of beneficence? But why ask the question? The deeds of charity, already recorded in the rolls of annual subscription, demonstrate your zeal in the cause, and remove all doubt of your liberality in its support. I have already said I need not importune you. I cannot for a moment, distrust that generosity, on which your voluntary attendance at this hour, (as you were well aware of the occasion,) justifies, or rather demands, a full and unqualified reliance.

I can only venture to urge (and this also may be unnecessary), that you be careful to act, in dispensing your bounty, from a motive purely evangelical. Manage not so ill, as to be bountiful and at the same time uncharitable. Paradoxical as it may appear, the case is possible, and, it may be feared, not uncommon. To avoid it, let us pray that our hearts may be filled with grace, while our hands are extended in munificence. This is to be charitable to our own souls, while we give to others pecuniary assistance. This is to consecrate our gift to God, and to secure the favour of him, whose mercy the most opulent of us all must one day supplicate, with all the earnestness of abject mendicancy.

May then the Holy Spirit influence with his affectionate energies all who are here assembled, and give them grace, not only to promote the good work, but to promote it, from the true Christian principle, which is faith working by love.

How significant the words! Faith working by love! Mark them, ponder them. They form an epitome of the whole doctrine of Christian charity, and may serve as a test and touchstone to assay the sincerity of our virtue.

Such a faith, actuated and acting by such a love will unbar the gates of light, that glorious light which streams from the world's great luminary, and co-operate with THE FATHER OF LIGHTS in pouring its beams on all the sons and daughters of want; guiding their feet through the shadowy vale of ignorance, labour, and sorrow, to realms of everlasting rest, along the safe, luminous, and pleasant path of piety and peace. Such a faith, actuated and acting by such a love, will cause the sun of righteousness to shine over their, and our own prospects of futurity, and open to the view of all, those regions of glory, to which the only infallible guide is charity; CHARITY, OUT OF A PURE HEART, AND OF A GOOD CONSCIENCE, AND OF FAITH UNFEIGNED.
